In the age of aircraft sabotage and foreign airport bombings, the traveling public deserves to have a rapid and accurate way of learning about potential problems in the countries they are about to visit.

I commend the following New York Times article to my colleagues in the Congress:

[From the New York Times, Feb. 5, 1989]

GETTING A DIRECT LINE TO THE STATE DEPARTMENT

(By Betsy Wade)

For 10 years, the Bureau of Consular Affairs in the State Department has been preparing, revising and rescinding informative notices to Americans about travel abroad. These information sheets, or travel advisories, to give them their official name, are based on reports from State Department people in the field. They may be headed "warning" or "caution" or labeled simply "travel to" the country in question, and range from reports on hotel crowding—during an international fair in Baghdad, Iraq, last October, for example—to a continuing warning of the danger of guerrilla land mines in rural areas of El Salvador.

The 46 advisories in effect today include admonitions that would keep prudent United States citizens away from a country altogether, because there are no diplomatic relations or the security situation is perilous, and enumerations of remote areas likely to be hazardous for vacationers. But for all of their obvious value, these reports have remained unknown to most pleasure travelers; to get the information, you had to know that the advisories existed to begin with and then ask someone who had them if there was one in effect for the place you planned to visit.

In other words, for the 10 years these messages have been available, it took pretty aggressive research to learn that the United States Government cautions travelers to Ghana against wearing camouflage jackets or any "clothing or items which may appear military in nature" or that adventure travelers planning to trek in Nepal should register with the United States Embassy before setting out and should never trek there alone because of the danger of being harassed, robbed or kidnapped.

In December the State Department took a modest step toward putting this kind of information directly into the ears of the traveling public. If you use a push-button phone to call 202-647-5225, a number used by the Citizens Emergency Center in the State Department, you will be told to punch particular numbers on your phone for certain areas of the world, further numbers for portions of the alphabet, and then numbers to activate the recording of an advisory applying to the country you want to visit. If you have a long itinerary in mind, you can listen to three advisories before the connection is broken, and then call again to hear three more. (Questions about visa requirements can also be answered.)

Right now, if you use a dial phone to make the call, you are told to remain on the line and an employee comes on to learn which advisories—up to three—you want to hear. If the emergency center is not overloaded, the reports will be read to you. If things are busy, you will get a call back—the Government pays this toll—and the advisories will be read to you then. You may also ask to have pertinent advisories mailed to you.

Until the department gets an additional system that can be activated by voice as well as phone push buttons, people calling on a dial phone will be able to get information only on weekdays between the hours of 8 A.M. and 10 P.M. and on Saturdays from 9 A.M. to 3 P.M., Eastern standard time. Those using a push-button system who want to hear recordings can call at any time. It may be midyear before a system for the voice-activated recordings is installed.

The basic purpose of the center's phone service continues to be providing expert help for callers who are anxious about someone missing or jailed overseas, need to arrange to send money to a stranded friend or want information on a storm or crash. Before Dec. 20, the department's employees who answered on this line would also read travel advisories if asked, but the installation of the recorded service to take the burden of rote work means that emergency advice and action will be provided faster.

On Dec. 21, the day after the recordings were hooked in, the department has to cope with a surge of calls about the crash in Scotland of a Pan American plane flying to the United States. Understandably, the emergency overwhelmed the newly installed recorded advisory service; the department figures show that from Dec. 20 to Dec. 31, 1,090 calls were put through to the task force dealing with the Pan Am crash and 538 callers wanted to hear travel advisories. In the week of Jan 8 to 14, 670 travel advisory messages were heard by callers either listening to a recording or to a staff person.

Before the recording device was hooked up, the State Department's advisories were posted in passport offices and supplied to big travel agents, major newspapers and airlines. This means your travel agent or your airline probably could have read you the information if you asked, but neither would have been likely to volunteer it.

Newspapers, at least this one, seldom carry travel articles that might encourage visits to places that are subjects of advisory notices. However, new State Department advisories are usually reported in The Times's Travel section, or old ones are noted where appropriate in articles on the country in question.

According to Philip Covington of the department's Bureau of Consular Affairs, the recent rise in sabotage and terrorist attacks at airports has made the traveling public much more attentive to security matters, and this is part of the reason the department is making its advisory information more accessible.

The next step in this effort will be to place interactive television equipment in passport offices for use by applicants for passports. These TV sets will work like those in supermarkets or shopping stalls, where the user presses a key or a spot on the screen to bring up a table of information on a particular topic. The first sets will probably be placed in four agency offices later this year. For the vaguer future is a plan to insert the advisories into computer reservation systems maintained by airlines for themselves and travel agents.

Travel agents and airlines have usually been reluctant to volunteer negative information that they receive from United States agencies, meaning the State Department and the Centers for Disease Control, unless clients specifically ask.

One New York travel agent, Roberta E. Barcelon of Union Tours at 79 Madison Avenue, thinks the display of advisories in the reservations systems would be valuable. "Quite a few people—travelers and travel agents—don't pay attention to what's going on in the world," Ms. Barcelon said. "People pick up tours that are going to parts of the world that aren't particularly safe. With this warning, you could check with the packagers and see if they are going to deviate from the itinerary. Business people always make a contact with people out there, but pleasure travelers do not always know what they are getting into."

Here is a list, as of early January, of the travel advisories in effect that may be heard on the recorded service. The department cautions: "The State Department does not advise avoidance of all travel to most of the nations listed but wishes Americans to be aware of problem areas". It lists these places:

Afghanistan, Angola, Burma, Cambodia, Chad, China, Colombia, Cuba, Cyprus, El Salvador, Ethiopia, Ghana, Guatemala, Honduras, India, Iran, Iraq, Kuwait, Lebanon, Libya, Malaysia, Mozambique, Namibia, Nepal, Nicaragua, North Korea, Pakistan, Panama, Papua New Guinea, Peru, Philippines, Somalia, South Africa, Soviet Union, Sri Lanka, the Sudan, Suriname, Syria, Tanzania, Thailand, Turkey, Uganda, Vietnam, West Bank and Gaza, Zambia and Zimbabwe.

TRIBUTE TO LEO COSLOW

HON. LAWRENCE J. SMITH

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 28, 1989

Mr. SMITH of Florida. Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I call to your attention the retirement of Mr. Leo Coslow. Leo has been president of the Meadowbrook Towers condominium complex in Hallandale, FL, for the past 12 years. During that time, he established a well-respected reputation for hard work and devotion to public service. His leadership will be sorely missed by the entire community.

Sixteen years ago, Leo moved to Hallandale to retire. At that time, Leo could have retired knowing that he had accomplished more than the average man. In addition to being vice chairman of the board of the Community Bank of Long Island, he also had been the owner of Coslow's, a successful chain of retail clothing stores. However, Leo did not fit Webster's definition of a "retiree." Even now, Leo is not fully retiring. He will continue to work as a part-time teller.

Always ready to rally to the needs of his community, Leo became an active resident and leader of the Meadowbrook Towers condominium complex. It was Leo who organized a committee to buy the condominium complex's land lease, thereby making owners out of the residents of the complex. As a result, the residents of Meadowbrook Towers were saved a tremendous amount of money and frustration. Leo was also a primary figure in the fight to obtain more police officers and firefighters for the city of Hallandale. As a tribute for his tireless dedication, Leo has also been named president emeritus of the board of the Meadowbrook Towers condominium complex.

The fact that his community is unwilling to relinquish his services is a better tribute to Leo Coslow than I can express with only a few words. I wish Leo good luck and good health for the future, and I know that he will continue to serve the community of Hallandale for many years to come.

DR. DEWAYNE WHITTINGTON: AN INSPIRATION

HON. ROY DYSON

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 28, 1989

Mr. DYSON. Mr. Speaker, Congress has always recognized the value of education in America. With this in mind, I rise today to honor one of the great educators from Maryland's First District, Dr. Harrison DeWayne Whittington. Dr. Whittington is superintendent for Somerset County Schools, and the first black superintendent on Maryland's Eastern Shore. He is an inspiration to all of the students in the county and to all of us who appreciate dedication to public service.

Known by family and friends as a modest man, Dr. Whittington doesn't boast about his accomplishments, but lives by his aunt's advice: "Let the works I do speak for me." His works speak loudly. He has led or served on 29 education-related committees and 45 community organizations, while still finding time to be active in the Shiloh United Methodist Church. He has received 39 honors and awards, including Community Leader of America, Personalities of the South, and the Martin Luther King Achievement Award.

Dr. Whittington's dedication to community service is exemplified by his efforts with Shore Up!, Inc. Shore Up! is a community action agency involved in service projects such as the Head Start Program, fuel assistance for low-income families, employment, and food distribution. In his 15 years with this organization, Dr. Whittington has been a powerful advocate for children and youth. He was instrumental in getting facilities for the food assistance program, and for distributing this food to some 3,500 Somerset County residents. As a member of the Training and Employment Advisory Council, he has used his business knowledge to help participants find and keep jobs, jobs that might never have been found without his help.

But for all of these accomplishments, Dr. Whittington is most known as an educator. He has served as title 1 coordinator, director of Federal programs, coordinator of special programs and supervisor supporting services, and assistant superintendent for Somerset County Schools. In 1974, he was coordinator of human relations for the Maryland State Department of Education. Now he has added to his credentials by being named superintendent of Somerset County Schools.

Dr. Whittington is an inspiration for all of us, but especially to our Nation's youth. He was not born with the advantages that many of us can claim. His mother died when he was only 9 days old. He was raised by his grandparents. Education was something he had to work hard to obtain. Throughout high school he served as a custodian in the Somerset County school system, the same system he now leads. He worked his way through Morgan State University, and later earned his master's degree in education from Pennsylvania State University. Dr. Whittington has proven that vision and a commitment to hard work can overcome some of life's most formidable obstacles.

Mr. Speaker, I proudly salute Dr. Whittington. We could not point to a better example for our Nation's youth. His accomplishments will continue to grow, and our educational system and communities will continue to benefit from his work.

BIRMINGHAM: ONE OF THE NATION'S BEST

HON. BEN ERDREICH

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 28, 1989

Mr. ERDREICH. Mr. Speaker, once again, a national publication has declared what the people I represent have known all along, the city of Birmingham symbolizes the best of what the New South has to offer. With its ever-growing economy and cultural diversity, Birmingham combines that bustling energy and driving heartbeat of a big city with the warmth, friendliness, and easy-going manner of small-city life.

The February 6, 1989, issue of Newsweek spotlights Birmingham as the "perfect" place to live. It describes "The Magic City" as "a friendly, prosperous city feeding on a high-tech blend of biomedical research, engineering, and telecommunications." It notes particularly the vital importance of the University of Alabama at Birmingham Medical Center to employment and economic growth, as well as the "fast-growing" Southern Research Institute, a $40 million nonprofit laboratory.

The article cites the diversity of the city, saying, "In all, some 67,000 service-sector jobs have been created in the Birmingham area over the past decade—a 27-percent increase." Yet, "while economic development has brought excitement to the town, residents still praise Birmingham as a great place to relax."

So, whether its "good jobs or good fishing," as the article concludes, Birmingham has something for just about everyone. With its southern hospitality economic base, Birmingham is the kind of city that attracts exactly what it has to offer, the best and the brightest, and all of its residents are mighty proud.

TRIBUTE TO AL LARAMORE

HON. C. THOMAS McMILLEN

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 28, 1989

Mr. McMILLEN of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to a man who dedicated his life to the youth of Annapolis, MD. Who, through his commitment to excellence, reenforced our belief in striving for the best. Al Laramore, affectionately known as "Big Al," was a longtime teacher and coach at Annapolis High School. His untimely death on January 10 of this year, at the age of 53, cuts short a coaching career unrivaled in its successes.

Mr. Laramore joined the staff at Annapolis High after graduation from West Virginia Wesleyan University. Over the years he led the "Fighting Panthers" to a 156–68 record over 23 football seasons and registered more than 100 victories in basketball, securing a State championship in 1974 along the way. In 1983 and 1984 his lacrosse teams won State regional championships—the highest level of competition available at the time.

Coach Laramore was a respected rival known for getting the most from his players—but he gave the most as well. He was a deeply religious man and a longtime member of the Fellowship of Christian Athletes. His presence will be sorely missed at Annapolis High, but his memory will live on.

I'm sure you will join me in this well-deserved tribute to Coach Laramore and in extending condolences to his family and friends.

TRIBUTE TO ROBERT L. WALKER

HON. JOSEPH M. McDADE

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 28, 1989

Mr. McDADE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to pay tribute to a former constituent whose unheralded work may have pioneered the present equal employment opportunity laws which prohibit discriminatory questions in job applications and interviews.

Robert L. Walker, a former computer expert, consultant, and engineering recruiter, drafted a legislative bill of rights for equality [BORE] in the late 1960's to minimize various types of employment discrimination that existed at that time. The comprehensive JOB BORE proposal contained a number of specific proposals on unfair preemployment questions which eventually became law. Walker's proposals on eliminating or restricting questions relating to height and weight, marital status, national origin, citizenship, family situations and membership in organizations are nearly identical to current law.

Walker's proposal originated from his experience in the early 1950's when he supervised an industrial employment operation. While recruiting engineers, he noticed a prevalence of questions on employment application blanks which he felt violated the applicant's privacy and were irrelevant to prospective job performance. The information gained from these unnecessary questions could be used to eliminate job applicants on the basis of stereotyping and discrimination.

For example, Walker felt that questions about the number of children an applicant had could bias an employer against hiring that person. He proposed that questions on the number of dependents not be allowed on preliminary or supplementary employment applications. Current law allows an interviewer to ask whether an applicant has responsibilities that would interfere with specific work schedules, but not about dependents, children, or child care plans.

Walker submitted his legislative proposal to the Wisconsin Congressman who represented him at the time. The BORE plan was subsequently brought to the attention of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission. Later, many of Walker's ideas were incorporated into public law.

Before his death in 1985, Walker told a newspaper reporter,

Everybody likes to receive credit for his work, particularly when it is done voluntarily on one's own time. However, the important thing at this time is the knowledge that, due to my efforts, millions of people have the legal machinery available to redress grievances in situations where they feel they have been subjected to employment discrimination or unwarranted invasion of privacy.

Mr. Walker's selfless work to correct an injustice is deserving of the highest praise. His legislative initiative shows that one person truly can make a difference. His widow, Helen Walker, brought her late husband's efforts to my attention last fall, and I am pleased to report Mr. Walker's contribution to my colleagues in the House of Representatives.

TUNE IN, TUNE OUT, DON'T VOTE

HON. LEON E. PANETTA

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 28, 1989

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to share with my colleagues a statement by Mayor John V. Lindsay on the growing need for campaign reform. I have had both the honor and pleasure of working closely with John Lindsay in the past. I know that he is deeply committed to ensuring greater voter participation in our democracy and I share his deep concern over the recent patterns of decreased voter turnout in Presidential elections.

As a longtime elected official and former Presidential candidate himself, John Lindsay is greatly concerned that the recent negative Presidential campaign has irreparably damaged the American voter's trust in our political system. In his article, Mayor Lindsay identifies what he believes to be the root of the voters' disillusionment with our political system and proposes many sweeping campaign reform changes. I urge my colleagues to consider Mr. Lindsay's proposals.

TUNE IN, TURN OFF, DON'T VOTE

(By John V. Lindsay)

The widespread outrage over the conduct of our recent Presidential campaign has dissipated as Americans look toward a new federal administration and hope for the best. It would not be in our nation's interest, however, to repress the regrettable events of the last election. They point to deep problems in our political life that must be solved to protect the democratic system from further voter estrangement and corruption. What follows is a brief account of what went wrong and some recommendations for preventing the same political disenchantment from recurring.

The elections of '88 are over and it's time to congratulate the new President and wish him and the country all good fortune. Etched in the history of the United States, however, is this election, and stemming from it are critically important lessons to be learned and steps to be taken.

According to one key poll, 63 percent of Americans considered the '88 Presidential campaign to be "abysmally negative". As one who has been involved in seven Presidential campaigns for over thirty-six years, run eight times for political office, including once for President, this campaign was the worst in my memory. Voters were repelled by the poisonous mudslinging; the low vote reflected voters' disaffection—only 50% of the eligible bothered to turn out, the lowest in 54 years in the United States and the lowest in the world of any industrial democracy. Such tactics, while not uncommon in state or local campaigns, had been unprecedented in a Presidential race, and that remains both the legacy and the message to the country. Because these sleazy techniques worked, others are certain to follow suit and take the low road in elections in years to come.

The candidates ignored the most critical issues facing our country. Voters were dismayed by President-elect Bush's drumming away on his positions in favor of the death penalty, prison furloughs and the recital of the Pledge of Allegiance, the objective being to make Governor Dukakis seem weak on law enforcement as well as unpatriotic. The governor never responded effectively, thus dragging down the campaign even further. Thousands of Americans increasingly felt frustrated and appalled by the campaign's tone.

Then there was the money. It's become so expensive to mount a major statewide or national campaign that candidates spend more time raising a war chest than they do in listening to constituents, reading, or even thinking about what they'd do if elected. One Senatorial candidate from a large state told me that he was spending 75 percent of his time raising money. Many of my old colleagues in the House of Representatives have begged me to help devise new legislation that would help get them out from under yoke of fundraising. One exasperated woman who considers herself a good citizen told me she could no longer get to see a candidate unless she contributed at least $500, which she could not afford. No wonder she felt shut out of politics.

Seventy percent of the oceans of money that are now raised go into buying television "spots". However, the more money that is spent on campaigns, the lower the vote. Americans are being induced into passivity by a media-oriented circus whose emphasis on fund-raising, advertising and polling makes most citizens feel that the process is beyond their grasp. They watch this expensive, negative "show" on television as spectators, not as participants and millions don't bother going to the polls.

How do we reverse this tide of negativism and reengage the American people in politics?

First, get rid of paid political television spots. These "messages" provide us with no useful information about the candidates. Denying office-seekers the opportunity to run on the basis of superficial "sound bites" and ads might force them to say something that rings true about the nation's condition and tell us what they would do to improve it. Most important, the elimination of such advertising would save tens of millions of dollars in taxpayers' matching funds devoted to this purpose without our assent. More important still, taking such spots off the air would deny large financial contributions a chit to be called if their candidate wins. Since broadcast advertising has become the vehicle of choice for reaching the electorate, candidates have become perilously dependent on and beholden to the privileged few individuals and interest groups who can afford to pay for it. That's not the way our system should operate.

If halting paid television spots should require a test of this issue again in the Supreme Court of the United States, let it happen. The practice of spending fortunes—including taxpayers' money—on misleading political advertising should not be allowed to fester totally protected as "free speech" lest the democratic process be seriously threatened. We do not invoke the First Amendment to immunize either obscenity or misleading commercial speech; that amendment should not be advanced as the rationale for undermining our political process, either.

Second, abolish the "soft money" provision that exempts all funds raised for so-called independent purposes from mandated contribution limits. This hypocritical loophole in the campaign financing law is rightly regarded by the American people as one more reason to be cynical about the way we elect our leaders.

Third, let's have more criticism from both Congress and the press when our national political campaigns descend into the gutter. Rather than exploit the sensationalistic aspects of negative electioneering in pursuit of a larger circulation or a bigger television audience, the press should call the candidates on sleazy practices and hold them to a higher standard of conduct. Members of Congress, with a reasonable degree of patriotism and pride in their profession, should act similarly. Not so incidentally, that would be a worthy way of proving to us that they deserve to run for national office themselves.

America suffers in many ways because our political campaigns have become so repugnant to the electorate. Citizens don't get involved in the process as campaign workers any more, diminishing voter turnouts give well-organized and well-financed extremists a disproportionate impact over the outcome of elections and worthy men and women are discouraged from seeking elective office. The net result of these trends has been a decline in the overall quality of political leadership.

In the years ahead such steps should be taken to bring about a more decent, sensible approach to political campaigning that merits the respect and participation of the American people.

REAUTHORIZE SELECT HUNGER COMMITTEE

HON. BYRON L. DORGAN

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 28, 1989

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I rise in enthusiastic support of the reauthorization of the Select Committee on Hunger. Perhaps no other committee in the Congress has played such a vital role in addressing the complicated issues of domestic and world hunger.

The House gave this committee the daunting mandate of developing a comprehensive review of the problems of hunger at home and around the globe. We recognized that hunger is such an urgent matter and that responsibility for its relief was scattered among so many committees of jurisdiction that one committee should be charged with assessing the problems of hunger and then with recommending promising solutions.

As a member of the committee for several years, I can attest to its positive role in fulfilling its mandate. During the last Congress the committee conducted 32 hearings; issued 7 reports on hunger issues; traveled to such hunger-threatened nations as Haiti, Sudan, Bangladesh, Nicaragua, Ethiopia, and Vietnam; and studied such poverty-ridden areas as Appalachia, urban unemployment prockets, and American Indian reservations. More impotantly, the committee crafted solutions, (later enacted into public law) including a $17 million Child Survival Assistance Program for civilian victims of Central American civil war; model diabetes centers for targeted Indian reservations; support for Women in Development; and earmarks for microenterprise credit, a Child Survival Fund, vitamin A treatment, and guinea worm disease eradication.

Clearly, these advancements could not have been made without the cooperation and support of the respective authorizing committees. However, the progress we have made in Congress on the above issues, shows that the committee has worked as an advocate and as a partner with other committees, and not as a competitor.

This cooperative and effective partnership was reflected before in the overwhelming margins by which the Select Committee on Hunger was reauthorized in the past. I strongly believe that the continuing demand to tackle hunger problems, comprehensively—the food crises in Sudan, Afghanistan, and Nicaragua, and the malnutrition of the homeless, American Indians, and rural Appalachians—offers a compelling reason to continue the work of this panel.

Consequently, I urge my colleagues to support this resolution of reauthorization and, by this action, signal to the hungry and malnourished in every dark corner that this body wants to shine the light of hope on their lives.

THE TRAIL OF TEARS

HON. BILL EMERSON

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 28, 1989

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Speaker, in the 100th Congress we designated the Trail of Tears as a National Historic Trail, commemorating the forced relocation in 1838 of the Cherokee from their ancestral homeland in the Southeastern United States to Oklahoma. In the course of our debate in the designation process, I noted that the Trail of Tears runs through my home district and State, and I commented on the widespread interest that it obtains there about the Trail of Tears.

The segment of the Trail of Tears that crosses Missouri begins at Cape Girardeau, the point at which many of the Cherokees crossed the Mississippi River and at which there was major encampment. Otahki, a Cherokee princess, died in the encampment in the Cape Girardeau area and was buried there. Many communities in my district have had a long and vital interest in their relation to the Trail of Tears. Many of them had special observances last fall in the course of noting the 150th anniversary of the march.

Many citizens traversed the trail from Tennessee to Oklahoma as a commemorative gesture and they were joined along the way by many local groups interested in the Cherokee, the Trail of Tears, and this episode in American history.

The 1988 commemorative trek in the form of a wagon train departed Red Clay, TN, on September 17, and completed the march on December 3 at Tahlequah, OK.

The portion of the 1988 wagon train that traversed Missouri was the longest. Participants spent a whole month in Missouri, from October 23 until November 24, camping each day at a different spot along the trail.

On October 23, it was my privilege to ride in the lead wagon from McClure, IL, across the Mississippi River to Cape Girardeau, MO. Later that day, and on October 24, participants had an encampment and rendezvous at the Trail of Tears State Park in Cape Girardeau County.

Trail of Tears State Park is one of the jewels of the Missouri State Park System and was created in the 1950's when local citizens with a deep interest in history purchased the land which now comprises the park, including the site of the 1838 encampment, and donated the land to the State.

At the rendezvous on October 23, 1988, there was an extensive program and ceremony, open to the public, attended by several thousand people. In the course of the rendezvous encampment ceremony there was some outstanding entertainment including historical lectures, folk tales, and song.

One of the outstanding items on the program was the ballad of "A Trail of Tears" by Jeannie Hinck of Burfordville, MO. Jeannie sang this ballad, which is beautiful; and I regret that the music cannot be heard here and reproduced for all to hear, but I am very pleased to be able to share the lyrics that she wrote which, I think, is an appropriate expression of sentiment recalling the sad story of the trail and of its significance in our history. I include the words of the ballad herewith.

A TRAIL OF TEARS

I awoke to the sound of hunger
Half way there, half way there.
The hunting was poor in the dead of that winter
Nothing there, nothing there.
Oh the white man, had made us a promise
So we put away our deepest fears.
And once again we continued our journey,
A trail of tears, trail of tears.

When we crossed that mighty river,
Bitter cold, bitter cold.
Soon we mourned the death of Otaki,
Story told, a story told.
We thought of the land that awaited
To live in peace for the rest of our years.
We go to join what's left of our people
Scattered down that trail of tears.

As we walk this road of sadness
Who would care, who would care.
I hear the cry's of the weak and the dying
Oh despair, oh despair
For the white man had wanted our forests.
They led us here, led us here.
The spirit of death is heavy among us.
A trail of tears, trail of tears.

Oh mother, mother, stay beside me
For I must die, I must die.
I will join our beloved Otaki.
Do not cry, do not cry.
Be strong on the trail of sorrows
Though the months turn into years
But for me, this journey has ended
A trail of tears, trail of tears.

—Jeannie Hinck.

TRIBUTE TO GEN. DRAZA MIHAILOVICH

HON. PHILIP M. CRANE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 28, 1989

Mr. CRANE. Mr. Speaker, today I am reintroducing a bill that seeks to make amends, at least in part, for one of the great historical injustices of World War II.

Many of my colleagues may remember Gen. Draza Mihailovich of Yugoslavia, one of the foremost freedom fighters in the European resistance movement during World War II. As you may recall, Mihailovich and his Chetnik forces were directly responsible for saving the lives of some 500 American airmen forced down in Axis-controlled Yugoslavia. Despite the fact that he fought against the Nazis, Mihailovich, a victim of Communist propaganda, was executed as a war criminal by Tito's forces following the war.

The United States was in part responsible for the fate of General Mihailovich and the Chetnik forces when it elected to follow the British lead to support Tito. Recent evidence indicates that the decision made by the United States and the British was based on skewed intelligence reports submitted by Cambridge-recruited Soviet spies within the British military.

The bill that I am introducing authorizes the National Commission of American Airmen Rescued by General Mihailovich to establish a public monument to honor the general for his role in saving the lives of these U.S. airmen. The commission has agreed to finance the entire construction and maintenance of the monument.

It is only fitting that we honor this hero for his courage and undying support to the Allied cause. I urge you to join me in recognizing the valor of General Mihailovich.

INTRODUCTION OF THE U.S.-U.S.S.R. "PEACE" STAMP

HON. GEORGE J. HOCHBRUECKNER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 28, 1989

Mr. HOCHBRUECKNER. Mr. Speaker, in his farewell address, President Reagan talked about a new spirit of peacefulness that exists around the globe. Greater communication and openness between the United States and the Soviet Union has fostered improved relations and reduced tensions throughout the world. Talks between President Reagan and General Secretary Gorbachev often touched upon the need for greater openness and a freer exchange of people, information, and ideas. One of President Reagan's goals was to broaden people-to-people contacts between the United States and the U.S.S.R.

Today I am introducing a resolution calling on the Postmaster General of the United States to issue a stamp for use in international postage. The central element of this stamp would be the word "peace"—mir—written in English and in Russian. The resolution will also call on the Postmaster or his representative to negotiate with his counterpart in the Soviet Union for the purpose of issuing a similar postage stamp. The price of the U.S. stamp would be 45 cents, the minimum cost for international mail.

The peace stamp is an opportunity to open the lines of communication directly between our citizens and the people of the U.S.S.R. It is a chance to send to the people of the Soviet Union a simple message that they would easily understand—the message that the people of the United States have as their highest goal the continuation and improvement of the good relations we currently enjoy—a message of peace.

The peace stamp is a symbolic measure. But it is a positive and proactive symbol which can contribute to the momentum of increased communication, cooperation, and mutual understanding. Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the 16 of my colleagues who join me today as original cosponsors of this resolution. With their help, and with the support of Congress, I hope that the peace stamp will become a reality by the end of the 101st Congress.

LET'S REWRITE THE NAVAL HISTORY BOOKS

HON. FORTNEY PETE STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 28, 1989

Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, it is reported that last Wednesday, Rear Adm. Thomas A. Brooks, Director of Naval Intelligence, testified before a House Armed Services Subcommittee that the Soviet Navy has reduced its steaming hours and increased the amount of time it spends at anchor. This, he says, has also "increased the number of ships in port ready to respond to an enemy attack, thus improving the ability of the Soviet navy to transition rapidly to war."

You learn something new every day.

I always thought it was a mistake to have all those battleships tied up at Pearl Harbor. But the real mistake was not to have our Navy's four carriers also at anchor in the harbor.

And those historians who always rave about Winston Churchill having the foresight to have the British Fleet alert and at sea on August 1, 1914—they were all wet. Any fool can now see they should have been at anchor. That was the real way to bottle up the German Navy.

So many things I'll have to relearn. Obviously, Nelson was foolhardy to attack the enemy fleets in Copenhagan and Abukir Bay. And Dewey! Silly Dewey attacking the Spanish in Manila Harbor.

Now we will know when glasnost, détente, or whatever is really working: it is when the Soviet Navy leaves harbor and spends more time cruising off our coasts that we will know world tensions have eased.

Mr. Speaker, if one follows Admiral Brooks line of thinking far enough, I can only say, "Please Mr. Gorbachev, don't surrender, we couldn't afford the extra budget dollars our Navy would request."

THE FIRST-TIME HOMEBUYERS ASSISTANCE ACT

HON. CLAUDINE SCHNEIDER

OF RHODE ISLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 28, 1989

Ms. SCHNEIDER. Mr. Speaker, one of the most disturbing trends of the last decade has been the decline in the number of young families that can afford to purchase a home. Homeownership is the fundamental element of the American dream, but it is becoming increasingly difficult for young families to achieve. In 1973, 38.9 percent of young married couples owned homes. By 1987, that figure had dropped to only 29.1 percent.

The leading cause of this decline has been the difficulty with saving the money necessary for a down payment. Between 1975 and 1987, the median price of first homes increased over 92 percent. This has lead to a corresponding increase in the percentage of one's income needed for a down payment. In 1978, the average down payment absorbed one-third of a first-time homebuyer's yearly gross income. By 1985, that figure had reached one-half.

Today, I have reintroduced legislation designed to deal directly with this worrisome problem. The First-Time Homebuyers Assistance Act is targeted at moderate income families and individuals who have not previously owned a home. Applicants for this program will need to meet stringent eligibility requirements, including a consistent employment and rental history, and an excellent credit record.

Qualified families that are currently unable to generate sufficient cash to place a down payment on a home will be eligible for Government guaranteed insurance of 0 percent down payment mortgages. The First-Time Homebuyers Mortgage Insurance Fund will be established specifically for this program. The qualified applicants will pay an initial insurance premium of 1.5 percent of the mortgage amount, and monthly payments of 5 percent of the monthly mortgage payment to this fund.

My bill also contains provisions to ensure that all money appropriated by the U.S. Government will be returned to the Treasury with any earned interest, upon the decision of the Secretary of the Department of Housing and Urban Development that the fund is liquid. This will ensure that this program will be self-funding and cause the Government to lose no money.

The aim of this program is to incorporate more families into the American dream of homeownership. The principle beneficiaries of this program will be the people on the fringes of being able to afford a home.

DATELINE MONTREAL: UNITED STATES CALLS FOR TOUGHER AVIATION SECURITY STANDARDS TO COMBAT TERRORISM IN THE AIR

HON. WM. S. BROOMFIELD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 28, 1989

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to report that the administration has put the issue of tougher aviation security procedures on the front burner. I commend the administration and the Secretary of Transportation, Samuel K. Skinner, in particular, for their timely joint request, along with the United Kingdom, to hold an urgent session of the International Civil Aviation's Council in order to present a tough American formula for tightening up international aviation security. I understand that the Secretary's proposal was well received by the various ministers attending the ICAO meeting. I stand ready to assist the administration here in Congress in our Nation's war against terrorism in the skies.

My heart goes out to the families of the innocent victims of that barbaric terrorist attack. I can think of no more fitting tribute to those who perished than a rapid ICAO agreement calling for the implementation of those enhanced aviation security standards. We must do everything possible to ensure that tragic disasters of this nature will never happen again.

I commend the remarks of Secretary Skinner to my colleagues in the Congress who share my commitment to fighting the international menace of terrorism on the ground, sea and in the air.

REMARKS PREPARED FOR DELIVERY BY SECRETARY OF TRANSPORTATION SAMUEL K. SKINNER, INTERNATIONAL CIVIL AVIATION ORGANIZATION, MONTREAL, CANADA

Mr. President and distinguished members of the Council: Thank you for your prompt response to our joint request with the United Kingdom to hold this session of the Council.

It is truly an honor and unique opportunity to visit with my distinguished counterparts from other countries and Council members to discuss immediate steps we can take to eliminate terrorism in the skies.

I look forward to working closely with all of you here today and in the future to enhance the safety and security of international civil air transportation. First and foremost, let me stress the obvious—many can be proud of the world community's efforts to keep our skies safe. The dedicated women and men who screen the passenger, check the baggage, handle the cargo, and evaluate the threat, are to be commended for their vigilant efforts in carrying out their important mission. Generally air travel continues to be one of the safest forms of transportation. But we are not here to rest on our laurels or pat each other on the back. We can and must do more to counter the despicable acts of terrorists.

There is no question that citizens and carriers from all of our countries are potential targets of these barbaric acts of terrorism. Over 1,000 passengers on civilian aircraft from 14 different ICAO member states have fallen prey to sabotage in the last 10 years.

None of us here today knows which carriers or airports will become targets next year, or the year after. No one country or carrier should have to stand alone in matters of security. It is only by joining together, in the finest traditions of ICAO, that we can secure international civil aviation from acts of terrorism.

As you recall, the presence of ministers in the Council is not new. In 1985, ministers from my government and two others addressed the Council and urged ICAO to take action to thwart unlawful acts against civil aviation. Swift action was taken as ICAO adopted a set of measures that significantly improved security practices, especially relating to hijacking. The presence of so many ministers in today's session gives me great hope that much more will be done. We cannot afford to wait 6 months, 12 months or 3 years to address this problem; the time for action is now.

Clearly, more must be done. Over the past decade, we have experienced a disturbing increase in international terrorism for which civil aviation seems to have become a favorite target. This problem has unquestionably become an international concern. Since 1979 there have been twenty-one explosions aboard civil airliners from fourteen different ICAO member states, resulting in 867 deaths and 174 injuries.

In the last four years there have been four acts of sabotage against international flights: Air India Flight 182 was destroyed in 1985, with the loss of all 329 passengers and crew; Trans World Airways Flight 840 suffered an explosion in 1986 resulting in the deaths of four passengers; and Korean airways Flight 858 was destroyed in 1987, with the loss of all 115 passengers and crew. The destruction of Pan American World Airways Flight 103 on December 21, 1988, which resulted in the deaths of 259 passengers and crew and 11 persons on the ground, was the fourth and the most recent of these tragic incidents. It has demonstrated with shocking clarity the sophistication of terrorist capabilities, and has focused the attention of the world on the problem of terrorist and criminal acts directed against international civil aviation.

I know all of you will join with me in extending our deepest sympathy to the families and friends of all those who have lost their lives, both in the air and on the ground, as a result of these terrible acts, including the most recent act carried out against Pan American Flight 103.

We urge all Council members to condemn such barbaric acts and to take immediate steps to enhance security—we must act now to eradicate this global menace. While we do not want to overlook the important progress that ICAO has made in aviation security, we must take stronger and swifter measures to combat terrorism in the skies.

The United States is determined to assume its share of the burden in the struggle against terrorism. In the wake of Pan American Flight 103, our Federal Aviation Administration (FAA) took decisive action to tighten security requirements on United States air carriers operating out of airports in Western Europe and the Middle East. We have also enhanced security at U.S. airports. We are examining further measures that can be taken on a global basis to enhance security while respecting sovereignty. It is our hope, however, that ICAO, as it has in the past, will take a leadership role and adopt a unified approach to aviation security. There must be a coordinated international effort to increase aviation security. While each country must bear its own burden, we must recognize that the terrorist threat is a global one, and that alleviating the problem in one place will only cause it to appear in another.

ICAO has risen many times to combat unlawful acts against international civil aviation and in the face of this common threat, Mr. President, I urge ICAO and its member states to once again join together and redouble their efforts. New, concrete actions must be taken.

The United States considers Annex 17 to the Convention on International Civil Aviation to be a fundamentally sound document. However, we believe Annex 17 must be strengthened on two distinct but related levels. First, standards, recommended practices and guidance material applicable to all international civil aviation operations must be improved by making existing standards more explicit, adding new standards, and elevating certain recommended practices to standards.

But we do not believe this is enough. Many countries, airports and air carriers are periodically faced with situations of greater security threats that require measures beyond those appropriate for normal international operations. We believe it essential that once a high-risk situation has been identified by states, either individually or in concert, all carriers and facilities subject to these higher threats should be uniformaly subject to strengthened security requirements. We therefore also urge that a set of additional Standards and Recommended Practices be developed for uniform application to operations assessed as being subject to high risk.

Mr. President, it is the view of my Government that the Council should take specfic action now to develop an effective response to this critical problem. We should specify where improvements in existing Standards and Recommended Practices might be considered, particularly to prevent acts of sabotage, and particularly for operations assessed as being subject to high risk. Some of the more important improvements should be:

Additional and comprehensive screening for passengers and carry-on articles;

More thorough screening of checked baggage through X-ray and other techniques;

Better reconciliation of passengers and checked baggage;

More comprehensive screening of cargo and mail;

Expedite development and implementation of state-of-the-art screening technology;

Tighter control of access to areas where aircraft, cargo, and baggage are handled; and

A review of the problems posed by allowing electronic devices, such as computers and radios; on board aircraft.

We also believe that ICAO's role should not be limited to improving Annex 17, but that our technical and policy expert should discuss the full panoply of areas where we can enhance security.

Of course, Mr. President and distinguished Council members, the success of this organization depends in the end on the will of its members. I therefore urge member states to intensify their efforts in implementing the existing Standards and Recommended Practices in Annex 17 and to commit themselves to implement any new or strengthened provisions as soon a they are approved by ICAO, and to cooperate in applying uniformly any of those additional measures designed to deal with operations assessed as being subject to high risk. We appreciate fully that addressing increased security threats may require additional resources. The United States is committed to working with our fellow ICAO member states to this end.

Of course, we should not forget that Annex 17 already allows states to impose additional measures in response to higher-threat situations, and I urge member states to review the current situation and consider in cooperation with other states what appropriate interim measures could be imposed immediately and unformly to operations subjected to high degrees of threat.

I'd like to support the remarks of my distinguished colleague from the United Kingdom. We concur in the need for urgent future action which would rededicate the efforts of this Organization to ensure international civil aviation security. As my British colleague has stated, we have consulted extensively with Council members over the past two weeks. We of course remain open to further constructive dialogue on this matter.

Mr. President and distinguished members of the Council, people around the world are calling for leadership and decisive action to eliminate the gruesome, common threat of terrorism in the skies. We owe it to them, and to the families and loved ones of all who have suffered from these despicable and cowardly acts, to meet this problem head on by raising civil aviation security standards. That is why this gathering is a unique event in ICAO's history, and is a unique opportunity for us all to stand together in the fight against terrorism and against unlawful acts against international civil aviation. I look forward to working with all of you to bring about quick and concrete action to achieve that end.

The United States greatly appreciates ICAO's continuing leadership in international aviation, and the opportunity to address this distinguished forum.

Thank you.

THE ASSAULT WEAPON IMPORT CONTROL ACT OF 1989

HON. SAM GIBBONS

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 28, 1989

Mr. GIBBONS. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation that would ban the importation of semiautomatic assault weapons and certain accessories into the United States

As my colleagues well know, my overriding goal as chairman of the Ways and Means Subcommittee on Trade has been to expand international trade and investment by keeping markets free, open and competitive. I usually oppose trade restrictive actions and the economic use of sanctions. However, one area I cannot tolerate is the continued importation of semiautomatic assault weapons into the United States.

Nationwide, law-abiding citizens and law enforcement personnel are faced with the frightening prospect of a spiraling domestic arms race. This race is prompted largely by the flood of these assault-type weapons into the country. Imports of cheap AK47 assault rifles alone, such as those used in U.S. drug and gang killings and in a California school yard massacre, have seen a tenfold increase in sales in this country in the last 4 years. As a result of their widespread availability and remarkably low cost, these semiautomatic firearms have fast become a "weapon of choice" among drug dealers in the United States.

Just last week, the Virginia legislature took a courageous step in its efforts to stem the indiscriminate sale of semiautomatic weapons by requiring a check of all would-be buyers. Other States, emboldened by calls for action by citizens and law enforcement groups, are considering other measures to slow down the sales and use of these deadly weapons in their jurisdictions. Congress can ill-afford to remain silent on this issue. We must act now to support State initiatives by providing Federal protections against the unchecked flood of these weapons into domestic markets.

On February 8, Senator METZENBAUM, together with three of his colleagues, introduced a comprehensive legislative proposal to ban the manufacture, importation, possession and transfer of new assault weapons. As chairman of the Ways and Means Subcommittee on Trade, I am proud to sponsor this complementary initiative which specifically targets the issue of imports.

This legislation would prohibit the importation into the United States of any assault weapon, large capacity magazine, or large capacity ammunition belt, excepting any importation under the authority of the United States or by any department or agency of any State or political subdivision thereof. This legislation is limited to a specific list of the most dangerous semiautomatic military weapons now available and to firearms with large fixed magazines. Although more narrow in scope than S. 386, this bill, if enacted, would attack the proliferation of these weapons in the United States at the source.

The semiautomatic assault weapons and accessories covered by this legislation are not used for any economically viable purpose. They are not designed for the principal purpose of hunting game and recreational sport. They are, instead, designed to kill human beings and are being used more and more frequently by drug gangs and for other criminal activity throughout this country.

I believe that a total ban on the import of these products is justified and urge my colleagues in Congress to work with me towards that end.

UNFAIR TAXATION OF BANK DEPOSITS

HON. CARROLL HUBBARD, JR.

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 28, 1989

Mr. HUBBARD. Mr. Speaker, I received a February 4, 1989, letter from Charles Beach, Jr., president of Peoples Exchange Bank in Beattyville, KY, which I encourage my colleagues to read.

Charlie Beach is a highly respected friend whose opinions and comments I value and admire. A short time ago certain administration officials were promoting the idea of taxing bank deposits in order to raise funds needed to pay off the $100 billion deficit in the FSLIC deposit fund.

I believe my colleagues will be interested in the excellent views of Charles Beach, Jr., about this idea. A copy of his timely letter follows:

FEBRUARY 4, 1989.

Hon. CARROLL HUBBARD, Jr.,
U.S. Congressman, Rayburn Building, Washington, DC.

DEAR CARROLL: That proposal to raise funds to pay off the $100 Billion loss created by the Savings and Loan Association by taxing bank deposits is the most unconscionable, reprehensive and discriminatory tax that has been proposed in the past two decades. Economists and knowledgeable financial experts lament that our national debt is not only at an all time high but our personal debt is equally at an alarmingly maximum level. This tax would penalize the saver and encourage the borrower.

Why should commercial banks be forced to bail out our competitor? Why are not deposit taxes applicable to credit unions, mutual funds and other depository institutions?

Unfortunately, it appears that Congress lacks the courage to implement a simplistic sales tax wherein all people would share equally, but continue to target a special segment of our society to pay for the sins and errant ways of others.

I am willing to pay my share. However, the threat of increasing our FDIC insurance premium or taxing deposits is an absolutely ridiculous, unacceptable and abominable proposal. Your support in defeating this would be greatly appreciated.

Sincerely,

C. BEACH, Jr.,
President, Peoples Exchange Bank, Beattyville, KY.

MAXWELL E. GREENBERG TO RECEIVE THE MAIMONIDES TORCH OF JUSTICE AWARD

HON. MEL LEVINE

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 28, 1989

Mr. LEVINE of California. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to report to my colleagues that Maxwell E. Greenberg will receive the Maimonides Torch of Justice Award on March 7, 1989, from the legal services division of the United Jewish Fund.

The Maimonides Award to Mr. Greenberg is being given in recognition of his distinguished commitment to community service and of his activities as an exemplary attorney. Throughout his career, Mr. Greenberg has consistently served as a role model for his fellow attorneys in his dedication to the Jewish community and the community at large.

Max Greenberg's distinguished career includes numerous accomplishments and honors, both as a lawyer and as a national and local community leader. He has served as the national chairman of the Anti-Defamation League of the B'nai B'rith and is now honorary chairman. Max has also served as a vice president of the Jewish Federation Council and is currently a member of its board of governors. In addition, he has held the posts of vice president of the police commission for the city of Los Angeles and chairman of the board of the Rural Development Corp.

Although a complete listing of Max Greenberg's honors and awards would exhaust several pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I especially want to compliment him on his six spectacular grandchildren, Aaron, Benjamin, and Coby Greenberg, and Adam, Jake, and Cara Levine, who have a direct and intimate relationship with the Representative from California currently addressing this House.

ARC SPELLS RELIEF

HON. NICK JOE RAHALL II

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 28, 1989

Mr. RAHALL. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to introduce today two pieces of legislation which I believe are crucial to the economic revitalization of Appalachia. The first would reauthorize the Appalachian Regional Commission for 5 years at $185 million per year. The second would authorize the use of highway trust fund dollars for the completion of the Appalachian Corridor System.

The ARC was started in 1965 to address the unique socioeconomic needs of the Appalachian region. This area is a 195,000-squares mile region that follows the spine of the Appalachian Mountains from southern New York to northern Mississippi. All of my home State of West Virginia is included in the region, as well as parts of 12 other States.

The ARC has done much to fight the harsh, debilitating effects of poverty in this area through a variety of health and education programs and has played a critical role in the economic development of Appalachia. Much remains to be done, however, as many in Appalachia continue to struggle under lingering high unemployment in depressed economies.

A major component of the ARC has been its highway program. The Appalachian Corridor System is a network of 3,034 miles of roads which is only approximately two-thirds complete. Obviously these roads are crucial to the economic development of Appalachia. However, at current funding levels, the construction of the corridor system will not be finished until at least 2065. One only has to travel in my home State of West Virginia to realize the importance of the timely completion of these highways. Corridor G, which runs from Charleston to the State line at Williamson, will eventually be 80 miles in length. Two segments of the road, totaling 19 miles, remain incomplete and at current levels of funding will not be finished for another 25 years. These two segments are needed to link Corridor G with Logan and Williamson, two vital communities in southern West Virginia. My goal with this legislation is to provide the necessary funding to ensure completion of the entire system by the year 2000.

To meet that goal, the ARC itself must be funded at an adequate level. My bill will do that. Of the $185 million authorized each year, $144 would be dedicated to the corridor system. The remaining funds would go to other programs already in place. Additionally, my second bill would authorize the use of $287 million each year for 5 years from the highway trust fund for use in construction of the corridors. This trust fund money would be in addition to the annual Federal highway allocation currently received by the States. However, States would have to make some tough choices if they want to take advantage of this program. While 20 percent of a State's annual funding would come from the ARC, the State would have to put in 20 percent of its own funding in addition to 20 percent from its annual highway trust fund allocation. The remaining 40 percent of the formula would be made up of a trust fund matching bonus, a 2-to-1 match triggered by the funds committed from a State's annual Federal highway allocation.

It is important to note that participation in this program would not be mandatory for the Appalachian States. Because it calls for hard choices between corridor completion and other highway needs, some States may elect to forgo the program.

Support for these bills has been overwhelming in my home State of West Virginia. Our newly elected Governor, Gaston Caperton, has already pledged that the State will meet its obligations under this legislation. Additionally, during a meeting of the Appalachian Governors this past Sunday, a resolution in support of these bills was approved overwhelmingly by the Governors. And finally, my colleagues in the West Virginia House delegation fully support these proposals and have joined me as original cosponsors.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to carefully consider this important legislation. I think we can all agree that we have a pressing obligation to complete this federally mandated highway system in a timely manner.

TAX FAIRNESS FOR FARM AND OTHER SMALL BUSINESS FAMILIES

HON. LEON E. PANETTA

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 28, 1989

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Speaker, I am reintroducing legislation today which would address an inconsistency in the U.S. Tax Code with regard to families who inherit a family farm or business.

Section 2032A of the code permits an heir to reduce the estate tax burden on a family farm or business if the property was being used for that purpose by the decedent and it was passed on to a family member who continues to participate in running the operation. Under this provision, the property is valued, for determining the estate tax, as a business or farm instead of at fair market value. There are set dollar limits on how much a family can reduce their estate tax burden by using this method.

If the heir sells the property to a nonfamily member or stops participating in running the business, or if the property is not used as a farm or business, the benefits of the estate tax cut are lost, and additional tax must be paid.

Another Tax Code provision, section 6166, permits the estate tax burden on a small business or farm, regardless of who inherits and runs it, to be spread over a 15-year period.

However, there is an inconsistency in present law which can harm family members utilizing section 2032A, and that inconsistency is what my bill is intended to correct.

Under section 2032A, if the heir sells or gives the property to another family member who also would have been an eligible heir under the provision, the benefits of the provision—the lower property valuation—continue.

However, if this occurs, the benefits of the 15-year payments do not continue. The tax must be paid in full immediately. This is because the benefits of section 6166 do not continue if the property is transferred from the original heir, regardless of whether the parties are related to the decedent.

Mr. Speaker, this does not seem fair to me. Obviously, in enacting section 2032A, Congress decided to encourage the continuation of family farms and businesses. I strongly support that goal, and I believe Congress still supports it. But in this instance, we are discouraging the transference of the farm or business to an heir who is a family member and is going to continue operating it. And if we are discouraging that, then we are encouraging the sale of the property to a third party, and probably bringing about the end of a family farm or business.

I do not oppose the general restriction of section 6166 to the original heir. However, in this particular instance, it contradicts the intention of Congress to encourage families to continue running their farms and businesses.

Under the legislation I am introducing today, section 6166 would be amended to permit the 15-year payments to continue if the property is transferred, but only if the property has been covered by section 2032A and is transferred to another direct family member of the decedent who still qualifies for section 2032A and is transferred to another direct family member of the decedent who still qualifies for section 2032A. So rather than have to pay the estate tax immediately, the family member could continue the 15-year schedule of payments. All others taking advantage of section 6166 would still be required to pay their estate tax immediately in that event of a transfer.

Mr. Speaker, my colleagues are well aware of the difficulties faced by family farms and businesses in recent years. We have attempted to address one aspect of their problems by enacting special provisions designed to ease their estate tax burden. By approving this bill, we can remove a serious inconsistency in those provisions and continue to encourage the institution of the family farm and the family business.

Following is the text of my bill:

H.R. 1162 a bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 to provide that the extension of time for payment of the estate tax on property valued under section 2032A of such Code shall not be terminated by reason of a disposition of the property to a member of the qualified heir's family

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. DISPOSITION OF SPECIALLY VALUED PROPERTY TO MEMBER OF QUALIFIED HEIR'S FAMILY NOT TO RESULT IN ACCELERATION OF DEFERRED ESTATE TAX.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Paragraph (1) of section 6166(g) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 (relating to acceleration of payment) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subparagraph:

"(G) EXCEPTION FOR CERTAIN DISPOSITIONS OF PROPERTY VALUED UNDER SECTION 2032A.—

"(i) IN GENERAL.—Subparagraph (A)(i) shall not apply to a disposition of property if—

"(I) the value of such property for purposes of chapter 11 was determined under section 2032A, and

"(II) such disposition is to a member of the family (as defined in section 2032A(e)(2)) of the qualified heir (as defined in section 2032A(e)(1)).

"(ii) CESSATION OF QUALIFIED USE TREATED AS DISPOSITION.—If—

"(I) subparagraph (A)(i) did not apply to a disposition to an individual by reason of clause (i) of this subparagraph, and

"(II) an additional estate tax is imposed by section 2032A(c)(1) by reason of a cessation (described in section 2032A(c)(1)(B)) by such individual, such cessation shall be treated for purposes of this section as a disposition to which subparagraph (A)(i) applies."

(b) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendment made by subsection (a) shall apply to estates of decedents dying after the date of the enactment of this Act.

LONG-TERM HEALTH CARE

HON. BILL EMERSON

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 28, 1989

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Speaker, one of the subjects about which we are all receiving a great deal of mail these days is the problem of financing long-term health care. There is a need. Everyone recognizes the need, but there seems to be few available solutions, considering the deficit problems facing the Congress and the country. How to finance long-term health care is a subject about which Washington is abuzz these days. We need all of the ideas on the table that we can get.

In this regard, Mr. Donald C. Evans, Jr., a lawyer/lobbyist—with no personal financial interest in this subject—has written an article with a proposal for a solution to this problem. Mr. Evans has an extensive background in government service, business, and the law and offers his perspective of one approach we may consider. It is not necessarily all-inclusive. Perhaps the comprehensive solution may be found in components. I lay his proposed solution on the table because I think it is innovative and though provoking; and I invite others to share with us their thoughts on this subject that is vital to the well-being of all Americans who wish to live a long life free of the problems of how they may pay for illness in their retirement years.

A NO-COST SOLUTION TO THE TREASURY—THE LONG-TERM HEALTH CARE FINANCING PROBLEM

(By Donald C. Evans, Jr.)

There is no denying the fact that a serious problem exists for any American involved with long-term health care, be it a nursing home or other facility. Too often paying for this care results in the total exhaustion of all savings and other assets painstakingly accumulated over a lifetime of hard work. This becomes a problem for the next generation as well because their children find themselves trying to find money to make sure their parents are cared for with dignity. National leaders declare this to be a problem which must be addressed. It has been called the most pressing issue of the elderly, even more so than the catastrophic health issue. Some in Congress have called on their colleagues to immediately address this problem. The major stumbling block arises when the question of financing is discussed.

Dr. Otis Bowen, as President Reagan's Secretary of Health and Human Services, attempted to meet this problem by suggesting that Congress adopt a new income tax deduction for contributions into an individual medical account, a system of savings similar to the present IRA accounts used for retirement. One problem with the Bowen approach is timing. It requires years for the accumulation of enough capital in these accounts to make a significant dent in solving an urgent present day problem. Those who can avail themselves of this approach will more likely be middle and upper income workers whose discretionary income is greater than that of the working poor and lower middle class. Secondly, the Bowen plan results in an immediate loss of significant amounts of revenue to the Federal Government at a time when the Budget deficit is a primary concern to all Americans.

Others have proposed putting another Federal spending program in place to solve the problem, perhaps by expanding Medicare. Even with pay-as-you-go growing in popularity among politicians in Washington, the American people don't seem to be inclined to support a major tax increase to pay for a new spending program, even one as worthy as this. Budget constraints have caused leading politicians in our country to sense an up-hill fight for a solution to the long-term health care problem in the next two years.

However, there is a plan Congress can adopt today which will protect against disastrous long-term health care costs. And it won't cost the Federal Government one nickel nor increase the Federal deficit. Antidiscrimination provisions already in the law make the same coverage immediatley available to workers of all income levels at the same affordable cost. It is equally available to the young person just entering the work force and the older worker approaching retirement. The plan works through the private sector without spending more money for government bureaucracy to administer another Federal program.

I propose to allow the use of private pension funds for the purchase of long-term care insurance policies. Presently, the tax law requires a pension plan to invest in assets that will grow in value or produce income that will fund the retirement benefits of the workers covered by the plan. An exception to this is where a worker can choose to have some of the plan assets attributable to his own account used to pay the premium on a life insurance policy on his life. The rationale for this exception is that the pension assets, which will include the insurance proceeds at his death, will be used for a recognized retirement goal—to support the worker's beneficiaries, usually the spouse and children, after the worker's death. To allow the use of these pension assets to purchase individual and group long-term care policies in order to protect the assets of the worker against total dissipation due to long-term care costs is just as retirement oriented a goal as that which is already allowed by the law—it protects the worker and his family during a time after he is unable to work.

Nearly half the civilian work force is presently covered by pension plans. Presently, there are only about 18,000 group long-term care policies out of the more than 500,000 existing policies (the rest are held by individuals). This plan will immediately open coverage to millions of workers. Congress only needs to authorize the pension plans to move ahead and we will take a giant step toward solving this national problem. Let's act now!

THE U.N. AND THE U.S. CONTRIBUTION

HON. PHILIP M. CRANE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 28, 1989

Mr. CRANE. Mr. Speaker, in spite of the lofty and abundant expectations that accompanied the founding of the United Nations in 1945, that organization has failed in many ways to live up to its charter. Many Americans held out great hope that this organization would help usher an era of peace, brotherhood, and tranquility into the affairs of men and nations. But this has not been the case. The United Nations has been guilty, in recent years, of maintaining a hypocritical double standard at the expense of both Western democracies and the U.N. Charter. And the United States percentage of contributions to the United Nations has ranged between 16 percent to 26 percent, making the pain of this double standard that much more difficult for Americans to bear.

At the very least, I think it is imperative that we reevaluate our financial contributions to that organization. A new contribution formula, one which would be fair to both the United States and other member nations, must be implemented. That is why I have introduced legislation to reduce our financial contribution from its disproportionately high percentage to a more realistic level of 5.6 percent. The latter figure is arrived at by shifting the contribution formula from one based on national income to one based on the population of member nations. Such a move would force Communist and Third World countries to shoulder a more proportionate and hence fairer share of the U.N. budget.

If we continue to pay an unduly large share of the U.N. expenses each year while other nations pay relatively little, we can only expect an increase in the hyprocrisy that has marked U.N. sessions in recent years. Criticism continues to be put on the United States and other Western democracies and we continue to pay for the right to listen to it. As one seasoned U.N. observer aptly noted:

Now I don't like antidemocratic organization, but I am prepared to accept their existence—so long as I don't have to pay for their fun and games.

I hope that my colleagues will join me in introducing a new level of realism into our contribution to the United Nations by cosponsoring this piece of legislation.

THE TRAGEDY OF THE ETHNIC ALBANIAN COMMUNITY IN YUGOSLAVIA

HON. WM. S. BROOMFIELD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 28, 1989

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, once again, I have to call to the attention of the Congress to the eroding human rights position of the ethnic Albanian community in Yugoslavia. I am deeply concerned that violence may break out in that country and that the Albanian minority will be targeted. Now is the time for our Government to let Yugoslav officials know that we are deeply concerned about human rights violations in that country and that we will not sit idly by and watch the persecution of a small minority in Yugoslavia. In the name of human dignity, the human rights of the Albanian community in Yugoslavia must be protected. I hope that Belgrade is listening.

I fully appreciate the multiethnic nature of modern Yugoslavia. That country is an amalgam of many ethnic groups who have, over the years, established a modus vivendi and are trying to work together to maintain the cohesiveness of that country. Nobody wants Yugoslavia to disintegrate. It is essential, however, for Yugoslav authorities to protect the human rights of that country's many ethnic groups.

I first became aware of the human rights problem in Yugoslavia when a young Michigan resident, and naturalized United States citizen, Pjeter Ivezaj, traveled to Yugoslavia to visit his family. After being harassed by Yugoslav police agents, he was detained for a long period without being officially charged. He was then put on trial and charged with having demonstrated in front of the Yugoslav Embassy in Washington in 1981. I worked closely with our Ambassador in Belgrade in an effort to win Pjeter's release. Later, I introduced legislation expressing the sense of the Congress that most-favored-nation trading status be denied to Yugoslav products coming to the United States market. Congressional intent obviously caught the attention of Yugoslav officials who had just given Mr. Ivezaj a long 7-year prison sentence. Pjeter was soon released, and is now in Sterling Heights with his family.

That unfortunate incident clearly underscores the serious human rights problems in that society. Recently, rising Serbian nationalism in Kosovo has taken on a particularly anti-Albanian tone. Serbians, the dominant group in Yugoslavia, have even accused ethnic Albanians of forcing them out of Kosovo. Tensions have mounted between the two ethnic groups in that province and a number of incidents have erupted. Since the release of Pjeter, the human rights situation for the ethnic community in Kosovo has seriously eroded.

In recent weeks, Albanian miners in the Trepce zinc mine in Kosovo went on strike to protest discrimination and oppression by the Serbian authorities against the Albanians in Kosovo. The Serbians are reportedly trying to change the autonomous status of Kosovo by placing that province under the complete control of the government of the Serbian Republic. The strike action allegedly spread to other mines and factories and 7,000 students left the University of Pristina in order to protest the human rights violations in the province. The miners, who just ended their strike, also appealed to the United Nations and asked that world body to protect the human and constitutional rights of the Albanians in Kosovo.

I understand that troops and tanks have been sent to Kosovo and that threats of violence had been made against the miners by Yugoslav military officials. I fear a repetition of the violent events of 1981 which resulted in many deaths and injuries to ethnic Albanians.

The ongoing human rights violations in that country, the recently organized strikes and the possibility of military intervention in Kosovo are serious developments which distrub me. I see the situation in Kosovo coming to a full boil and ready to erupt at any moment. I trust that our Government will do all that it can to encourge Yugoslav authorities to restore peace to that area and to guarantee that the human rights of all ethnic groups in Kosovo are respected. It is essential that the security and political integrity of that country be maintained. While I encourage our Government to improve United States-Yugoslav relations, existing ties will certainly be damaged if Yugoslav officials allow anti-Albanian violence to bring more bloodshed to that province.

A THOUGHTFUL APPROACH TO NEW FARM POLICY

HON. ROBERT W. KASTENMEIER

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 28, 1989

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join today with my friend and colleague from Wisconsin, Representative OBEY, in introducing a package of three bills aimed at enhancing the ability of American dairy farmers to continue to produce ample supplies of quality dairy products at reasonable prices.

In the mid-1980's, the dairy industry experienced a period of surplus production that led to Government purchases of dairy products at unsustainable levels. The response to that situation has been to continually lower the price farmers receive for their milk in the expectation that farmers will then produce less milk and there will be fewer dairy products for the Government to buy.

In reality, dairy farmers do not decide to cut back on their production because the price they get is lower. They have debts to pay, and they will increase their production if their unit price is lowered. The only way that a cut in the price of milk lowers production is by forcing dairy farmers who cannot survive at the lower prices into bankruptcy. Such a policy represents government at its cruelest.

The Bush administration is expected to follow the existing policy. In addition, it is expected to continue to pursue an end to agricultural trade barriers as part of the GATT negotiations. These policies forebode an era of ever decreasing milk returns for farmers, accelerated consolidation of dairy farms as individual farmers go bankrupt, and an increasing strain on rural economies as many farmers are replaced by few farmers.

In light of looming budgetary constraints, the Congress appears to be in a go-along-to-get-along frame of mind on these policies. The dismantling of current dairy programs appears to be considered somewhat inevitable.

We challenge that concept and ask our colleagues why such policies make sense. The goal of current dairy policy is to deliver to consumers a steady supply of quality dairy products at a reasonable price. The industry has consistently performed that task. No one would challenge the quality or variety of dairy products available in our stores. The price of those products has, year in and year out, increased less rapidly than the Consumer Price Index and the price of almost all other food products. The only problem we have seen has been costly purchases by the Federal Government.

There are alternative dairy policies that would continue to provide inexpensive, quality dairy products without costing the Government. A variety of supply management options have been utilized in the past to ensure that, rather than storing dairy products for which there is no demand, the products are not produced in the first place.

We are today reintroducing one such supply management bill as an option to be considered by the House Agriculture Committee and the Congress as a whole. The 'Milk Marketing Supply Management Act of 1989 would institute a two-tiered pricing plan whereby farmers would receive only one-fourth of the support price for milk produced in excess of their base production allotment established using historical production trends.

Some argue that this program would be cumbersome to administer. And yet, we already have grain programs in this country that require farmers to reduce their production by specific levels each year.

Others are concerned that the establishment of bases for milk production will make it impossible for new farmers to get into dairying. This bill, however, contains specific provisions for the allotting shares of the national base to new farmers on an annual basis.

But the major advantage of the legislation would be that it would eliminate costly Government purchasing and storage of dairy products by seeing to it that surplus milk is not produced. And, a consumption trends increase in the future, it would allow production to also expand to meet market demands.

Dairy farmers have been coping with a depressed dairy industry as we have pursued the ever lower price policy. No where have dairy farmers been suffering worse than in the traditional heartland of milk production: the upper Midwest generally and Wisconsin specifically.

As I have stated, the goal of the 1985 farm bill was to discourage production by decreasing price. However, that legislation contained within it the first ever legislated increases in market order differentials for 36 of the 44 Federal milk market orders. Those 36 orders were, of course, located away from the upper Midwest. These differential increases raised the price that farmers in those areas receive for their milk. That represented an incentive for increased production in some parts of the country that ran contrary to the decreased production goal of the bill. And if left Wisconsin dairy farmers at an extreme disadvantage.

In the last year, both the GAO and USDA have conducted investigations into the milk market order and have concluded that the differential increases need to be reconsidered. More significantly, they have both recommended that the market order system needs to be restructured with an eye toward consolidating market orders and/or establishing multiple basing points for the pricing of milk.

Clearly, we need to move along those lines. Thus, we are introducing today the Milk Market Order Consolidation Act of 1989. This legislation instructs the Secretary of Agriculture to propose and conduct a dairy farmer referendum on a single, nationwide milk market order.

Finally, we are introducing a third bill to eliminate the authority of the Secretary of Agriculture to impose 50-cent cuts in the support price for milk every January 1. The dairy price has fallen far enough. Further cuts will not cause farmers to trim back their production, they will throw families off of dairy farms and into bankruptcy. We need to act on dairy policy. But simply cutting the price for milk will not achieve any of the goals we desire.

It is my hope that the Congress will move quickly this year to consider a new farm program. The budget constraints we will be facing are likely to force scaled back spending on farm programs. The wise way to approach that situation is to have the Agriculture Committee proceed quickly with a thoughtful approach to our farm policy. The imprudent alternative is to wait for the budget process to force farm policy changes conceived without the careful consideration our farmers deserve.

CONGRESSIONAL MEDALS OF HONOR FOR HENRY JOHNSON AND DORRIS MILLER

HON. MICKEY LELAND

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 28, 1989

Mr. LELAND. Mr. Speaker, today Congressmen HUNTER, MCNULTY, and I are introducing legislation to properly commemorate the heroic deeds of two outstanding veterans, Henry Johnson and Dorris Miller, by posthumously awarding each a Congressional Medal of Honor.

During World War I, Sgt. Henry Johnson served in the 369th Infantry assigned to a French division. When, on one fateful night his company was attacked by 12 Germans, Johnson killed 4 of the enemy, rescued a wounded comrade, captured a stockpile of enemy arms, and thus repelled the attack. Notwithstanding gunshot and grenade wounds, Sergeant Johnson managed to rescue his fellow soldiers.

Later in World War II, Dorris Miller showed similar courage. His contributions were clearly exemplary given that he was not trained as a combat soldier, but rather, as a mess steward. Seaman Miller was assigned to the U.S.S. West Virginia when the Japanese attacked Pearl Harbor. Under serious enemy fire, Miller assisted his mortally wounded captain to safety and then manned a machine gun and successfully downed enemy aircraft.

At the time of their heroics, no black servicemen were awarded Medals of Honor for their actions. Of the approximately 1,500,000 blacks who served in the Armed Forces during WW I and WW II, not a single black soldier received a Medal of Honor. These numbers reflect the sad state of race relations in our country at the time.

Johnson was assigned to a segregated division in the Army which was under French command. Miller was a mess steward not because of his limited aspirations, but because that was the only option for blacks. Nevertheless, Johnson and Miller refused to accept the limited roles afforded black men in the service. Unfortunately, the times did not lend themselves to the proper honor for the two men.

Why have Johnson and Miller not been properly honored today, in 1989? Surely our society is more enlightened, more egalitarian. We have indeed made great strides against racial bigotry. The armed services have gone to great lengths to promote equal treatment of minorities at all levels of the military. Because of DOD's stated commitment to equality, one might become perplexed by the Army's and Navy's decision not to support efforts to properly honor Johnson and Miller.

Last year, the Army and Navy indicated that awarding a medal to these two servicemen would do a disservice to other servicemen who may have qualified for the award. Consequently, former Secretary of Defense Frank Carlucci instructed the Army and Navy to examine WW I and WW II records, respectfully, in order to identify other possible recipients. Although this review is most welcomed, the services must diligently work to ensure that a comprehensive and thorough review is executed.

The Army and Navy have expressed concern that awarding the decoration to Johnson and Miller could diminish the award's honor and prestige. The facts, however, speak for themselves. Johnson and Miller clearly demonstrated a commitment beyond the call of duty. While France has awarded its highest honor to Johnson, and the Navy has presented Miller with the Navy Cross, this is not sufficient.

While we have, for better or worse, inherited the actions of the past, we are not bound by them. We simply ask that this country properly recognize these two veterans. Had these men acted in Korea or Vietnam, they most certainly would have received at the very least consideration for the Medal of Honor. They did not; they had the misfortune of serving at a time when such consideration was unlikely. The fact that they are so obviously deserving sets them apart from others and warrants special consideration. The bills we introduce today waive the statute of limitations so that they may be properly considered and eventually receive an award.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my former colleague, Congressman DIOGUARDI, for introducing these bills in the 100th Congress and for his tireless efforts to secure their passage. It is my hope that these efforts will reach fruition in this Congress. Finally, I am submitting for the RECORD House Concurrent Resolution 22 which expresses the Texas Legislature's support for Seaman Miller's award.

HOUSE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 22

Whereas, the Texas Legislature is proud to add its support for congressional legislation providing that the Congressional Medal of Honor be awarded posthumously to Dorris "Dorrie" Miller for exceptional acts of bravey during World War II; and

Whereas, on December 7, 1941, Mr. Miller a black man, was stationed at Pearl Harbor aboard the U.S.S. West Virginia when the ship came under attack by Japanese aircraft; a native of Waco, Texas, the young seaman was enlisted as a mess steward, the only duty then available to blacks in the Navy; and

Whereas, with his ship's captain severely wounded, Seaman Miller risked his own life to drag the injured officer to a safer location where he could continue to receive reports and issue commands; when the captain eventually lost consciousness, Miller bravely manned one of the ship's machine guns; and

Whereas, although he had no prior training in machine gun operation, the courageous young seaman managed to down two Japanese planes before he was ordered to abandon the sinking vessel; and

Whereas, in 1943, Dorris Miller was killed along with 700 of his crewmen when a Japanese torpedo sank the light aircraft carrier on which he was serving; and

Whereas, although Seaman Miller's actions were undeniably heroic, the racial climate of the era prevented his heroism from being fully recognized; although a total of 167,000 blacks served in the Navy during World War II, by the end of the war fully 90 percent were still serving as mess stewards; moreover, no black soldier was awarded the Congressional Medal of Honor, our nation's highest accolade, during either World War I or II; and

Whereas, in Seaman Miller's case, his remarkable actions were not disclosed until weeks after the attack and were initially acknowledged with only a letter of commendation; in May 1942, Admiral Chester W. Nimitz personally upgraded the award to a Navy Cross, the service's second highest honor; 40 years later, Dorris Miller received belated recognition when a Knox-class frigate was named in his honor; and

Whereas, the Congressional Medal of Honor may be rightfully awarded to any military person who ". . . distinguishes himself conspicuously by gallantry and intrepidity at the risk of his life, above and beyond the call of duty . . ."; although nearly half a century has passed since the attack, Seaman Miller's courageous actions at Pearl Harbor endure in the hearts of many citizens, both black and white; his exceptional heroism on that day indeed merits our nation's highest honor; now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the 71st Legislature of the State of Texas hereby honor the life and heroism of Seaman Dorris "Dorrie" Miller and request the Congress of the United States to enact legislation permitting him to be awarded posthumously the Congressional Medal of Honor; and, be it further

Resolved, That the Texas secretary of state forward official copies of this resolution to the president of the United States, to the speaker of the house of representatives and the president of the senate of the United States Congress, and to all members of the Texas delegation to the Congress, with the request that this resolution be officially entered in the Congressional Record as a memorial to the Congress of the United States of America.

SUPPORT THE FLORIDA DEPARTMENT OF CITRUS' "NUTRITION FUNDAMENTALS" PROGRAM

HON. TOM LEWIS

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 28, 1989

Mr. LEWIS. of Florida. Mr. Speaker, the National Center for Health Statistics has projected that 3.8 million children will be born in the United States in 1989. The future of our Nation is dependent on the health and well-being of these children, and it is the responsibility of all of us to be concerned about their nutritional status.

Several recently published studies conclude the children of America may be headed for trouble.

One such study, published by the American Journal of Diseases of Children, indicates obesity in children has increased 54 percent since 1974. Obese children may grow up to be obese adults, tending to be plagued by high blood pressure, diabetes, and heart disease.

Added to this concern, the American Academy of Pediatrics now recommends physicians to test cholesterol levels in all children above the age of 2 with a family history of high cholesterol or premature heart attack. Surprisingly, in initial tests, some children have total cholesterol levels of 200, which, according to the National Institutes of Health, is the desireable limit for adults.

Frightfully, the statistics continue. A recent study of 19,000 children ages 6 to 17 conducted by the President's Council on Physical Fitness and Sports cites the dismal state of children's fitness: 40 percent of boys and 70 percent of girls cannot do more than one pullup; one-third of boys and 50 pecent of girls cannot run a mile in less than 10 minutes; and only 2 percent of the students who took the President's Challenge, a series of exercises that measures strength, flexibility and endurance, performed well enough to qualify for the Council's award.

To improve this situation, several health clubs devoted specifically to the needs of children ages 1 to 15 have opened around the country. And enrollment is rising. Encouraging studies indicate that youngsters who learn early that exercise can be fun, may have fewer weight problems later on.

Why should children have to learn to run and play? Doesn't that come naturally?

Have we as parents failed in some way? Are we sending the wrong message to our children? Certainly a paradox exists: Adults in increasing numbers are working so hard to be physically fit—just look around your neighborhoods and count the number of joggers—and children are watching from the sidelines—woefully out of shape.

The answers are not so easily discerned. Indeed, many factors contibute to these lifestyle changes. Funding cuts in school physical education programs, increase in television watching, and video game playing are just a few. The basic structure of the American family has changed dramatically. The traditional picture of a father working and the mother at home now represents about 6 percent of American families. The Norman Rockwell family is an image of the past.

Today, families eat in shifts, grab meals on the run, in front of the TV, or not at all. No wonder children are confused about what constitutes a real meal. The average supermarket, with 20,000 items available on its shelves, beckons us with a confusing array of choices. But in this land of plenty, eating and weight problems added to the lack of interest in physical fitness are alarming.

The finger of blame cannot be pointed in any one direction. Consumers need to be educated, and only through a combination of nutrition and health-related information programs will America's children be back on track.

Nutritious eating habits must be formed early—when the child is a toddler—to model lifelong attitudes and food behavior.

The Florida Department of Citrus [FDOC] has traditionally spearheaded many nutrition and fitness-oriented education programs. Since 1932, the commission has worked diligently to provide consumers with information that will help them lead more healthful lives.

Through FDOC Program success, National Diet Month—read into this RECORD in 1986 and 1987—provided the impetus for thousands of Americans to take off some weight. These efforts were praised highly by the media and recognized by over 90 million Americans.

Another program enacted by FDOC in 1987, focuses nutrition efforts on growing children.

Entitled "Cup O'Juice," the program is a toddler nutrition education effort that informs parents, practitioners, and communicators of the role of 100 percent pure fruit juices in the nutrition, health, and development of growing children. The program aims to alert parents to the importance of reading fruit juice labels. More than a dozen brandname fruit juice beverages contain less than 50 percent juice.

Many health educators and physicians recommend 100 percent pure juice as one of the first beverages parents should serve children when they are ready to drink from a cup. And, 4 ounces of 100 percent pure orange juice provides a full-days supply of vitamin C for toddlers.

This year, the FDOC, while continuing with Cup O'Juice, expanded its program to encompass a wider range of activites. The 1989 program, entitled "Nutrition Fundamentals for Toddlers," takes a broader look at the eating habits of young children.

Together with the National Association of Pediatric Nurse's Associates and Practitioners and Children magazine, a public service announcement, video news release, and a week-long 800 telephone line have been produced. The 800 telephone line (800) 4-BABY-89, offered during "National Toddler Week," May 15 to 22, will provide parents with a series of tips on toddler nutrition, including helpful hints for dealing with finicky eaters, how to plan ahead for a nutritious breakfast, and why children eat less at this stage of development.

To reinforce nutritious eating habits and to produce a nation of healthy adults, the FDOC wishes to convey its message through communicating with those responsible for the feeding and well-being of our young.

Mr. Speaker, through my capacity as Florida's only Representative on the House Agriculture Committee, and to state my concern for the nutrition and health of young children—the most vital asset of our Nation's future—I hereby submit for this RECORD an outline of the Nutrition Fundamentals Program, and urge my colleagues to support the Florida Department of Citus in its efforts to promote Toddler Nutrition Week, May 15 to 22, 1989.

FAMILY LEAVE BENEFITS ASSISTANCE ACT OF 1989

HON. THOMAS J. BLILEY, JR.

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 28, 1989

Mr. BLILEY. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing the Family Leave Benefits Assistance Act of 1989. This bill is designed to stimulate, encourage, and promote the continued growth of family sensitive employment policies through the use of tax incentives.

It is no longer useful to think of work issues and family issues as totally separate. Consider these facts: Today, most parents are workers and nearly half of all workers are parents. The fastest growing segment of the work force is mothers of children under the age of 3. It is estimated that 80 percent of all employed women will become pregnant at some point in their working lives. Over half of those women who work while pregnant are back to work within a year after childbirth. Women's contribution to total family income is particularly important for low-income families. In families with incomes between $10,000 and $15,000, employed wives who work full time all year contribute 58 percent to their total family income. When the family income drops below $10,000, this percentage rises to 64 percent. As a nation it is time to recognize that some families experience tremendous strain in reconciling work and family lives.

Employers have recognized this strain and are increasingly providing their employees with flexible benefit packages that allow them to ease their own work-family conflicts. Many of these plans include a parental leave provision. In a 1986 survey of Fortune 500 companies, over half of the companies responding offered some form of maternity leave. In a 1981 survey of small- and medium-sized firms, 88 percent of all companies responding provided such leave. My point here is that the voluntary negotiation system that American businesses rely on to design benefit plans is not failing American families but is working, adapting, and moving forward. While this voluntary system is working, the reality is that many companies currently do not provide parental leave to their employees because it costs too much; it is cheaper for them to replace employees who insist on taking the leave. This creates a situation of an employee having to choose between family and job—and an employer having to chose between loyalty to an experienced worker and the bottom line—the cost of the leave and the cost of replacing the worker. This dilemma is not good for American families and it is not good for American business.

My bill, the Family Leave Benefits Assistance Act is designed to address the needs of American families as well as American businesses not by mandating benefits but by helping businesses provide these benefits on a voluntary basis.

This bill would allow a company a 50-percent deduction for the costs of providing family leave. This plan would reduce the cost to employers of providing paid or unpaid leave. The deductions would be available for all qualified family leave expenses—that is, salary or wages and the costs of continued benefits, including paid leave, taken during the period in which an employee is temporarily absent on account of the birth or adoption of the employee's child or the serious illness of his or her child, spouse, or parent. The employer must have in effect a certified benefits plan which includes a leave policy providing that any employee taking leave will be entitled to return to the same or equivalent position without loss or pay or benefits.

For many employers, the increased tax deduction will be significant and will enable them to expand their current benefit packages to include family leave that is paid as well as unpaid. While I believe that the best arrangement for child care is a mother at home, I realize that economic necessity makes this difficult for many families. This plan would allow families to spend as much time as possible at home when a serious medical emergency involving a child, spouse, or parent occurs. Moreover, this plan recognizes that child birth and adoption are unique family events that require parents to give some undivided attention to their newly arrived child.

A voluntary approach to family leave supported by a tax break may seem too simple an answer to a complex problem. In fact, however, a voluntary approach serves more of the needs of businesses and families than a mandated approach. Employers simply cannot absorb the cost of the mandated approach without reducing current benefit packages. If an employer provides 10 weeks leave to all new parents, he will have to pay for it by cutting other benefits. Mandating family leave skews the benefit system toward only those families that can afford to take unpaid leave. The perk may be available to all employees, but it will be exploited mostly by the higher paid ones. Mandatory policies may result in discrimination against married women and men of child-bearing age. Because women will be far more likely than men to take extended parental leaves, discrimination against women may result. Finally, mandatory policies would cause many family providers to lose jobs due to small business closings.

Mr. Speaker, the Family Leave Benefits Assistance Act recognizes that the Federal Government ought not dictate to American businesses what benefit plans should be put in place, or who should be eligible. I believe that negotiations between employees and employers best determine the content of fringe benefit packages. These negotiations are stifled by mandates and in fact reduce flexibility and choice—key ingredients to profamily solutions.

In short, this bill would stimulate businesses to expand their parental leave policies without crippling small businesses and hurting our competitiveness. It is the right thing to do for American families and for American businesses.

"I LOVE THIS JOB * * *": A JUDGE SPEAKS OUT ON THE PAY RAISE ISSUE

HON. ROBERT H. MICHEL

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 28, 1989

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, amidst the sound and fury of the battle over the pay raise, the individual voice of reason tended to be lost. I recently received a letter from a Federal judge in the Midwest. I think the text of his letter tells us more about the realities of this issue than many people care to hear.

At this point I wish to insert in the RECORD, the text of a letter sent to me, February 11, 1989:

DEAR CONGRESSMAN MICHEL: I thought I would share some irony with you. I first learned about the Senate's rejection of the President's recommendations for salary increases for higher federal officials while listening to the radio last Thursday night shortly after 11:00 p.m. At the time I was working on a court decision, which I finished at about midnight. I learned about the House's rejection of the recommendations, again from radio news, while driving home on Tuesday at 6:15, after a full day on the bench and looking forward to another full evening of written work. On both occasions, I thought it was darkly humorous that the two Houses of Congress had acted in response to the firestorm of protest from people who think that Federal executives, legislators, and judges do not deserve even their present level of pay, let alone an increase.

I work the hours I do out of a commitment to handle the large caseload in our court. I could leave the public service right now, put in the same hours at a private law firm, and make two to three times as much in competition. At this point, I am not going to do that. In a few years—when my three children near college age—I may not have a choice. I love this job, for its intellectual challenge, the independence, and the matchless reward of directly participating in the administration of justice. It will probably break my heart if I have to leave it for financial reasons.

That, however, will likely be the result for me—and for a lot of other bankruptcy judges who, like myself, came on the bench at a younger age. Congress's failure to muster the political will to assume leadership on the compensation issue will lead to this result. I don't see how the improvement of executive or judicial administration in the Federal Government will be fostered in any way by the events of this last week.

THE U.S. POSTAL SERVICE SHOULD BE PRIVATIZED

HON. PHILIP M. CRANE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 28, 1989

Mr. CRANE. Mr. Speaker, The U.S. Postal Service has become an object of derision by Members of Congress, the business community, and more importantly the general public. The USPS once again opened itself to ridicule when the price of a first class postage stamp rose another 3 cents on April 3, 1988.

Since the Post Office was reorganized in 1970, we have seen postage rates jump from 10 cents to the current 25 cents—which is 45 percent higher than the rate of inflation. Yet, services provided to letter senders have deteriorated. For instance, in addition to a cutback on counter hours—front door service is also being abbreviated with the advent of regulations regarding newly constructed apartments and homes requiring "cluster" or street side mailboxes. In addition, former Postmaster General William Bolger admits that mail is being delivered about 10 percent slower than it was 20 years ago.

The malaise of the Post Office derives from being a State-owned monopoly. Unlike the private sector where management decisions are based primarily on economic factors, decisions in the public sector are unduly influenced by politics. Public firms are, therefore, divorced from the realities of the market place and prone to shoddy performance. The performance of the Post Office can only be improved by transferring it to the private sector.

The time has now come for a new approach to privatizing the Post Office. However, in order to achieve successful privatization, the interests of the postal workers, rural communities, business community, and the public must all be taken into consideration. To this end, I am reintroducing a bill which would privatize the Post Office by giving the employees full ownership of the corporation.

My plan is relatively straightforward. All assets of the Post Office would be given to a corporation owned by the employees by establishing an employee stock ownership plan [ESOP] which will transfer stock to the employees based on seniority and rank. Regulations will assure that rural service and general performance standards exceed current levels. The new firm will be given a 5-year grace period during which it faces no competition, giving it time to get its feet on the ground. Thereafter, the monopoly will be abolished and free competition in all classes of mail will be allowed.

I urge my colleagues to join me in an effort to creatively and effectively privatize the U.S. Postal Service.

LONG ISLAND SOUND CAUCUS RECONVENES

HON. GEORGE J. HOCHBRUECKNER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 28, 1989

Mr. HOCHBRUECKNER. Mr. Speaker, lobster, fish, and other fruits of Long Island Sound are dying—suffocating in a sea that lacks oxygen. They are also threatened by toxic chemicals.

The extent of the damage to sealife in Long Island Sound is now being studied. Some parts of the problem are painfully obvious, however, so obvious that they demand to be fixed before further damage can be done.

In excess of 40 sewage treatment plants still discharge waste water directly into the sound. This water contains chemical leftovers from soaps and fertilizers spread on lawns and farms. Nitrogen is one of the main culprits. Just as your lawn thrives on nitrogen, so does algae. Algae growth has expoded in Long Island Sound. Where algae thrives, it starves the sea of oxygen, killing other sealife.

In the summer 1987, the year in which this caucus was founded, conditions in Long Island Sound were possibly the worst in history. Federal officials tested water in one area of the western part of the sound that contained no oxygen. Lobstermen hauled in traps full of dead lobsters that had suffocated in this water. Chemical tests on the tissue of fish and shellfish caught in the sound found such toxic materials as mercury, lead, copper, and polychlorinated biphenyls [PCB's].

In 1987, the Long Island Sound Congressional Caucus, a group of 10 Congressmen including myself whose districts border on the sound, was founded to support research and cleanup projects aimed at restoring sealife in the sound. The goal of the caucus reflects the goals of the Federal Clean Water Act—to make our waterways swimmable and fishable. Of these 10 congressional districts represented in the caucus, New York's First Congressional District, has by far the longest shorefront on the sound.

To meet these challenges, of making Long Island Sound swimmable and fishable, the members of the Long Island Sound Caucus have succeeded in maintaining appropriations to continue the 5-year study of the sound that began in 1985. The Environmental Protection Agency [EPA] and the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration [NOAA] are jointly conducting the study.

While awaiting the results of the environmental study, one critical question must be asked. What will it take to convince authorities to take action against polluters now, instead of waiting until 1990 when the study is complete? We are talking here about life, not something static, like a broken-down car that need repair. Certainly, restoration costs will rise the longer we wait to act. But, more important, with living organisms in a damaged ecosystem, there is a point of no return. To destroy a fishing run or a clam bed once is to destroy it for the foreseeable future.

Now is a particularly good time for Federal action on this issue. In 1987 Congress passed a package of amendments to the Clean Water Act. One of these amendments established a National Estuary Program, under which the Long Island Sound is identified as a priority for cleanup projects. The Estuary Program calls for development of comprehensive plans for the protection of all designated estuaries. Besides Long Island Sound, Peconic Bay is now also to be designated as a national estuary.

Also within that package of amendments, Congress voted to authorize Federal funding of sewage treatment construction projects through 1993. Some of these funds might be used to clean, or possibly divert, waste water. Further, this funding authorization adopts a new permitting program which provides control over industrial and municipal storm water discharges into estuaries like the sound. EPA will receive authority to enforce these new controls on areas bordering the sound 2 years from now.

The problem of Brown Tide in the bays of eastern Long Island might also qualify for Federal funds under the National Estuary Program. With all the work going on nearby in Long Island Sound, it seems absurd that the Federal Government would continue to ignore the brown tide in the bays. This poorly understood algae bloom is destroying shellfish stocks and putting baymen out of business.

Congressman MRAZEK and I have great faith in the ingenuity and the will of Long Islanders to meet this challenge. We hope this meeting will yield suggestions that we can pursue in Congress in league with other caucus members.

MORE PROSPERITY, MORE HUNGER

HON. EDWARD J. MARKEY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 28, 1989

Mr. MARKEY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call the attention of my colleagues to the column below which appeared in the New York Times—Saturday, February 25, 1989. Dr. Jean Mayer, president of Tufts University and Dr. J. Larry Brown, a leading health care expert, offer a penetrating look at our failure to eradicate the unnecessary tragedy of hunger in the United States. It is time to take a good hard look at our fiscal priorities and to reexamine policies which have resulted in the evergrowing gap between the rich and the poor in this country.

MORE PROSPERITY, MORE HUNGER

(By Jean Mayer and J. Larry Brown)

MEDFORD, MA.—Throughout this decade, domestic hunger has been one of the most public of personal tragedies. The suffering of hungry American families, a wholly preventable condition, has been chronicled by numerous Government reports and academic studies. Research indicates a clear relationship between inadequate nutrition and illness, including more babies born at low birthweight and the risks of higher infant mortality and permanent disability.

Many families now appearing in bread lines across the country come from the traditional bedrock of our economy. In Pennsylvania, skilled steelworkers comprise a large percentage of the clientele in the more than 200 soup kitchens that have sprung up there since 1980. In Waterloo, Iowa, once-productive farm families now stand in bread lines to eat. In California's famed Silicon Valley, mothers working full-time at high-tech jobs supplement meager earnings with handouts from food banks.

The recent economic recovery is having little impact on the nation's 20 million hungry citizens—an unprecedented situation. The paradox of an economic recovery highlighted by hunger and homelessness stems from several factors. Chief among them is the dramatic shift to low-wage jobs in the United States economy.

According to the Joint Economic Committee of Congress, 8.2 million of the 13 million jobs created during this decade pay less than $7,000 annually. Half the jobs created since 1980 fail to lift families from poverty. This downward trend in wages undermines even white, male-headed households, which absorbed half the overall increase in poverty.

So sharp is this decline that by 1987, real wages were lower than for any year throughout the 1970's. A third of all new retail service jobs pay an average of only $4.39 per hour.

Another factor is the failure of the Federal minimum wage to keep pace with inflation. Since the wage was last increased, in 1981, to $3.35 per hour, consumer prices have risen 38 percent. This substantial loss of purchasing power undermines the ability of minimum wage workers to feed the nearly 15 million family members who depend on their incomes.

A third factor contributing to hunger amid prosperity is the weakening of Federal antipoverty programs, especially subsidized housing. The typical poor family spends 78 percent of its income on housing, a phenomenal burden created primarily by the decline in Federal housing subsidies. In this decade, they fell from $30 billion to $8 billion annually.

Federal calculations show that, in 1979, antipoverty programs like housing, food stamps and Medicaid lifted from poverty 20 percent of households whose cash incomes otherwise were below poverty. Today that figure has declined to 11 percent.

These three factors have made the poverty rate higher today than anytime in the 1970's. The number of poor has grown from 24.5 million in 1978, when unemployment was comparable to today, to 32.4 million now. More Americans are working than ever before, but eight million more people are poor because of the increasingly skewed distribution of income.

With the gross national product up 12 percent in real dollars, income inequality is at its greatest disparity since such comparisions were first calculated four decades ago. Since 1980, the share of after-tax household income has dropped for everyone except the wealthiest 20 percent.

This subsidization of the wealthy amounts to $35 billion annually, an amount that would have gone to poor and middle-income groups if their shares were the same as when the decade began. An economic pie that leaves millions hungry at the table of prosperity demands a response to fulfill our nation's commitment to individual opportunity.

The issues of housing subsidies and the minimum wage will be before Congress this year. Congress can also insure that successful programs like food stamps, school meals, nutritional aid to mothers and babies and elderly feeding are expanded to reach everyone in need. President Bush's "kinder, gentler nation" must protect those who have the least. The elimination of hunger and homelessness is the baseline measure of the decency of our Government.

THE PLIGHT OF CERTAIN AMERICAN REFUGEES

HON. JOE MOAKLEY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 28, 1989

Mr. MOAKLEY. Mr. Speaker, in response to numerous calls from my colleagues and others regarding the plight of Central American refugees in the United States, I have prepared the following "Dear Colleague" letter summarizing my views on this important issue. I would like to insert the letter and a recent New York Times editorial on the subject in the RECORD.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, DC, February 28, 1989.

DEAR COLLEAGUE: As you know, I have recently reintroduced a bill (H.R. 45) which would temporarily suspend the detention and deportation of Salvadoran and Nicaraguan refugees currently in the United States. Over the past few days I have been contacted by Members concerning the Central American refugee problem in South Texas, the new I.N.S. detention policy and how my bill would affect that situation. I thought it might be useful at this time to address some of these issues.

Contrary to public perception, Salvadoran and Nicaraguan refugees have not begun a sudden influx into the United States. Regrettably, over the last nine years, war, human rights atrocities and natural disasters have forced many thousands to leave their homelands in search of political asylum or some sort of temporary safe haven here in our country.

There are those who would describe these refugees as mere "economic migrants" who have fled their countries for nothing more than economic gain. However, I reject this characterization. It is virtually impossible to separate the devastation of the wars in El Salvador and Nicaragua from the devastation of their economies. They are intertwined. A far more accurate description of the Salvadoran and Nicaraguan refugees in the United States would be to characterize them as "war refugees."

I do not believe that every Salvadoran or Nicaraguan who comes here has a "well-founded fear of persecution" and, thus, deserves political asylum, as stipulated in the Refugee Act of 1980. However, it is accurate to point out that many deserving refugees have been denied this protective status for purely political reasons. Unfortunately, due to U.S. foreign policy considerations, political asylum has not been administered fairly and, therefore, has not been a viable option for many Central Americans.

The new I.N.S. policy of refugee detention, restricted access to the advice of legal counsel, and assembly-line adjudication of asylum claims will only worsen matters. Persons with legitimate asylum claims will still come to the U.S. but will be deterred from coming forward to pursue their claims in fear that they will be jailed and denied the fair hearing that our laws require. Persons who fail to meet the legal standards for asylum, but nonetheless have good reason to fear returning to their homeland, will be driven underground by the new I.N.S. policy. In either case the result will be the creation of a permanent, exploitable underclass of Central American refugees outside the protection of our laws—and, in turn, that will only aggravate the difficulties facing local communities where these refugees are now residing.

For those war refugees who do have compelling asylum claims, I believe that there is a better, more humane approach. Rather than adopting an ugly policy of massive detention—which will neither deter persons from coming to the United States nor encourage legitimate refugees to come forward and seek legal protection—our government should provide temporary safe haven status as outlined in my legislation. On January 3, I wrote to President Bush, Attorney General Thornburgh, and Secretary of State Baker urging them to grant Salvadorans and Nicaraguans extended voluntary departure status (EVD). However, the mails must be slow! To date, I have not received a reply to this urgent request.

I made this request for several concrete reasons. First, the majority of Salvadoran and Nicaraguan refugees need protection—for some it is political asylum, for others it is a temporary safe haven. Second, the United States has established a tradition, through EVD, of offering temporary protection to people fleeing violence and civil strife. To be consistent, the United States should offer the same relief to Salvadorans and Nicaraguans. Third, it is in the national interest of the United States to get a handle on this problem by encouraging persons already in the United States to come forward and secure work authorization rather than to remain underground. This will allow us to identify those in need of temporary protection and assist them in returning home when hostilities in their countries have calmed. Passage of H.R. 45 is vital in achieving these objectives.

By contrast, large scale, long-term detention, as I.N.S. is currently advocating, is both costly and impractical; and it discourages people from coming forward to I.N.S.

In 1986, the Congress passed a sweeping new immigration law. The Immigration Reform and Control Act was intended to address the problem of illegal immigration to the United States through a combination of civil and criminal penalties for employers who knowingly hire unauthorized workers and a legalization program for certain undocumented aliens. Although the new law provided the hope of legalization for undocumented persons who had resided in this country before January 1, 1982, as well as certain agricultural workers, most Salvadorans and Nicaraguans entered after 1982, and are not covered by these legalization programs. Ironically, many of those who do not qualify for the legalization programs are precisely those who came to this country at the time of greatest civil unrest in their own countries.

I believe that, notwithstanding the new immigration law, it is urgent that Congress and the Executive branch seek to develop a national consensus on the need for temporary safe haven for eligible Salvadorans and Nicaraguans. Whatever the initial motive for leaving their countries, Salvadorans and Nicaraguans in the United States face real dangers from deportation, and they deserve this country's protection.

The plight of Central Americans over the last nine years demonstrates dramatically that wars create destruction and hopelessness that people seeking to survive will flee. There is no easy or simple response to curb the influx of these war-refugees. A comprehensive approach is required to ultimately deter flight and create the conditions that will allow those currently in the United States to safely return home.

In addition to passage of H.R. 45, which would apply to only those refugees who are in the U.S. prior to date of enactment of the bill, I would suggest the following three point strategy: 1) diplomatic and foreign policy initiatives to alleviate the root causes of flight; 2) bi-lateral and multi-lateral initiatives to strengthen assistance to support the over one million refugees and displaced persons who currently reside in Central America and Mexico; and 3) fair and expeditious processing of asylum claims for those who may come in the future.

For your information, I have attached an excellent editorial ("Here: Migrants and the Need for Safe Haven") which appeared in Sunday's New York Times that responsibly addresses these issues.

Sincerely,

JOE MOAKLEY.

[From the New York Times, Feb. 26, 1989]

HERE: MIGRANTS AND THE NEED FOR SAFE HAVEN

The long lines of undocumented aliens applying for political asylum at an immigration office on the border in south Texas attest to the reverberating effect of United States policies in Central America. So many Central American aliens have applied for asylum in recent months that immigration officials have finally felt compelled to devise a get-tough policy to deter other migrants, trying to escape poverty, not persecution.

But in Central America it's often hard to draw a line between politics and economics, especially when U.S. policies have contributed to destabilization. That strengthens the case for generosity in granting asylum. Yet immigration officials fear encouraging a tidal flow that would overwhelm the proper, careful definitions of "refugees" and "asylees." Hence the decision to enlarge a detention camp on the border.

There's a warmer way to respond—create a new entry status: temporary safe haven. Giving such status to some number of Central Americans would recognize America's partial responsibility for their plight without compromising the goals of U.S. refugee and immigration laws.

Even a generous nation cannot admit anyone. That's why economic migrants are required to apply for immigration according to criteria that encompass regions of the world, family relationship to people already here and specially needed skills. But political migrants, those with a "well-founded fear of persecution" in their homeland, may win sanctuary under the 1980 Refugee Act. It's the duty of immigration officials to determine, fairly and expeditiously, who is a refugee.

Too often, however, foreign policy considerations distort the decision-making process. Officials have been reluctant to recognize political persecution under the U.S.-supported regime in El Salvador; they granted asylum to only 3 percent of Salvadoran applicants last year. By contrast, 65 percent of Nicaraguans fleeing the Sandinistas were granted asylum.

Growing numbers of asylum applicants caused a recent crackdown. Aliens used to be allowed to work temporarily during the lengthy application process. Last week, officials announced plans to detain them instead. As many as 6,000 aliens will be held in a tent city in south Texas. only those prejudged to present valid claims for asylum will be allowed to work and travel in the U.S.

Massive detention camps may effectively discourage economic migrants. A better remedy would be the certainty of timely and fair asylum decisions. Both certainty and fairness are now often missing. In Miami, for example, Nicaraguans rejected for asylum have been granted a de facto safe haven because immigration officials have proceeded so slowly with deportation hearings.

It would not be hard to formalize the safe haven status and restore integrity to the asylum process. Representative Joe Moakley of Massachusetts proposes a bill to do just that for Nicaraguans and Salvadorans. It would authorize the General Accounting Office to assess the feasibility of repatriating displaced nationals from Nicaragua and El Salvador. In the meantime, deportations of Nicaraguans and Salvadorans living here would be suspended for about two years.

The impulse to help aliens from Nicaragua and El Salvador is understandable, but the focus remains very narrow. Congress would do well to enact a safe-haven law with general application to aliens from other countries.

All political migrants seeking admission to the U.S. deserve fair, consistent and timely consideration of their claims. Some economic migrants who would abuse the process may deserve detention. But for aliens who simply need temporary resettlement until their homelands conquer the ravages of war, the idea of temporary safe haven satisfies the head and the heart.

LEGISLATION TO REFORM THE WAR POWERS RESOLUTION

HON. PETER A. DeFAZIO

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 28, 1989

Mr. DEFAZIO. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a revised version of House Joint Resolution 462, legislation I introduced in the 100th Congress to reform the War Powers Resolution

Secretary of State Baker proposed recently that Congress and the administration "agree to disagree" over the constitutionality of the War Powers Resolution. He advocated a "gentleman's agreement" in its place, presumably one that would allow the President to pursue any military adventure he chooses, so long as he chats with a few congressional leaders first.

The Constitution charges the President with the responsibility to "take care that the laws be faithfully executed." The War Powers Resolution is the law of the land. It is not for the President or his officers to rule on the constitutionality of a law; that question is reserved to the courts. There has never been a judicial determination of the validity of the War Powers Resolution. Until there is, the President is obliged to fulfill its requirements to the best of his ability. That's the theory. Unfortunately, it hasn't worked that way in practice.

Mr. Speaker, President Truman's unilateral introduction of United States Armed Forces into the Korean conflict marked a turning point in relations between the executive and legislative branches of Government. Though earlier Presidents did, on occasion, order the Armed Forces into hostilities, none claimed inherent power to do so without congressional authorization. The only bright spot since 1946 was the passage of the War Powers Resolution over President Nixon's veto in 1973. Unfortunately, through a combination of creative evasion by the executive branch, congressional inaction, and judicial abstention, the resolution has proved utterly ineffective.

The most recent example of judicial abstention was the Court's decision in Lowry versus Reagan. By an extraordinary exercise of judicial discretion, the Court made it clear to the Executive that compliance with the requirements of the War Powers Resolution is optional. In so doing, the Court ignored Chief Justice John Marshall's declaration that it is the job of the courts to "say what the law is." By the Court's reasoning, Congress must pass a law to require compliance with a law it already passed. The fallacy in that argument should be obvious to anyone with a measurable IQ.

The question is not whether to amend the War Powers Resolution but how. Many proposals have been advanced. A number of those seek to obtain Presidential compliance with the resolution by removing the provisions that Presidents have found objectionable. In so doing, they effectively repeal the War Powers Resolution. As Prof. John Hart Ely recently wrote, "Repeal is one way to obtain compliance," but it's hardly a good bargain for the legislative branch. What's worse, those proposals implicitly endorse the broadest possible view of Presidential war powers. The only checks they place on those powers are a requirement to consult in advance of a presidential war, and new rules for the House and Senate providing for expedited consideration of a joint resolution to stop that war. Thus the President starts wars, Congress must act to stop them, the reverse of the constitutional scheme.

Certainly, adequate consultation between the two branches is essential and should be encouraged. But a requirement to consult would be about as binding on an unwilling President as Secretary Baker's proposed "gentleman's agreement." We need more than that. We need a War Powers Resolution that asserts the congressional role in matters of war and peace. In particular, we need one whose requirements are enforceable. And that, ultimately, is the job of the courts in our system of government.

The three most important modifications to the war powers resolution I am proposing are:

A return to the concept of "prior restraints" embodied in the original Senate version of the WPR there is, defining in advance those uses of the Armed Forces in hostilities for which the President needs no prior authorization is neither possible or practical;

A prohibition on any other use of the Armed Forces in hostile situations and on any of the permissible uses lasting longer than 60 days, unless use is authorized by Congress, and using purse string restrictions to enforce the prohibition; and,

Providing for judicial review by conferring standing upon Members of Congress to bring suit in the event of Presidential noncompliance, and limiting the court's discretionary powers to dismiss such cases.

What follows is a section-by-section analysis of my legislation. I urge my colleagues to study this proposal and support it as being absolutely necessary to protect the constitutional allocation of the power to make war.

SECTION-BY-SECTION

SHORT TITLE

Section 1 cites this bill as the "War Powers Rsesolution."

PURPOSE; CONGRESSIONAL LEGISLATIVE AUTHORITY

Section 2 describes the purpose of the legislation and provides the constitutional authority for such legislation. The purpose is identical to that of the original War Powers Resolution. Authority is derived from article I, section 8 of the Constitution, which specifically provides that Congress shall have the power—

(1) to declare war;

(2) to make all laws necessary proper for carrying into execution not only its own powers but also all other powers vested by the constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof; and

(3) to control the expenditures of the federal government through its exclusive appropriations power.

USE OF THE ARMED FORCES IN HOSTILITIES

Section 3 describes, in detail, under which circumstnaces the President shall be allowed to introduce United States Armed Forces into hostilities without prior statutory authorization. Generally, these are instances where no prior congressional authorization is possible or prudent. The power to repel or forestall attacks on the United States or its armed forces is acknowledged, as is the President's historic right to rescue U.S. citizens whose lives are threatened. This section also imposes a prohibition on the expenditure of appropriated monies for any use of armed force not provided for by this section.

CONSULTATION BETWEEN THE PRESIDENT AND CONGRESS

Section 4 enlarges upon the consultation requirements in current law by specifying what is meant by "consultation" and by providing for the creation of an "Executive-Legislative Consultative Group."

REPORTS TO THE CONGRESS

The reporting requirement has been amended to apply only to an introduction of the Armed Forces into hostilities or situations where hostilities are imminent. Section 4(a)(2) and (3) have been dropped. The required report must state that it is being submitted pursuant to this section.

CONGRESSIONAL ACTION WITH RESPECT TO HOSTILITIES

Section 6 retains the provision requiring the automatic removal of United States Armed Forces from any hostile situation after 60 days unless Congress authorizes their continued presence. The 60 day clock commences upon introduction, not upon receipt of a presidential report. It applies, of course, only to situations covered by section 3 of this resolution. Any other introduction of United States Armed Forces into hostilities, without prior statutory authorization, would be illegal. The provision for removal of forces by concurrent resolution in current law is dropped.

CONGRESSIONAL EXPEDITED PROCEDURES

Section 7 updates the procedures providing for priority consideration of any joint resolution authorizing the use of United States Armed Forces beyond the sixty day statutory limit.

JUDICIAL REVIEW

Section 8 specifically confers standing to sue upon Members of Congress if any provision of the Resolution is violated by the President or the Armed Forces. It limits the court's exercise of discretionary powers to dismiss such cases on grounds of justiciability. It provides for expedited consideration of any action brought under this Act. It prescribes remedies and directs that any judgment rendered by the District Court shall be directly appealable to the Supreme Court. The effect of this section will be to provide for judicial review in any instance where a Member of Congress claims a violation of this law. The court will still be entirely free to dismiss such a claim as lacking merit, or to refuse to grant the relief sought.

RULES OF INTERPRETATION

Section 9 specifically states that authority to introduce the Armed Forces into hostilities shall not be inferred from any provision of law (including appropriations bills), or from any treaty, unless that treaty is implemented by legislation authorizing the subsequent use of the Armed Forces. It also directs that the courts shall not infer congressional approval of a presidential war simply because Congress has failed to enact a measure to terminate that war.

DEFINITIONS

Section 10 defines the terms "hostilities or situations where imminent involvement in hostilities is clearly indicated by the circumstances", "Armed Forces", and "introduce". Both the courts and the Executive branch have complained that current law lacks any clear definition of these terms.

SEPARABILITY CLAUSE

Section 11 retains the language from the original War Powers Resolution declaring that if any provision of this joint resolution is held invalid, the remainder of the resolution shall not be affected thereby.

IS MOSCOW DUE THAT RIGHTS SESSION?

HON. E. CLAY SHAW, JR.

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 28, 1989

Mr. SHAW. Mr. Speaker, recently I traveled to the Soviet Union with many of my distinguished colleagues, including Mr. EDWARDS of Oklahoma, to take part in meetings between members of the Helsinki Commission on Human Rights and members of the Supreme Soviet. While we were there, Mr. Speaker, we saw many signs of progress toward openness in that society. Soviet citizens have more freedom of expression and access to information. To a certain extent, they may criticize their government with less fear of a knock on the door in the middle of the night. Things are clearly changing for the better. But, enough so that Moscow should be asked to host the 1991 Conference on Human Rights? I am not sure that they have made that much progress. They still do not recognize the difference between rights and privileges. Free speech in the Soviet Union is still a privilege which the state may rescind at any time. Unless Soviet leaders recognize that peacable assembly, freedom of speech, freedom of the press, freedom to travel and to emigrate are rights derived from a higher authority than themselves, human rights in the Soviet Union will be tenuous at best.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to include in the RECORD at this time an excellent op-ed by Mr. EDWARDS which speaks to this subject. It appeared in the Washington Times on January 10, 1989.

IS MOSCOW DUE THAT RIGHTS SESSION?

(By Mickey Edwards)

The recent decision by President Reagan to endorse the Soviet Union's claim that it is a legitimate host for a 1991 conference on human rights goes far beyond a bit of backroom cheerleading for Soviet President Mikhail Gorbachev's campaign for internal reform: It recognzies the Soviet state—yesterday's "evil empire"—as a guarantor of the rights of its citizens and a striver for full recognition of human dignity. That's quite a leap and one that raises the question of whether the Russians have indeed moved so far in so short a time.

Is the Soviet Union, in fact, a born-again believer in human rights?

One thing is certain: In the words of a once-popular novelty song, strange things are happening. And nowhere stranger than behind the Iron Curtain. In fact, a visit to the Soviet Union today is a roller-coaster experience. A single week in Moscow and Leningrad can shock your system with alternating currents of surprise, joy and despair.

As vice chairman of the House Subcommittee on Foreign Operations, I recently returned from a week-long series of meetings with Soviet leaders in Moscow and in Leningrad. I had been invited to take part in talks between members of the Helsinki Commission on Human Rights and members of the Supreme Soviet.

The fact that the meetings were even taking place was momentous. Although there is no real parallel between the U.S. Congress, with its separate and considerable powers, and the Soviet version of a legislature, this was nonetheless the first time members of Congress and the Supreme Soviet had met together on a substantive issue. It was also the first time any representatives of the United States had been invited by the Soviets to discuss human rights questions. For years, in fact, the Soviets had denounced every mention by the United States of Russian human rights violations as interference in the U.S.S.R.'s internal affairs.

Not only had the Russians initiated the meetings, but it was clear from the outset that the topic was not to be human rights in general, but Soviet policy toward its own citizens. Two or three times the Soviet delegates made half-hearted attempts to suggest parallel human rights deficienices in the United States (homelessness, for example, and the arrest of clergymen who participated in the Salvadoran sanctuary movement), but those were fleeting blips on the screen.

The Soviets understood very well that we were there to talk about them—about Jews in Kharkov, Catholics in the Ukraine, political prisoners in the Soviet Gulag, denial of emigration permits. They understood that these talks were asymmetrical, and they accepted that.

There were excuses, of course (abuses were invariably blamed on earlier regimes), and at times the Soviets were more than a little disingenuous. ("Gosh, we'd sure like to learn what your folks do to make sure you always know what you constituents are thinking.")

There was some fervent advocacy of an occasional Soviet viewpoint (for example, the Russians firmly believe—as do many Americans, I suspect—that journalists ought to be held accountable for the truth of their reports). But the clear message (whether it was sincere is a separate matter) was one of Soviet eagerness to confess failings and to try to do better.

In many ways, this new openness in discussing human rights was a heady and disorienting experience.

There, at one lunch, were representatives of the Ukrainian Catholic Church (which has been denied recognition by the Soviet state), and of the Russian Orthodox Church (which is increasingly accepted by the Russians as a de facto "house religion," even though it, too, feels the sting of the government's restrictions on religious practice). And, on the other side of the table, sharing their borsht and black bread, were official representatives of the Soviet State—the people who deny the Russian people the full range of religious experience.

And there was a reception in Moscow at which top party and government leaders mingled, for the first time, with refuseniks, dissidents and leaders of the semirevolutionary movements in Lithuania and Estonia. Here, the publishers of underground journals; there Ivan Laptev, the ebullient editor of Izvestia.

So what does all this mean? Not long ago, Russians marked (and some celebrated) the millennium of Christianity in Russia. Has the milennium—the proverbial "that will be the day"—arrived as well?

One that, a few words of caution:

For one thing, there is less a willingness to accept responsibility for current and ongoing Soviet repression than there is a willingness to concede that Stalin and Leonid Brezhnev did things wrong. At one point, sitting across from Mr. Laptev in the conference room at Izvestia, I was driven in frustration to ask if he foresaw a day when Soviet citizens might be as free to criticize current policies as they now are to find fault with policies of the past.

His answer was something about the difficulty in getting information about current policy, particularly in the areas of defense and foreign affairs.

And there is an unwillingness to move from the specific to the general. In my remarks to the closing plenary session of our four-day meeting in Moscow, I cautioned that this country's interest was not limited to the emigration of a few specific individuals but to general acceptance of the principle that any citizen should be free to leave whenever he or she chooses: that we were concerned not only about specific instances of religious prohibitions but about the general principle of religious freedom for all Soviet citizens. While the Russians have begun to move toward satisfaction of U.S. demands in the specific cases we continually put forth, there is less progress toward accepting such freedoms as a general principle of government.

In assessing how much of the so-called Gorbachev reforms are real, we must break them down into three separate components: glasnost (or openness), perestroika (or restructuring) and democratization.

On the first, there is no question that there is a change in Russia. Soviet citizens have more access to the news, more ability to criticize their leadership, more freedom of expression. It is clearly not a Western-style definition of freedom, but there is certainly more freedom than before. Russian citizens remain highly skeptical, referring to similar relaxations during the Nikita Khrushchev years, and they ask such questions as: "If a cannibal begins to use a knife and fork, is that progress?", but that there has been some progress in opening the society is beyond doubt.

There has been less success with economic restructuring. Russian workers have developed a shouldershrugging indifference to their assignments, and years of cynicism aren't easily washed away. Despite Mr. Gorbachev's speeches and shakeups in the Politburo, shelves remain empty and long lines remain standard experiences for big-city shoppers.

Russian dissidents I met with in Moscow and Leningrad give President Reagan much of the credit for the new Soviet reforms.

As they see it, when Mr. Reagan declared at Reykjavik his intention to push forward with development of the Strategic Defense Initiative, and Mr. Gorbachev vowed to participate in an escalated high-tech competition, the Soviet leader found that his lagging economy simply wasn't up to it.

The response, as they see it, was a new push for an economic restructuring, which simply failed to get off the dime, largely because of worker apathy. So, to try to stimulate the economy, the scenario goes, Mr. Gorbachev was forced to try to find a way to give Russian workers some sense that they had a stake in the success of his reforms. And thus Mr. Reagan gave birth to glasnost.

Whatever Mr. Reagan's role, it seems evident that without a revived sense of involvement by Soviet farmers, clerks and factory workers, perestroika isn't going anywhere.

But if there is some progress in opening the society, and less in hyping the economy, there is virtually none in introducing true democratization.

One Leningrad couple described the Gorbachev efforts as "putting lipstick on a corpse." One example in Leningrad: a disrupted silent vigil, which resulted in participants languishing in Soviet jails for up to two weeks, a great improvement over going to the Gulag but not democracy as we know it.

Dissidents we talked to laughed about the so-called "elections" for local party leaders, in which each candidate would have to be approved in advance by the party. In fact, they said, the result might even be a worsening of the economy, since workers might be expected to vote against whichever candidate seemed most likely to make them work harder and produce more.

Democratization in the broader sense of self-determination is clearly not in the cards any time soon, as revealed in the recent Gorbachev crackdown on the Soviet Union's Baltic republics, which had the temerity to suggest that, absent matters of foreign policy and national defense, they would pretend to be relatively autonomous, much like states in the United States. That is clearly not what the Kremlin's leaders had in mind.

It is impossible to return from the Soviet Union without a recognition that things have indeed changed, enough so that that vast country which has for so long been an enigma to those of us on this side of the Iron Curtain now seems to be an even greater enigma to those inside the country, where iron-clad rules have been replaced by confusion and the nation's leaders are seen to be walking a tightrope but with no indication of whether there is a net below. Russia has indeed changed.

But it also seems clear that acceptance of the Soviet Union as an equal partner in the struggle for human rights is greatly premature. It is one thing to respond to worldwide pleas and allow more refuseniks to leave; it is something altogether different to accept, as freedom-loving countries do, that all citizens are free to leave if and when they choose. It is one thing to grant a permit for a Bible study here or a church bazaar there; it is something altogether different to accept the right of people to worship where, when and how they please.

This is a Soviet Union in which, to advance democratization, government leaders purge the names of their predecessors from public buildings. It is a Soviet Union in which earnest, and probably sincere, officials talk of human rights while they bug the hotel rooms even of guests invited to talk about human rights.

They're trying, but they still don't quite get it.

Should the United States encourage the Soviet Union to continue to move toward a Western style of governing?

Without question. But it is simply wrong—and probably counterproductive—to give the Russia of today the American stamp of approval as a legitimate partner in the struggle for human rights.

The Bush administration should rethink this one and suggest that the United States will grant Mr. Gorbachev his long-sought legitimacy only when Russia indeed understands and champions the full range of freedoms for its long-suffering people.

ENGINEERING AND SAFETY: PARTNERS IN PROGRESS

HON. ROBERT C. SMITH

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 28, 1989

Mr. SMITH of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker, the issue of engineering safety is one of great concern not only to the Members of Congress but also to the American public. Whether it's the Nation's infrastructure, our nuclear powerplants, or simply the automobile that we drive, safety through state-of-the-art engineering must always be a national priority.

American engineers justly can be proud of the contributions and advances they have made in this field, and a July 1988 article in Mechanical Engineering speaks to this point. Written by William F. Allen, Jr., chairman of Stone & Webster, Inc., "Viewing Safety From a Positive Perspective" underscores the importance of safety and the American engineer's dedication to the very highest standards.

I commend the article to my colleagues and ask that it be reprinted in the RECORD.

[From Mechanical Engineering, July 1988]

VIEWING SAFETY FROM A POSITIVE PERSPECTIVE

(By William F. Allen, Jr.)

(Even as they strive to improve their designs, engineers must realize that absolute safety will always remain elusive, just over the next hill. For its part, the public should recognize that the safety record for the vast majority of engineering works has been excellent.)

Recent, highly publicized failures of engineered systems and facilities make it important to put the issue of safety in engineering into perspective. Given a burgeoning population and a vast increase in the quantity, scope, and complexity of engineering work worldwide, the level of safety we have acheived is incredibly high.

The failures that have occurred—tragic though they are—involve only a tiny fraction of total engineering activity. It would seem that the public and the press do not always take this fact into account. Consider, for example, the space program. The multitude of successful launches seemed to be immediately forgotten at the moment of the Challenger disaster.

It is also worth emphasizing that life can never be made risk free. That simply is not in the cards. Clearly we must continue to do our best to achieve the highest possible degree of safety consistent with a reasonable expenditure of human and material resources. But we must, at the same time, recognize that perfection in engineering—as in every other aspect of human endeavor—will always elude us. We should, nevertheless, continue to strive for it in a rational way.

PERCEPTIONS AND ACHIEVEMENTS

Engineering is much more concerned with safety than the public perceives it to be. Therefore, as we continue trying to improve safety, we should at the same time try to improve the way the outside world perceives engineers and their work. One reason for the public's perception is that engineers are reluctant to claim credit for their achievements.

Another reason is the news media. The dominant medium today, for better or worse, is television. Television has unprecedented influence, but its principal role is to entertain, and its revenues are based on the size of its audience. As a consequence, the numerous engineering successes receive scant attention simply because they lack entertainment value. On the other hand, our failures—although their number is minuscule compared to the number of successes—are broadcast throughout the world, often in rather frightening and exaggerated terms.

Although they do not boast about their accomplishments, engineers have for centuries been steadily improving human existence, making life safer and more comfortable, and doing so with ever-increasing efficiency.

The 1930 edition of Grant's Principles of Engineering Economy states that "Engineering is the art of doing well for one dollar what any bungler could do for two." Engineers certainly are not bunglers. Over the years, they have provided for the satisfaction of life's essential requirements an abundant supply of potable water for the major population centers of the world; the expanded production and transport of food; and the supplies of electrical, mechanical, and chemical energy that have enhanced many thousandfold the limited muscular energy of man and beast. Engineering talent has raised living standards to unprecedented levels for a quarter of the world's population and has given new hope to those still existing under substandard conditions.

THE ESSENCE OF ENGINEERING

Providing for safety is the very essence of good engineering, and ASME and other engineering organizations have created a framework for improved performance in this area. But how is safety achieved? Certainly, safety can be improved by adherence to the rules and codes that govern engineering practice. There is, however, a more important factor: the application of experience and engineering judgment in carrying out the design process.

Engineering judgment is the essential ingredient in a rational approach to analyzing all the normal and abnormal events that could occur, and then deciding how best to design against those events. Engineering judgment is based on a solid technical education, on experience, and on an understanding of the relevant technical issues. Our ability to apply sound judgment has been greatly enhanced by the power of computers and such techniques as fault-free analysis.

But what about the failures? In light of them, do engineers really have a right to talk about their many successes? Since the overwhelming proportion of engineering work is excellent, and since we learn from our failures, engineers have no reason to apologize, no reason not to point to what is good.

The failure of the Tacoma Narrows Bridge about 50 years ago was especially tragic because the final design of the bridge had failed to incorporate all the knowledge of competent bridge designers. The more recent failure of the I-95 bridge in Connecticut was equally shocking. There are tens of thousands of bridges in the United States, and more attention must be devoted to bridge inspection.

A decade ago, in January 1978, the roof of the Hartford Civic Center collapsed. Fortunately, this occurred in the early morning, rather than at a time when the building would have contained 10,000 people. The collapse came after a combination of rain, freezing rain, and ice pellets had fallen on a layer of previously accumulated snow and ice. The roof drains were frozen shut and the load increased until failure occurred.

Building codes have evolved over a long period of time and continue to be updated as new knowledge is gained. Thus, after the Hartford accident, the guidelines of the American National Standards Institute were revised. ANSI 58.1 applies more conservative criteria to snow loads to account for snow drifting on multilevel roofs; it also makes adjustments for other natural phenomena that could increase roof loads. In addition, the code advises on increased roof slopes.

A change in steel-shop fabrication drawings resulted in the collapse of a two-tiered walkway spanning the lobby of the Hyatt Regency Hotel in Kansas City in 1981. One hundred fourteen people eventually died as a result, making this structural disaster one of the worse in history.

The walkways were designed to be suspended by continuous rods from roof trusses to the second-level bridge. Because of changes in the shop drawings, the design of the rod was altered from a one-piece to a two-piece construction. This essentially doubled the pressure on the end of the carrying beam, and the nut and washer at the end of the rod pulled through the end of the box beam.

A structural design must meet code specifications; it must be based on accurate calculations and drawings; and it must be supported by good engineering practice. It is equally important that the detailed fabrication of components and the ultimate construction be carried out in accordance with the intent of the design.

In addition to structural failures, these are operational failures caused by the action or inaction of people in positions of responsibility. Examples include the ferry that capsized in Belgium in March 1987 after trying to leave port with the bow doors open, killing nearly 200 people; the accident at Three Mile Island in 1979, which killed no one; and the catastrophe at Chernobyl in 1986, which caused the death of 31 people. There is no way engineers can completely design against human nature. We try, and we must continue to try, but the human animal is simply fallible and unpredictable, and operational failures are going to happen on occasion.

NUCLEAR POWER

The failures at Chernobyl and Three Mile Island were two very different events from the point of view of engineering safety. The Soviet reactor was totally different from anything ever built in the United States. (A proposal was made some years ago to build a reactor of the same type in the United Kingdom, and the idea was soundly rejected on safety grounds.)

The 31 fatalities at Chernobyl were all firemen or plant workers, who received their injuries right at the reactor. No member of the general public showed any clinical signs of radiation effects, and that was not for lack of looking: 10,000 whole-body radiation counts and 100,000 thyroid scans were performed in the search for signs of sickness. None was found. So, the Chernobyl accident produced no radiation sickness, much less any fatalities, in the general public.

The evacuation of the area around Chernobyl did not even begin until 36 hours after the initial eruption, and it required about a week to complete. Calculations indicate that the radioactive material that was emitted in the initial violent event was perhaps only 10 percent of the total released. The remaining 90 percent came out in the nine days following the accident, when a roaring graphite fire prevailed. It is possible to argue over various aspects of safety in U.S. water reactors, but there can be no argument over whether a water reactor can produce a nine-day graphite fire.

The Russians should be given credit for providing detailed information to the world, so that engineers elsewhere could learn from the tragic failure at Chernobyl. It was an operating failure exacerbated by poor design.

The Three Mile Island accident was totally different. Although it was clearly a disaster of gigantic proportions—and certainly an economic catastrophe—there were no fatalities and no injuries to the public. The safety system did, in fact, work to protect against any off-site health effects. There were only slight releases of radiation, quite surprising in view of the large releases contemplated for rare accidents in the Reactor Safety Study of 1975, the so-called Rasmussen Report.

Only about 18 curies of radioiodine, or a barely measurable 0.001 percent of the total, escaped from the plant. About 10 million curies, or some five percent, of the Krypton and xenon also escaped. It had previously been assumed that the iodine, which has the potential for significant health effects would be released in far greater quantities (much like the noble gases, whose health effects are much more limited). Clearly it was not.

One result of the Three Mile Island accident has been the establishment of a substantial program of emergency preparedness around all nuclear power plants. Planning at this level did not exist before Three Mile Island. But the accident brought yet another result: increased concern about the safety of nuclear power. This is especially unfortunate, because nuclear power is the most environmentally benign, and potentially the most economical, way to produce the large amounts of electric power necessary to maintain and improve the standard of living throughout the world, and particularly to improve the lives of the three to four billion people now existing under substandard living conditions.

The exaggerated public concern about nuclear power brings me back, once again, to the news media. In a recent paper, Professor Bernard Cohen, a widely respected physicist at the University of Pittsburgh, made the following statement: "The problem is that public concern is driven by media coverage rather than by rational scientific analysis. The media have driven the public insane over the fear of radiation and of nuclear accidents."

Surely, any rational observer has to be dismayed over the climate of unreasoning fear that surrounds nuclear power. This has opened the way for a small group of self-appointed experts to engage in demagoguery. These nuclear antagonists have caused problems in a number of regions. Here in the Northeast, an area of rising power demand and heavy dependence on imported oil, opponents are blocking the operation of two completed nuclear power plants—Shoreham in New York and Seabrook in New Hampshire. Furthermore, the Pilgrim plant in Massachusetts is now down and preparing to restart, but the restart is being opposed by anti-nuclear forces. The public is being overwhelmed by nontechnical people who have declared themselves expert in our field. The situation is truly irrational.

There is yet another result of the Three Mile Island accident. Because the consequences were so much less severe than had been anticipated, there has been an enormous international scientific effort dedicated to gaining a better understanding of the reasons for the low iodine release, and to determining if these findings would also apply to other plants, other accidents, and other fission products. I am proud that my company has taken an active role in this reassessment activity. From what we have learned, it seems to be impossible for a nuclear power plant to kill anyone off the site, much less the dozens or hundreds previously predicted for the most severe and improbable accidents.

These data represent a completely new understanding of the risks of nuclear power, and the basis is sound. There have been substantial advances in scientific and engineering knowledge. The Nuclear Regulatory Commission has published a draft "Reactor Risk Reference Document," which, with its underlying reports, shows a reduction of about two orders of magnitude in the risk of an early fatality due to a severe accident.

I am not even sure I understand what is meant by a reduction in risk from 3×10^{-5} to 3×10^{-7} per reactor year. Both numbers are so low as to be off the scale of the commonplace risks we routinely encounter without ever giving them a thought. But the important point is that the change reflects a reduction in risk.

NUCLEAR SAFETY

So the real message from both accidents, Chernobyl and Three Mile island, is that nuclear power, as exemplified in the water reactors of the Western world, is safer than had been thought, and far safer than most other activities in modern society. We know that nuclear power can be an environmental and economic boon to mankind, offering the possibility of a vastly improved standard of living for hundreds of millions of people. But to remain viable, nuclear power must be perceived in a rational way to the public.

Engineers need to do their utmost to work with the news media, which mold public opinion. Engineers and scientists recognize that absolute safety is a myth, and that human society simply cannot afford to devote excessive resources in quest of such an elusive goal. Yet, when it comes to commercial nuclear power, there has been tremendous pressure to do just that. Dams, in contrast, are designed to withstand the maximum predicted flood flow in a period of two or three centuries. It would be impossible to provide an economic design for any dam on the basis of the worst flood imaginable.

DOUBLE CERTAINTY

Good engineering and safety go hand in hand, particularly for complex plants. For further insurance, separate technical reviews are highly desirable. Building codes provide for an independent structural review of major multi-story structures. During the construction phase, there should be inspections by competent professionals thoroughly familiar with the design. Such inspectors have the dual advantage of eliminating poor workmanship and ensuring that the construction complies with the design.

Many tragic structural failures have resulted from lack of attention to the construction sequence, and also to the environmental conditions under which the construction took place. Our company has, for many years, used construction-sequence modeling, both to promote efficient and orderly construction and to make certain that design characteristics are not exceeded at some intermediate phase of construction. During construction it is imperative to ensure compliance with proper procedures, for example, those that allow concrete and other materials to attain the assumed design strength.

It is also essential to inspect bridges and other structures, not only to determine whether some unexpected deterioration of material has occurred, but also to ensure that the design has appropriately addressed the assumed external factors, such as snow or ice loading. For instance, if heat tracing is done to keep roof drains open, an inspection should be required to determine that the heat tracing system functions properly. These reviews and inspections are a vital part of an overall safety approach and also help achieve greater efficiency and economy.

TOWARD ENGINEERING SAFETY

In view of the importance of the political processes associated with large, complex projects, I recommend the support and encouragement of graduate programs in engineering that provide for major study in public policy in addition to the technical course work. This would equip graduates to deal better with lawmakers, regulators, the press, and the public, and to serve as lawmakers and regulators themselves. Northeastern University currently offers such a program and there might be programs at other universities, as well.

Second, I recommend that the major news media—television in particular—retain as consultants engineering and scientific experts who have earned their status by virtue of favorable peer review. Although we all recognize the need for the media to present information that will attract the attention of readers or viewers, the knowledge of experts would help place technical matters in better perspective. At least one television network already has a physician who serves as a consultant on medical markets. Thus, there already is at least some recognition of the value of outside expertise.

The need for a better perspective must be obvious. A minor radiation leak at a nuclear plant, for example, that is well below allowable limits, is usually a topic for national coverage on both radio and television. On the other hand, even though nearly 200 lives were lost in the Belgian ferry-boat tragedy, no one suggested that increased attention be paid to ferry safety in the United States. Apparently, no one has requested an investigation to determine if all U.S. ferries are equipped with indicator lights and closed-circuit television to prevent ferries from embarking with open bow doors.

We as a nation need to re-examine our priorities and use more plain common sense in addressing the major issues that confront us. We need to be positive and optimistic, for there is much left to be done, and we must approach the future and its challenges with confidence.

In Democracy in America, Alexis de Tocqueville wrote: "America is a land of wonders, in which everything is in constant motion and every change seems to be an improvement. . . . No natural boundary seems to be set to the efforts of man, and in his eyes what is not yet done is only what he has not yet attempted to do." This statement is still germane.

HELSINKI COMMISSION ISSUES HUMAN RIGHTS UPDATE ON ROMANIA

HON. STENY H. HOYER

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 28, 1989

Mr. HOYER. Mr. Speaker, approximately 1 year ago Romania quietly renounced its most-favored-nation trading status with the United States. Weary of continual uphill battles in the Congress over the propriety of granting MFN status to a country with such a poor human rights record, yet determined not to change his repressive policies, Romanian President Nicolae Ceausescu unilaterally decided to divest Romania of that status, which expired in July 1988. I am certain that his goal was to avoid scrutiny of Romania's human rights practices and the embarrassment of having Romania's MFN status suspended by the United States Congress.

Last month Romania stepped further outside the community of nations when its delegation to the Vienna followup meeting of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe announced that in spite of having signed the Vienna final document, Romania would comply only with those provisions it considered valid. Throughout the meeting the Romanian delegation objected vociferously to writing significantly expanded pledges to respect human rights into the final document. Yet it cynically gave consensus to the document. Romania has thus evolved from a posture of feigned disinterest in human rights to one of downright defiance.

In this light the U.S. Commission on Security and Cooperation in Europe, of which I am cochair, is more convinced than ever of the continuing, crying need to monitor the human rights situation in Romania. As one Romanian citizen has confided, even if we can do no more than bear witness to the tragedies occurring daily in Romania, then we have performed a much-needed service to the Romanian people. But the Commission is determined to do more, to continue to hold the Romanian leadership accountable for the human rights pledges it has made, and each and every one it has broken.

This week, the Commission has released an update on human rights in Romania. This report, which describes human rights developments over the past year, is in response to the continuing congressional concern over Romania's human rights record, as well as to the pleas of Romanian citizens that we not turn our backs on them. Romanian activist Doina Cornea put it best, writing, "we must succeed in uniting, all of us, in being able to raise our voices together."

RESTORATION OF TAX DEDUCTIONS FOR MEMBERS OF THE ARMED FORCES RESERVE AND THE NATIONAL GUARD

HON. ROD CHANDLER

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 28, 1989

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of Mr. MONTGOMERY and myself, I am today introducing legislation to amend a provision of the 1986 Tax Reform Act which places an undue burden on a vital component of our national defense structure. With the passage of the 1986 act, members of the Armed Forces Reserve and National Gurard are restricted from deducting miscellaneous expenses undertaken in the context of Guard and Reserve participation. New law requires that these expenses exceed 2 percent of an individual's annual income in order to be deductible. It is essential that Congress act to restore the full deduction for such expenses incurred by our country's citizen soldiers.

Reservists and members of National Guard units comprise an important source of personnel for the U.S. armed services in the event of an outbreak of hostilities. National Guard and Army Reserves comprise over half of the Army's total personnel. In addition, reserves comprise nearly 30 percent of naval personnel, 31 percent of Marine Corps personnel, and over 30 percent of total Air Force personnel are in the Air National Guard or Air Force Reserves. The importance of retaining a qualified, dedicated, and experienced National Guard and Reserve Force cannot be overlooked.

The vast majority of reservists and members of the National Guard are in the selected Reserve category. In this capacity, they are required to participate in a minimum of 48 drills and 2 weeks of active training each year. While they are compensated for their duties, these reservists and members of the National Guard are not compensated for travel expenses, including lodging and meals. In States where military facilities are widespread, housing and mess halls are often available and open to these individuals. In States such as my own, military facilities are few and far between, unfairly burdening individuals who serve here and not in other States.

This measure that Mr. MONTGOMERY and I are introducing today would amend the Internal Revenue Code to restore the full deductibility for miscellaneous itemized expenses incurred by members of the Reserve and National Guard Forces.

Reservists and National Guardsmen make a significant contribution to the national security of the United States. I hope that my distinguished colleagues will recognize this and demonstrate their support for the many thousands of dedicated men and women who serve our country in this capacity by cosponsoring this legislation.

The text of the bill follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) subsection (b) of section 67 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 (defining miscellaneous itemized deductions) is amended by striking out "and" at the end of paragraph (12), by striking out the period at the end of paragraph (13) and inserting in lieu thereof ", and", and by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(14) any deduction allowable for expenses incurred by an Armed Forces reservist or National Guard member in connection with performance of services as a member of a reserve unit of the Armed Forces of the United States or of a unit of the National Guard."

(b) Paragraph (2) of section 62(a) of such Code (relating to certain trade and business deductions of employees) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subparagraph:

"(C) CERTAIN EXPENSES OF RESERVISTS AND NATIONAL GUARD MEMBERS.—The deductions allowed by part VI (section 161 and following) which consist of expenses of travel, meals, and lodging while away from home, and expenses of transportation, paid or incurred by the taxpayer in connection with the performance by him of services as a member of a reserve unit of the Armed Forces of the United States or of a unit of the National Guard."

(c) Subsection (e) of section 274 of such Code is amended by inserting after paragraph (9) the following new paragraph:

"(10) EXPENSES INCURRED BY ARMED FORCES RESERVISTS AND NATIONAL GUARD MEMBERS.—Expenses incurred by an Armed Forces reservist or National Guard member in connection with performance of services by him as a member of a reserve unit of the Armed Forces of the United States or of a unit of the National Guard."

(d) Subparagraph (A) of section 274(n)(2) of such Code is amended by striking out "or (9)" and inserting in lieu thereof "(9), or (10)".

(e) The amendments made by this section shall apply to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1986.

HUMAN RIGHTS

HON. NORMAN D. SHUMWAY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 28, 1989

Mr. SHUMWAY. Mr. Speaker, today a new chapter is being written in the history of the United Nations. For the first time in 30 years, the United Nations Human Rights Commission will consider human rights violations in Cuba.

Over the past 2 years, the Congress has unequivocally expressed its deep concern about the serious human rights situation in Cuba and its strong support for this matter to be addressed in a substantive and continuous manner by the United Nations Human Rights Commission.

I applaud the efforts of the working group which visited Cuba and produced a report that sheds some light on the tragic denial of human rights in Cuba. Given the serious abuses outlined in the summary report, it is imperative that the Commission continue to monitor the human rights situation in Cuba.

I commend to the attention of my colleagues the address which follows by our Ambassador to the Human Rights Commission, Armando Valladares—a man well known for his unwavering dedication to human rights.

AMBASSADOR ARMANDO VALLADARES, U.S. REPRESENTATIVE, UNITED NATION HUMAN RIGHTS COMMISSION—FEBRUARY 24, 1989

Today is a great day for the United Nations. After reading the Report from the Cuba Work Group (CWG), I can tell you that, on balance, we are pleased. The report reflects and gathers the official version of the Cuban reality, but it also received the accusations, documents and testimonies of the people, the victims. We applaud the dedication of the CWG under Ambassador Alioune Sene's chairmanship, as well as the time and effort put into the physical production of the report by the Secretariat.

This report does not judge the facts but rather shows in an impartial manner what the Cuban Revolution has denied for 30 years: the fact that there are violations of human rights in all categories and dimensions, almost without exception. There are well-documented violations and even official admissions of these violations on the part of Cuban functionaries.

The report demonstrates that the constitutional and legal system is structured contrary to the letter and spirit of interrnationally accepted human rights standards.

I think you may not have had time to read it, but the essence of the report, the compendium of all the denunciations, can be found in the annexes.

There are cases of torture, missing people, religious persecution, violations of all the civil and political rights and violations of economic and social rights. For instance, the Working Group received denunciations of massive beatings. In Chapter III, paragraph 4 the Minister of the Interior admitted that in the past detained individuals and prisoners were beaten and that Cuban laws were draconian.

In the annexes—legally a part of the report itself—you will find a copy of the sentence of Ruben Hoyo Ruiz, convicted solely for the possession of one Bible and you will find the sentence Arturo Garcia Rebollar, accused in a surrealistic trial for the possession of a translation of the prophecies of "Nostradamus". The National Union of Writers and Artists of Cuba (Union Nacional de Escritores y Artistas de Cuba—UNEAC) decreed that those predictions made 500 years ago were anti-Soviet.

On the other hand, the Cuban government lied to the Working Group; one of the times they told the Working Group that the Quivican Prison had been shut down. This was false. Comments in the Annex of the Report prove this. The Cuban authorities also transformed the punishment and torture cells in the Prison of Combinado del Este to deceive the Commission. But photographs were taken of these transformations and they clearly document the deceptive measures. Finally, we have been able to discover that the Cuban Government lied to the Working Group citing false numbers on the statistics of public health in Cuba. Official United Nations statistics prove this. The same was done with numerical figures on education and housing.

The Cuban Government gave the Group and President Sene guarantees that there would be no reprisals taken against those who came to testify. This has been not been the case: dozens of people have been arrested and beaten. These people burned their bridges when they openly testified to the Commission. The report speaks of reprisals, and these people must not be abandoned; the international community has a commitment with them. That is why I feel this process has just begun. You will see in the report that there are hundreds of questions which the Group directed to the Cuban Government for its comments, but they have not been answered. Thousands of cases of allegations of violations of Human Rights were sent to the Cuban Government on August 29, 1988; the Cuban Government has not even issued a return receipt. Subsequently, 1,500 other cases which were sent have not received any reply either. The questions on the Constitution and the Penal Code have not been answered, either.

The final consideration, the most important one and one which deserves undivided attention, is a clear recommendation for the process to continue, in other words the need not only to maintain, but also to reinforce the spirit of international collaboration on this case.

In conclusion, I want to repeat that today is a great day in the struggle for human dignity. The truth always comes to light. There is the report. You will see that in Cuba Human Rights are violated; there are cases of grave violations; for example, during its visit to Cuba the secretariat on behalf of the group received a total of 137 complaints of torture, cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment of punishment, missing people, murders, lack of freedom of religion, lack of freedom of expression or thought, lack of all fundamental liberties.

CONTRIBUTION TO EDUCATION

HON. AUGUSTUS F. HAWKINS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 28, 1989

Mr. HAWKINS. Mr. Speaker, Dr. James Comer is one of America's outstanding psychiatrist and educator. For some 20 years he has labored in the vineyards of New Haven, CT public schools, helping parents, students, and the school community work in cooperation with one another. The result of his work as an educator and as a psychiatrist, has evidenced improved teaching and learning in the schools in New Haven and elsewhere where he has made a major contribution in the education process.

Mr. Comer is author of a fascinating book, "Maggie's American Dream," which is a depiction of the influence that family has on the social, psychological, and cognitive development of a child at home and at school.

It is a brave story about the heroes and heroines in the Comer family and how they faced life, in all of its difficulties, and overcame the difficulties to become great contributors to the American society.

I commend "Maggie's American Dream" to my colleagues to read and enjoy.

In addition, I would like to submit an article by the New York Times on Dr. James Comer's career and his contribution to education.

A PSYCHIATRIST'S HISTORY OF HIS FAMILY'S SUCCESS

(By C. Gerald Fraser)

Sometimes Maggie Comer sees herself as a barefoot girl from the country. At other times she remembers her days as a domestic worker and elevator operator and how she and her husband, a steelworker, sent five children to college, where they earned a total of 13 degrees.

The family's story, says the oldest son, Dr. James P. Comer, is "a black success story," and he has written about it as a combined oral history and biography called "Maggie's American Dream: The Life and Times of a Black Family."

The book by Dr. Comer, a 54-year-old psychiatrist, has recently been published by New American Library. The story begins with Maggie Nichols Comer's first years in Woodland, Miss., and ends with her eldest son working to create for public-school children in several cities an environment as hospitable to learning as the one his parents created for him.

SEEKING A BETTER LIFE

Dr. Comer's father, Hugh Comer, died in 1954. His mother, now 84 years old, still lives in East Chicago, Ind., the place she chose as a 16-year-old in 1920 to escape the poverty of the Deep South and to seek a better life with relatives who had journeyed north earlier.

"I knew," she wrote in an epilogue for her son's book. "Even as a little barefoot girl back in the country, I had this dream . . . I thought to myself that if this one could do it, I could do it. And when I couldn't go on, I said my children would do it. People would say black folks can't do this and can't do that—I wouldn't have any of it. Sure, I could see it was harder for black people, but I just wanted a chance."

In 1977, Dr. Comer began recording conversations with his mother during family vacations. He also used stopovers in East Chicago and his mother's trips to her grandchildren's graduation ceremonies to compile 25 to 30 hours of recorded interviews.

"She is not one of those natural storytellers," Dr. Comer said. Early on, he decided the way to get information was "to ask questions around the special incidents over the course of my childhood. Eventually, she began to enjoy telling the stories and reflecting on the accomplishments."

ANALYZING SUCCESS

Dr. Comer, who is the author of three other books, says he wrote "Maggie's American Dream" to give people a model of success to examine. "You've got to ask why some people, with the same obstacles as others—and sometimes more—how did they get ahead? Let's look at success and figure it out."

Dr. Comer's brother Norman is superintendent of schools in East Chicago; his brother Charles is an optometrist. His sister Louise, a retired teacher of French, was once in charge of the Head Start program in East Chicago. His sister Thelma still teaches there.

Dr. Comer attributes these achievements to his parents' involvement in "traditional black culture": the church and an ability to learn even from menial jobs. Dr. Comer's father was a deacon at Zion Church, which was the center of social as well as religious activity for the family.

Dr. Comer said that his mother turned her experience as a domestic to great advantage. Domestic work, he said, allowed many black women to see "they were just as capable" as the white women for whom they worked. Domestic work, he said, was an opportunity "to really learn about the mainstream: how to get in, how to manage."

His mother told Dr. Comer that his middle name, Pierpont—after the legendary industrialist J. Pierpont Morgan—was his father's idea. "He always had high hopes for his children," she said, "and he always hoped that you would someday be a rich man."

Not yet listed among the Forbes 400, Dr. Comer works out of his office in the Yale Child Study Center in New Haven. The room is decorated with photographs he took while visiting China and Senegal. Dr. Comer has several jobs at Yale. He is a professor of child psychiatry, director of the School Development Program at the Yale Child Study Center and associate dean of the School of Medicine.

OUT-OF-SCHOOL LEARNING

His association with the Child Study Center began 17 years ago when he started working on what he calls an "intervention project" at two innercity schools in New Haven. He explained that he "wanted to give low-income black children the same chance in life—through education—that I had had." Although he studied medicine, public health and psychiatry, he said, "I really drew much of my understanding of the nature of learning problems and teaching problems from my own personal experience.

"After World War II, racial discrimination shut undereducated black men and women out of jobs, and families functioned less well," Dr. Comer said. "Success came only in a narrow range of professional activities. Black families who could not, as had the immigrants, secure social and political power and subsequently economic power, kept getting left further and further behind."

"The education problem is about difficult relationships," he said. "Schools must find a way to help teach parents and others to create a climate that facilitates overall development and, in turn, academic development."

These days, Dr. Comer said, "My parents would have more difficulty accomplishing the things they did because the interaction among authority figures is not as great and the sense of relatedness is not as great. As a result, the sense of caring, one to another, is not as great."

"I'm not sure," he said, "that my mother would be able to pick up the telephone and call the steel mill and ask for someone to give me a job.

LEGISLATION TO ESTABLISH FIRST HOME SAVINGS ACCOUNTS FOR YOUNG AMERICANS

HON. RICHARD T. SCHULZE

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 28, 1989

Mr. SCHULZE. Mr. Speaker, since coming to Congress 15 years ago, working toward ensuring opportunities for young Americans to own their own homes has been one of my top priorities. Yet, recent trends have gone against affordable housing for our young people. The American dream of that first home and the benefits of home ownership must not be cast aside.

Today I am introducing legislation to establish first home savings accounts for young Americans—a savings incentive to help young people realize that dream of owning their first home.

My bill would allow a $2,000 yearly deduction to a first home savings account or, the withdrawal of up to $20,000 without penalty from 401K or IRA savings plans. The first home savings accounts would be capped at $20,000, yet encourage all young Americans to save, a goal which we must meet as a Nation.

I urge my colleagues to join me in encouraging savings and home ownership.

INTRODUCTION OF THE RADIO LICENSE RENEWAL AND IMPROVEMENTS ACT

HON. MATTHEW J. RINALDO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 28, 1989

Mr. RINALDO. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing the Radio License Renewal and Improvements Act of 1989. I am joined on this bill by my colleagues, TOM TAUKE, of Iowa, BILLY TAUZIN, of Louisiana, and RICK BOUCHER, of Virginia. It is our hope that the Subcommittee on Telecommunications and Finance will, this year, begin to explore these and other difficult issues facing radio broadcasters.

As many of my colleagues know, the question of reforming the licensing process for broadcasters is not new to Congress. Twice in this decade, the Senate passed legislation which would have altered the current renewal process. However, that legislation never came before the House. Efforts in the House to reform the license renewal process were not successful.

This bill differs from any previous proposal because it focuses specifically on radio broadcasters. Radio is a uniquely diverse, locally oriented and universally available medium. There are over 10,000 radio stations licensed to serve local communities throughout the Nation. The average household has 5.6 radio sets; radio reaches over 96 percent of people 12 years old and older and 99 percent of teenagers on a weekly basis. Radio stations broadcast in a variety of languages and employ an ever-growing list of formats, all designed to attract larger, local audiences. The success of a radio station is deeply rooted in the public's recognition that the station provides locally based services.

Currently, when a radio broadcaster's 7-year license terms ends, it is confronted with the distinct possibility that its license may be in jeopardy because others will file competing applications at the FCC for its channel. There is wide agreement that the current procedure is seriously flawed because it pits the current licensee's performance against the competing applicant's promise of performance. The competing applicant confronts little risk in filing an application and can realize significant financial gain without realizing success in obtaining that local frequency. This is a costly, time-consuming process in which the licensee receives little or no benefit for operating in the public interest and is faced with uncertainty during the renewal process. One could argue that these problems would be acceptable if the public benefited from this cumbersome process. However, the public realizes no benefit: not a single license has been revoked by the FCC using this process.

Our bill corrects this grave problem. It gives the radio licensee a "renewal expectancy". If that licensee can show that it has broadcast material responsive to issues of local concern, that it has not committed serious violations of the Communications Act or FCC regulations and that it has not engaged in a pattern of abuse of the Act or regulations, then FCC will renew the license. If the FCC finds that the licensee has failed to meet this standard, then competing applications may be filed. The bill bars payments by radio licensees to those who would file competing applications, petitions to deny, or informal complaints. This will remove the incentive to file against an incumbent licensee, expecting profits in exchange for the promise to withdraw these documents further in the renewal process. The bill also establishes an informal procedure by which the public can be involved in reviewing performance of a radio licensee during the license terms.

I have long been interested in a comprehensive review of the current status of the radio industry, including ensuring that the technical quality of radio is maintained and improved. It is my intention, in the near future, to introduce additional legislation that will address other issues confronting the radio industry. I hope my colleagues, upon review, will join me in both endeavors.

I am aware that other Members, particularly some of my colleagues on the Energy and Commerce Committee, may wish to have other provisions added to the bill. I welcome their interest, and look forward to discussing these issues with them. Only through open dialog among Members, the industry, and the public can we arrive at a point where our concerns about the radio license renewal process can be addressed and reasonable answers can be reached.

There is a congressional consensus that new telecommunications services and technologies should be encouraged and implemented. However, as telecommunications moves into the 21st century, we also must strive to fix the regulatory problems surrounding our oldest broadcast service—radio. The Radio License Renewal and Improvements Act is a sensible, precisely drawn solution to problems that have vexed radio broadcasters for years. I hope this Congress will make a concerted effort to revise and streamline the license renewal process for the good of the industry and the public and give this legislation favorable consideration.

PRAISE FOR VA HOSPITAL

HON. JOHN P. HAMMERSCHMIDT

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 28, 1989

Mr. HAMMERSCHMIDT. Mr. Speaker, the personnel of Veterans' Administration hospitals are dedicated to delivering quality medical care for our Nation's veterans and sympathetic understanding to their concerned family members.

I receive many letters and messages attesting to those efforts, but public acknowledgement is perhaps too rare. So today, I would share with my colleagues a recent column published in the Arkansas Democrat, written by Wally Hall, chronicling his father's experience with a medical emergency treated at the John L. McClellan Memorial Veterans Hospital in Little Rock, AR.

[From the Arkansas Democrat]

DAD, VA:

(By Wally Hall)

It was 4:40 Wednesday afternoon when the call came.

I was sitting in my hotel room in Houston, reading, when the phone rang. It was my office conveying a message to call my wife, who told me my dad was in the Veterans Administration Hospital in Little Rock.

He had just had a heart attack.

That morning when I left for Houston for the Arkansas-Houston game, my mom and dad were at my house keeping my daughter who had the flu.

Suddenly, he's in the hospital and I'm hundreds of miles away.

I don't believe anyone can ever be prepared for a crisis that is so serious, that death is a possibility, but it was a reality and there was no time for panic.

A phone call to Suzanne, my travel agent, and I was booked on a flight home.

Even though the airline refused to accept my ticket that was for the next day, and I had to pay for another ticket, gate agents at Houston and Dallas got me on an earlier flight than I was scheduled. I was at the hospital by 8:35 p.m.

The next 48 hours were living hell.

I didn't think about the Arkansas-Houston game or writing a column until Friday afternoon when my dad was doing much better.

The thanks goes to a great staff at the VA hospital.

It was my first trip to the VA since the early 1970s when I was in the Air Force and I was truly impressed.

Even though it was a few minutes past visiting hours, the nurses readily agreed to let me see my dad and the first thing he said was: "Son, don't you get in this shape. You quit smoking and start watching what you eat."

That was typical of my dad. He was lying on the bed; he had suffered a heart attack and he was worried about me.

One of the many kind and considerate nurses my family has met in the last few days told me that Dr. Revard was on the case.

I remembered a Ron Revard who had been an All-SWC center for the Arkansas Razorbacks on the 1971 team and had eventually become a doctor, but the last I had heard was he was in private practice.

He turned out to be one and the same.

Wednesday night when my dad started having chest pains, Dr. Revard acted quickly. Dr. Nowlin, his attending resident, was finally off, so Dr. Revard met with our family and talked about what needed to be done. Because my dad was on strong pain killers, any decisions at that point would be with my mother, who was perfect for that because she was being stronger than any of us.

She and I met with my dad a few minutes and then again with Dr. Revard.

An angiogram was called for, and within an hour, my dad was being wheeled to another room.

Aunts, uncles, cousins and other family members were told they would be called.

Dr. Joesph Bissett, one of the best cardiologists in the country, came in, which left no doubt that Dr. Revard had concern for his patients and not his ego.

At 12:05 a.m. it began, and the next two hours were hell as we sat, stood, paced, walked, talked, drank coffee and prayed.

At 2:05, Dr. Bissett and Dr. Revard came out and told us the heart attack had been minor (thanks to my mom getting him to the hospital), and that fortunately my father had a very strong heart.

Anyone in the family could have told them that.

More tests would be coming, he was considered still in critical condition and in intensive care, but we felt relief.

Nonetheless, that's where I've been the last few days, and why I haven't had a column.

I have one today because Friday evening my dad told me he was fine and to get my behind back to work. Saturday he was moved out of intensive care and is doing great.

My experience with hospitals and doctors has been limited, but after seeing how efficient and professional the doctors and nurses were at the VA, I was able to leave with confidence and a good feeling that the VA Hospital is here.

TRIBUTE TO ARCHBISHOP WILLIAM DONALD BORDERS

HON. BENJAMIN L. CARDIN

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 28, 1989

Mr. CARDIN. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to honor a citizen of Baltimore, one of whom I and many others are most proud. I am speaking of our archbishop, William Donald Borders, who will retire this year.

Mr. Speaker, June 26, 1974 was an important day in the history of Baltimore. On that day, Bishop Borders of the Diocese of Orlando, Florida became Archishop Borders of Baltimore, the Nation's oldest archdiocese.

Archbishop Borders has been one of the greatest servants Baltimore has ever had. He has dedicated his life to serving God, but also to serving those in his community. The motto that has guided his life is "I will listen that I may serve," and he has lived up to that.

Archbishop Borders is well known for his responsiveness to the needs of those less fortunate. Baltimore magazine could have paid him no higher compliment than when it called him the "king of soup kitchens and shelters." Without Archbishop Borders, many, many of Baltimore's poor and homeless would have been deprived of shelter and food and, most importantly, a voice for their needs and an ear for their problems and concerns.

Archbishop Borders has also been a moving force for equality in our society. In his years as pastor of the Holy Family Church in Louisiana, then Father Borders took it upon himself to desegregate the church in an area few other places had been desegregated. He continued to work for equality when, after having moved to Baltimore, a Federal judge ordered busing to integrate the public schools. Finally, Archbishop Borders nominated Baltimore's first black bishop.

When he retires, Baltimore will lose one of her most caring and empathetic servants. He has been a role model for us all, someone that, in some small measure, those of us in public service will try to emulate.

Mr. Speaker, on Wednesday, March 1, Archbishop Borders will be honored at a testimonial dinner entitled "A Calling Answered With Caring." I can think of no better phrase to sum up the philosophy of his life's work. I urge my colleagues to join me in honoring Archbishop William Donald Borders. We wish him all the best, and offer our thanks for all he has done for our city and her citizens.

FINANCING OF MEDICARE CATASTROPHIC COVERAGE ACT NEEDS TO BE REEXAMINED

HON. SAM GEJDENSON

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 28, 1989

Mr. GEJDENSON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw the attention of my colleagues to a statement issued by the National Council on Aging. The financing system of the Medicare Catastrophic Coverage Act has been the subject of a large constituent outcry, and I believe that this issue needs to be reexamined.

The National Council on Aging proposals represent a thoughtful attempt to craft a response to criticisms on the financing measures and impact of the new tax-based premium. I know my colleagues recognize that these new catastrophic benefits are needed, and that further advances have yet to be made regarding long-term health care. I believe that these comments are thought provoking, and I urge my colleagues to consider them.

STATEMENT OF DR. DANIEL THURSZ, PRESIDENT OF THE NATIONAL COUNCIL ON THE AGING

The National Council on the Aging urges the Congress to acknowledge that the firestorm of protest over the financing of the 1988 Medicare "catastrophic" amendments deserves a fair hearing and a positive legislative response.

Calls for repeal or delay of the new benefits are fundamentally attacks on Medicare itself. One of the original goals of Medicare was relief from the crushing health costs of the elderly. It is tragic that passage of these provisions has been delayed so long, while health costs have spun out of control.

Instead, the Congress should take decisive steps to restore confidence in the fairness of Medicare benefits and financing. NCOA urges the Congress to start work on measures including a freeze and cap on Medicare premiums, better coverage for the poor, exploration of additional, broad-based sources of financing health care including taxing of some unearned income, and extended protection for those persons who have employer-provided "Medigap" policies that duplicate the catastrophic benefits.

When some Congressional leaders portray legitimate questions about the financing features of the amendments as "sour grape" complaints of wealthy older persons, they threaten to weaken the wide, cross-generational support for both Medicare and Social Security. Such responses project a false image of fat cat older persons enjoying privileges and protections for which they are unwilling to pay a fair share, to the detriment of younger persons. The facts are otherwise.

The elderly spend almost 20 percent of their income in out-of-pocket payments for health care—more than any other group. Medicare covers less than half of their health care bills. Through Medicare premiums, deductibles, and co-payments and through billions of dollars of income taxes, older citizens already bear a major share of the costs of their own care and they help to underwrite the health costs of younger citizens.

It is misleading to portray the 1988 new benefits solely as "elderly" gains. The benefits, as do all benefits under Medicare, protect 33 million current users and ease the responsibilities and concerns of the extended families of beneficiaries. All citizens are potential and probable users of Medicare and can expect to claim services and protections for extended periods of their lives.

Until these amendments became law, Medicare and each of its expansions were financed through a social insurance mechanism from payroll and income taxes and from the co-payments by Medicare users. Paying for all of these changes through a "users fee" payment system is a complete legal and philosophic turnabout. It threatens to incorporate a toll-road operational philosophy into not only Medicare but also into Social Security itself. It is an inappropriate market approach to a core, public service—health care for those at risk because of age or disability. By extension, one might expect only farmers to finance farm subsidies and defense contractors to fund the defense budget. We hear no Congressional calls for such actions.

It is not sour grapes to fight for a restoration of the social insurance financing of Medicare and any major amendments. It is in the best tradition of American fairness and social justice.

Instead of attempting to control health care costs and relieve pressures on the federal deficit on the backs of Medicare users, the nation should widen its focus to the larger economic situation. We should all be alarmed at the economic disaster potentials of national health costs that will top $618 billion this year. We should also recognize that Medicare represents less than 17% of that total.

Creating a "user fee" payment system for Medicare beneficiaries will not contribute a solution to the needs of more than 37 million citizens, younger than 65, lacking any health insurance at all.

NCOA calls for interim Medicare reforms, listed below, and immediate attention to the need for a national health insurance system that will provide universal access at affordable costs to the American people.

PROPOSED IMMEDIATE ACTIONS

Instead of repealing or postponing the benefits and costs of the catastrophic amendments, Congress should:

(1)(a) Freeze the Medicare Supplemental premium (at the 1989 rate with a limit of $500 per payer);

(b) Freeze the Medicare Part B premium (rate at the 1990 level of an additional $4.90 per month);

(c) Freeze the prescription drug rate at the 1991 level (of $1.94 per month);

(2) Extend for two additional years the "maintenance of effort" provisions under which employers now providing "medigap" benefits to retired workers are required to either refund cash for benefits now covered by the law or add new benefits. After this extended period, the provision would be phased out over a several-year span.

(3) Provide for Medicare payroll taxation of earnings above $48,000, the current gap. A total removal of this cap would produce $9 billion in revenue in the fifth year of taxation.

ADDITIONAL OPTIONS

(1) Raise and accelerate wider eligibility for the Medicaid "buy-in" provisions to pay for the catastrophic amendments cost-sharing burdens on low income elderly and disabled persons. Eligibility at 100% of poverty should be effective in calendar year 1990 and 125% of poverty in 1992.

(2) Lower the deductible threshold for Part B doctor costs to $1,000 out-of-pocket charges and provide, at that point, 100% Medicare payment on all additional costs.

(3) Promptly enact a Medicare-based long-term care program. Such a program should meet the basic costs of home care, and adult day care, and respite services and assist in easing the high costs of nursing home care; it should be primarily financed through the payroll tax. Such a program should also provide for limited cost-sharing by users of long-term care and roles for private long-term care insurance under federal standards.

(4) Explore such additional revenue sources as higher federal taxes on large estates, complete incorporation of all state and local employees into Social Security and Medicare, and an updating of tax levels on tobacco and alcohol. In addition, consider a revision of the tax code to provide for a tax on the more than $900 billion of unearned personal income to Health Insurance trust fund to support these recommendations and other components of Medicare.

(5) Enact a requirement that all Medicare physician billings must be within Medicare-approved limits.

THE CRITICISMS

NCOA suggests that these measures are a reasoned response to the criticisms with which NCOA agrees in principle, raised by many regarding the financing of 1988 amendments:

(1) It is fundamentally unfair to tax one small segment of the population (half of Medicare beneficiaries) to support a protection that will be enjoyed by literally all citizens who can qualify for Medicare coverage through disability or age. Both Medicare and Social Security are family benefits and not of value only to the old.

(2) The Congress, in the 1988 amendment, altered its half-century compact with the American people to provide Social Security payments as social insurance benefits financed broadly through payroll and income taxes and cost-sharing by beneficiaries. Medicare is a part of this compact.

(3) The amendments did not provide for protection of those who were receiving "Medigap" retirement benefits, usually in exchange for fewer benefits or less pay during their working years, nor did Congress provide for a reasonable transition period for such workers and employers to modify benefits.

(4) The Congress and the federal government and many national and community groups serving families and the elderly failed to portray adequately the actual components of the amendments, and this failure led to the general belief that the most "catastrophic" health problem of the elderly, long-term care, was somehow being treated by the amendments.

(5) Older persons have been admonished to plan carefully for their financial futures. "Even" middle income older persons have a right to expect their government to not endanger such plans through the sudden imposition of new taxes and charges for basic health protection. Many of these same older citizens are paying almost 20% of their gross incomes in out-of-pocket health costs, even under the current Medicare program.

The most comprehensive examination of opinion on the catastrophic amendments confirms NCOA's findings. The American Association of Retired Persons poll released on January 12, 1989, shows that while a majority (65–70%) of the 1750 respondents, age 45 and above, generally support the Catastrophic Coverage Act, almost 60% oppose the "elderly only" financing of the program. In addition, 51% of the respondents over 65 judged the supplemental premium as negative. Additionally, the poll showed that the most supported new benefit is the "spousal impoverishment" provision, protecting some of the assets of a couple when a spouse must enter a nursing home and requires Medicaid coverage. Clearly, the poll indicates that long-term care is still the key health issue on the minds of American adults.

NCOA urges that the Congress and the public place this Medicare dispute in an appropriate context. This nation faces a medical-financial crisis far in excess of federal outlays for Medicare and Medicaid. Last year, in 1988, the nation's health bill was almost $560 billion, an increase of 10.2% over 1987 costs. For 1989, the Department of Commerce projects a new increase in health spending of 10.7% to $618 billion.

Hospital costs will increase by 10.4%, physicians' fees by 13%, and nursing home costs by 11.4% in 1989. Despite such increases, more than 37 million Americans, mostly in families with working members, lack health insurance protection. Private employers are rapidly cutting back on retiree health benefits and are requiring greater cost-sharing by employees. Some observers have shown that health costs add greatly to the cost of our goods competing on world markets.

Why is it that other nations can provide comprehensive and universal health coverage at 5% to 8% of GNP while we spend more than 11% of GNP for a fragmented system that neither serves all, nor is able to control cost?

In short, the well-intentioned efforts of the Congress and the Administration to cap some Medicare beneficiary costs while remaining "revenue neutral," has resulted in distortions of the nation's key social insurance health system.

The history of the catastrophic amendments demonstrates that the problems of out-of-control costs and a fair sharing of health finances now go beyond Medicare, Medicaid, or any single component of the population. All of the citizens of this nation, young and old, deserve access to an efficient and affordable health system not dependent on factors of age, disability, or personal means alone.

A national health system, based on a flexible social insurance model, can provide the framework for efficiency and universality. We need to expedite the national dialogue on such a system now, or the "catastrophic Medicare crisis" and the scandal of millions of citizens lacking health care protection will become more symptoms of a more profound economic and political crisis in the decade ahead.

A TRIBUTE TO DANIEL V. FLANAGAN

HON. NANCY PELOSI

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 28, 1989

Ms. PELOSI. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to Daniel V. Flanagan, on the occasion of his 80th birthday.

Mr. Flanagan has had a distinguished career as a labor leader and as a community servant. It is appropriate for us to remember his many contributions to our community as his family and friends gather to celebrate with him at this joyous time.

In his professional life, Mr. Flanagan has been instrumental in creating union representation for thousands of workers in San Francisco, in California, and throughout the Western United States. As the AFL–CIO's western regional director, he was responsible for the organization of working men and women from waterfront warehousemen to farm laborers in the San Joaquin Valley. The labor movement will be forever grateful for his unstinting efforts.

Equally as significant has been his contribution to the community. Serving with distinction on the boards of many nonprofit organizations in the San Francisco Bay Area, Mr. Flanagan has provided important guidance to these agencies as they work toward their goals of helping those in need. Daniel Flanagan played an important role as chairman of the board and chairman of the building committee for the Hanna Boys Center in Sonoma, CA. He also served many years on the Boards of the Sierra Club and the Mount St. Joseph's Home for Girls.

Last but not least, it is appropriate to celebrate Mr. Flanagan's success in the world of sports. We will never forget his winning of the Pacific Coast light heavyweight championship in 1933.

Mr. Speaker, Daniel Flanagan has made over the last 80 years, a great contribution to his community and I am proud to bring some of his accomplishment to the attention of my colleagues.

ST. FRANCIS CATHEDRAL CUB SCOUT PACK NO. 16 CELEBRATES ITS 40TH ANNIVERSARY

HON. BERNARD J. DWYER

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 28, 1989

Mr. DWYER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, this year the St. Francis Cathedral Cub Scout Pack No. 16 in Metuchen, NJ, will celebrate its 40th anniversary at a blue and gold banquet on March 12. Over the past 40 years, St. Francis Cathedral has sponsored a program which emphasizes involvement between boys, their parents, adult leaders, and the community.

Under the Cub Scout Program, boys between the ages of 7 and 12 participate in a number of programs aimed at promoting good citizenship, good sportsmanship, physical fitness, as well as mental and spiritual fitness. Over one and a half million boys nationwide participate in the Cub Scout Program which has been in existence since 1930.

St. Francis' involvement in Scouting has promoted better understanding within the family. Children participate with their parents as they learn new interests and skills. In today's society, with its daily pressures and demands on our time, the Scouting program brings families together. The St. Francis Cathedral Cub Scout Pack No. 16 offers the opportunity for young boys to combine the ideals they learn in their parish community with the civic responsibilities taught through the Scouting program.

The personal interest and dedication of St. Francis' parish family makes this Scouting program possible, and it is with deep appreciation and respect that I ask my colleagues to join me in thanking St. Francis Cathedral for its 40 years of commitment to the youth of Metuchen.

A TRIBUTE TO ROCCO PICCICUTO

HON. RICHARD E. NEAL

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 28, 1989

Mr. NEAL of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, each of us knows individuals who, through generous gifts of time and talent, enrich our society. Rocco Piccicuto was such a man. Mr. Piccicuto's recent death cut short a life which embodied, in deeds as well as spirit, the civic-mindedness which we hold up to our Nation's youth as a model in these times.

Mr. Piccicuto was a lifelong resident of the city of Fitchburg, MA, in my congressional district. He was active in a number of civic associations and philanthropic organizations such as the Rotary Club, the Fitchburg Men's Club, the Special Olympics, and the Thayer Conservatory. In addition, Mr. Piccicuto embarked on a personal crusade to bring about the beautification of Fitchburg. Through his dedication, considerable progress has been made in that effort. The beauty of that city, particularly during the summer bloom, is a particularly appropriate monument to Rocco Piccicuto.

His wife, Patricia, and daughters, Kathryn and Patricia, should take pride and comfort in the knowledge that Rocco Piccicuto—veteran, husband, father, and citizen—played an important and admirable role in his community. I am pleased to have an opportunity to recognize his many contributions to Fitchburg through these remarks.

STRAIGHT TALK ON MERGERS

HON. JIM MOODY

OF WISCONSIN

Tuesday, February 28, 1989

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Speaker, one of the most important issues facing the 101st Congress is what to do about the increased leveraging of corporate America. Clearly, not all mergers and acquisitions are bad. But the increased level of debt, particularly corporate debt, in our economy is troubling. There are human costs involved with corporate restructuring that need to be examined. And serious issues of property have been raised. Yet, it is not clear what congressional action, if any, is warranted.

To help us get a grasp of this complex issue, the Ways and Means Committee recently conducted an initial round of hearings on mergers and acquisitions. I would like to bring to the attention of Members the testimony of two of the witnesses: Dr. Henry Kaufman and Dr. Martin Feldstein. Their comments are very provocative and helpful as we try to deal with this important matter.

The testimonies follow:

STATEMENT BY HENRY KAUFMAN, PRESIDENT, HENRY KAUFMAN & CO., INC.

Mr. Chairman and Members of the Committee. My name is Henry Kaufman. I am President of Henry Kaufman & Company, Inc., a money management and financial consulting firm that I established last year, after spending over 26 years with the firm of Salomon Brothers.

I am pleased to be able to accept your invitation to present my views on an important subject that has justifiably drawn the attention of both the Congress and the senior leadership of the new Administration—the decapitalization of American corporations. In recent public statements, I have expressed my own concerns about the disturbing disregard for capital that is permeating some important segments of American business. It is a phenomenon that threatens our nation's economic well-being.

The disregard for capital is not limited to the corporate sector. There are other manifestations. It is present in the exorbitant demand for credit on the part of the Federal Government that results from an inability to make necessary budgetary reductions. It is also seen in a continuing rise of personal indebtedness by the household sector.

But it is the prolonged, and highly undesirable, shift away from equity toward debt financing by many business corporations that is especially worrisome now. This shift has accelerated in recent years as a result of the corporate merger, acquisition, and leveraged buyout mania which, in a number of ways, has heightened the disregard for capital. I believe that unless something is done to forestall excesses that are almost inevitable in this area, the health of the free enterprise system in the United States will be endangered.

To some, this may seem to overstate the menace. But the merger, acquisitions, and leveraged buyout mania poses significant hazards for a number of reasons:

First, it creates a real threat to the financial viability of the corporations involved. That threat will become harshly apparent to everyone in the next recession, whenever that may come.

Second, it serves to undermine the basic strength of the stock market. In the short-term, it distorts normal trading activity as market participants become increasingly obsessed with uncovering where the next deal will come from. For the longer term, it erodes investor confidence in the underlying fairness of the markets. And from a cyclical perspective, the exaggerated dependence of the market on mergers, acquisitions and buyouts will end up contributing to a sharper decline in share values when the next recession draws nearer.

Third, it does permanent damage to the corporate bond market. As a result, the cost of long-term debt financing will rise for all business organizations, even those not directly involved in M&As or LBOs themselves. And that will encourage still shorter maturity financing to escape the high cost of long-term funds, aggravating corporate financial vulnerability.

Fourth, it weakens the competitive position of U.S. business internationally. That is because over a period of time the large increases in leverage and debt servicing that accompany corporate financial restructurings will make it more difficult for many U.S. firms to embark on essential investment projects. But corporations in the other industrial countries are improving their balance sheet positions—and hence their capacity to finance productive investments and sustain their competitive strength.

Fifth, it decreases our Government's revenue and thus increases the budget deficit.

Now, I would not go so far as to assert that all highly leveraged corporate restructurings are unwise. Some may well yield positive economic effects. But taken too far, the decapitalization of American corporations will cause future financial stress. Ultimately, it will put the Government into the business of business through bailouts that will move our system closer to a social, and away from an economic, democracy.

This variant of socialization probably will not happen suddenly, as the outcome of some dramatic shock. Instead, the pathology leverage is to infect the system slowly, with few immediate overt symptoms of financial disease. But once underway, the infection is virtually impossible to reverse. It will cause profound changes in the system, amounting to a major upheaval in our economic and financial way of life. Excessive leveraging will encourage a growing concentration of assets and of decision-making in the private sector.

Out of that will emerge a financial-industrial complex wherein financial institutions and industrial corporations become increasingly interwoven, rather than separate and distinct entities. That amalgam will invite various forms of Governmental intrusion, culminating in direct Government participation in business through bailouts of corporations that fall into severe financial difficulties.

But for now, and possibly for some time to come, these long-term adverse consequences for the country will either be ignored or dismissed. Unfortunately, the immediate financial rewards to the participants in the game are so large and tempting that a whole series of self-justifications have come forth in favor of these deals. Thus, more and bigger deals will continue to be pursued until either there is a major failure or until Government steps in to check the excesses that will inevitably occur at some point.

DIMENSIONS OF THE PROBLEM

There is no clear consensus on why precisely the M&A and LBO mania is happening right now, whether it is an indictment of a generation of ineffective management, an incorrectly structured tax system, a natural result of loose, abundant credit, or an outgrowth of our weakened international financial position. Doubtless, many factors are responsible. But there is no dispute that it is contributing to a decapitalization of U.S. business which is proceeding at a rampant pace.

It entails a staggering substitution of new debt for outstanding equity. Over the past five years the debt of U.S. nonfinancial corporations has gone up by an estimated $840 billion and the equity position has contracted by nearly $300 billion.

In the latest economic expansion, nonfinancial corporate debt has grown by 15.4% annually. This compares with an annual increase of only 8.4% for the previous six cyclical periods of economic growth.

In the process, interest payments by U.S. nonfinancial corporations have swelled to a point where they now amount to about 26% of internal cash flow. To put this number in perspective, these payments now preempt more internal cash flow than during the recessions of 1982 and 1974 when this ratio was 22% and 19%, respectively.

One price of this leveraging explosion is a severe drop in credit quality. Last year was the seventh consecutive year in which there were more downgradings in ratings by the major credit services than upgradings. As a result, only a handful of major corporations are still rated AAA, and the number of A and AA rated companies is also dwindling.

Some claim that the merger, acquisition and leveraged buyout activity imposes limited systemic risks as long as it involves non-cyclical business, those which presumably produce a steady cash flow. This is a substantial overstatement of the facts. Even non-cyclical businesses are adversely affected by downturns in economic activity, though not as much as heavy industries.

In this connection, the new dimensions of the interaction between monetary restraint and its impact on economic participants are not taken into consideration. In our new deregulated financial world, for the central bank to achieve effective restraint, it must force a denial of credit at a much higher level of interest rates than when markets were more segmented. Monetary restraint is successful only after considerable scrambling for credit takes place among businesses, households, and government. Thus, many so-called non-cyclical businesses will become more bruised than heretofore, including consumer goods, retailing, and service industries.

Moreover, the so-called cyclical sector has not been a small proportion of the merger and leveraged buyout activity. According to a recent study by Goldman Sachs, corporations in cyclical industries accounted for nearly $200 billion or 40% of merger and acquisition activity and for $35 billion or again 40% of the leveraged buyouts since 1982.

What is important to bear in mind is that this decapitalization of so much of American industry has come into vogue under relatively benign economic conditions. The weakened financial structure of many corporations has not been tested during a business contraction. When it comes, there will not be the swollen sales, revenues and corporate income readily available to service a bloated mass of debt that there is today. Consequently, the chances are high that companies with a highly leveraged capital structure will report losses that are much larger than normal in a cyclical economic downturn. For quite a few, cash flow will be inadequate to service debt. For many, there will need to be various kinds of reschedulings and workouts to avoid bankruptcy proceedings.

By then, the issue will be raised in a political context of whether the nation is prepared to accept the full discipline of the marketplace to exorcise these excesses of leverage. Will firms who took on massive amounts of debt be allowed to fail, even if that would threaten to worsen the business contraction? Or will there be a clamor for a safety net, a lender of last resort in the form of a governmental bailout? After all, many who are now perpetuating the M&A and LBO mania will be suffering acutely—lenders with fiduciary responsibilities, banks, pension funds, insurance companies.

For the Federal Reserve, the dilemma of how to conduct monetary policy during the next recession for an economy laden with heavily indebted corporations will be especially acute. We have to ask: To what extent will our central bank have to accelerate monetary ease to avoid an immediate financial calamity—even if that means prematurely reigniting inflation and seriously damaging the prospects for a non-inflationary recovery? And, if the central bank routinely accommodates the bailouts, will it not end up being little more than an accomplice in encouraging the drift toward a socialization of economic and financial activity?

The international consequences of the explosion of corporate debt are no less worrisome. Just at a time when this nation is trying to regain international competitiveness so that we can improve our trade position, the additional debt burdens on many companies will have a crippling effect. In contrast, financial positions of major corporations abroad are getting stronger. In Japan, for instance, large increases in retained earnings have lowered corporate debt to equity ratios by some 10% in the past two years. A general pattern of improving equity positions is common throughout Europe, as well.

The proponents of an uninhibited market in corporate control, those who applaud the M&A, LBO mania, dismiss these concerns. Debt poses no burdens, they contend; if economic adversity ensues, debt is easily restructured. Leverage ratios are of little concern; companies in Europe and Japan have long had higher debt-equity ratios without adverse consequences. Monetary policy need not be influenced by corporate debt; it merely substitutes for debt that would otherwise have been accumulated by the household sector. And, the proponents assert, managements of companies will find it easier to pursue long-term strategies when they don't have to be subservient to the short-term time horizons of people in the stock market.

I find these assertions unconvincing. High levels of debt create fragility and a far greater vulnerability to economic shocks—unless society is willing to go along with the kind of close, even intrusive, banking and government involvement in industry that is institutionally embedded in countries such as Germany or Japan. But for our institutional setting, there is ample historical evidence supporting the financial dictum that a large equity position allows corporations to assume greater risks and to pursue opportunities that debt-heavy corporations must forego. Moreover, I know of no groups of shareholders who today are standing in the way of the management of a publicly traded corporation moving to improve the long-term efficiency of the firm. Shareholders do not resist these efforts; they yearn for them.

To argue that managements without shareholders but with huge amounts of debt somehow have more flexibility to achieve positive change in a business strikes me as both disingenuous and historically inaccurate.

PRESSURES FOR PERPETUATING HIGHLY LEVERAGED ACTIVITIES

Nevertheless, the unfortunate truth is that nearly all parties involved in the M&A, LBO mania have a strong vested interest in its continuation.

Existing members of management normally have stock options which can be cashed out at high premiums. Plus in a management buyout, they get substantial portions of the equity in the new entity on which further profits can be recorded.

Most stockholders are passive and enjoy the instant gratification of the high premiums paid by the bidders, and take their money elsewhere.

Commercial bankers get high fees for organizing and participating in the loan syndications. They get substantial interest rate spreads over the prime lending rate. In this day and age, when competition for credits is extremely fierce, these deals are nearly irresistible for the banks, regardless of the risks involved.

Investment bankers and lawyers get high fees as advisers, so lucrative that it is very difficult for them to be objective in identifying the negative aspects of the deals they are pushing.

In many instances, the investment bankers also stand to benefit twice over as underwriters and sellers of debt securities in the public markets that are usually required to pay down the bridge loans, part of which are domiciled on the investment bankers' own books.

About the only stakeholder that is plainly an instant loser is the holder of the existing bonds of the company. Frankly, the bond holders do not have a strong enough constituency to get themselves bailed out or a clear enough legal standing to prevail in the courtroom for financial damages.

The class of instant beneficiaries also includes the equity market at large. To the extent that shares are withdrawn, that tends to make market prices elsewhere higher than they would otherwise be. In addition, the M&A, LBO mania sets off a scramble to find the next potential candidate to go through the process, and their share prices are bid up substantially. In fact, a good part of the strength in the U.S. equity market today can be traced to the phenomenon. Other, more stable sources of demand for stock have largely retreated from the market, especially pension funds and individual investors with long-term horizons. The scent of the deal and the short-term killing that can be made in anticipating the next LBO or M&A has replaced other considerations. What it means is that for the time being the equity markets have almost become addicted, and any measures aimed at slowing down the tempo of M&A and LBO activity is bound to weaken the prices of equity in general.

WHO ARE THE DEFENDERS OF CAPITAL?

In view of this relatively new behavior of management, investors and financial institutions, it is appropriate to ask: "Who is the defender of capital?" It had been generally believed that it was business and investors who naturally exercised that responsibility. Much seems to have changed. The role of the powerful large individual stockholder manager has diminished. New stockholder groups have frequently avoided a participatory evaluation of management. In most instances, the important new classs of stockholders—institutional investors—tends to sell their shares rather than question management decisions. Moreover, the institutional portfolio practices of our day stress modern portfolio theory and equity risk diversification, not stockholder-management involvement. As a result, corporate managements are often independent trustees of a sort for a silent and absentee stockholder group.

The role of the institutional lenders, such a banks, has also shifted away from being the defender of capital to being financial entrepreneurs. They frequently resist the call for higher prudential capital ratios and more conservative accounting standards. Government-insured deposits, a technique for obtaining low-cost funds, have financed all sorts of marginal lending in an attempt to capture large profits.

Isn't it rather startling to find that before the loan problems of the LDCs and of the thrift institutions have been put to rest, the financial markets are enveloped in another speculative financing binge? Yet, the way our current world of institutions and markets are now structured, they cannot avoid being caught up in the creation of marginal debt. Today, even the most conservative institutions compromise standards and engage in practices that they would not have cared to pursue a decade or two ago. The heroes are the daring—those who are ready and willing to exploit leverage, and risk the loss of credit standing, to revel in the present casino-like atmosphere of the markets.

With the onslaught today of financial deregulation, innovation, and new technology, it is impossible for institutions and markets to be the defender of capital. Consequently, it is the Government as the representative of all constituents that must assume this urgent role.

We all must begin to appreciate that corporate debt can never be a full substitute for equity. Debt involves defined corporate obligations of interest payments and repayment schedules. It is a preemptive factor in corporate cash flow and may limit management flexibility. The abuse of the debt-creation process contributes to corporate failures, and for society as a whole runs the risk of debauching the essence of economic democracy. Equity, in contrast, allows freedom of decision-making and often reflects confidence in society and its political and economic institutions. If we diminish the role of equity, we invite the spectre of business control first shifting to financial institutions and then inexorably toward government. In the process, we risk a social and political change away from freedom.

THE CASE FOR A GOVERNMENTAL RESPONSE

For its part, the Government has two good reasons to respond promptly to the escalation of high leveraging within the corporate sector.

First is the straightforward adverse revenue effect on the U.S. Treasury. Decapitalization substitutes tax deductible debt for equity, so over time corporate taxable income will be lower than it would otherwise be. To be sure there are partial offsets. Some existing stock is held by people who pay capital gains taxes, and the lofty premiums paid by bidders will generate one-time capital gains collections. And some of the new junk bonds will be issued to taxpaying individuals and institutions. But over the long haul, the cumulative effect of an unchecked movement from equity to debt will permanently and substantially reduce corporate tax collections by tens of billions of dollars. Thus, the Government is subsidizing decapitalization of U.S. industry.

Second, and probably more important, the Government has to be concerned that the weakened financial structure of corporations effectively leaves it with the implicit burden of having to come to the rescue of failed companies the next time the economy turns downward—or else risk a major national financial catastrophe.

If the market cannot discipline itself, then the Government will have to consider means of inserting the necessary disciplines. It is no excuse to shy away from action on the assertion that no feasible set of restrictions will be perfect. Of course not. But just because what can be done will be imperfect doesn't mean nothing should be done.

TOWARD A PROGRAM OF PRUDENT LIMITS

I have a few suggestions for consideration. They are not meant to be exhaustive; many other proposals have merit and deserve to be considered. Here is my list:

First, the Government needs to reconsider the double taxation of dividends, a prime reason why debt is preferred to equity by many companies.

Other countries have faced this problem and have developed reasonable compromises to eliminate or greatly reduce the imbalance in tax treatment. It is time our Government did so as well.

Second, there needs to be a review of capital gains taxation. Modifications ought to be made to raise the tax rate on short-term gains and eliminate it, or lower it substantially, for various classes of longer term gains.

Third, the capital requirements of financial institutions providing the financing for these deals should be scrutinized more closely. Any system of risk-based capital standards ought to treat especially strictly deals that involve huge quantities of debt and that depend heavily on locating eager buyers to purchase the subsidiaries the borrowing company intends to spin off to help repay the bank loans.

Fourth, beyond the formal application of impersonal numerical ratios, the central bank ought to be involved at the personal level with bank management, playing a leadership role in pressing for a return to conservative banking principles which are all too often neglected in the quest for quick profits. To take one practical illustration, that should involve insisting that syndicators of LBO loans accept a continuing responsibility toward the institutions to which they sell loans, even if a deal goes sour.

Fifth, it is questionable whether any Government-insured deposits should be allowed to be invested in these loans or in the junk bonds that are then issued to retire them. If banks and thrifts choose to participate, let it be in separate affiliates not funded by insured deposits.

Sixth, securities firms should not be allowed to underwrite securities for firms in which they have a direct stake themselves, whether an equity stake or a bridge loan. Disclosure of such positions is insufficient as a check on potential abuses. How can an investment banking firm do objective due diligence for the securities to be distributed to the public when the proceeds of the offering will pay off the bridge loan lodged in the securities firms' own holdings?

Seventh, bondholders in the existing securities of the firm should be given an explicit legal right to sue the organizers of an LBO or other corporate decapitalization for damages ensuing from the resulting downgrading of the credit ratings of those bonds caused by that restructuring.

Eighth, whenever the management of a company makes a bid for its company, there should be an immediate enquiry as to whether the group is utilizing inside information not disclosed to shareholders. Plus, a written explanation should be published why the business plan that the group intends to adopt after the LBO cannot be pursued as a publicly held company.

Ninth, sufficient time, perhaps 90 days, should be provided for other bidders to compete whenever members of existing management propose an LBO.

Tenth, I do not favor measures that directly limit the participation of the foreign institutional lenders who have been extremely important in the financing of many merger transactions. Some restraint, however, should be exercised by them. Regulatory authorities of the U.S. and other major countries have already made progress in developing uniform capital standards for banks. It would make sense to extend these efforts to include explicitly the treatment of merger financing. Moreover, I doubt that any major industrial country would want to be identified as a prominent source of funds facilitating the decapitalization of American enterprises. A continuing dialogue on this matter between U.S. and foreign officials will go a long way in harmonizing lending practices in this area.

CONCLUSION

These are just a few of the kinds of measures that should be considered. The basic thrust is that the current system of tax rules and financial regulation sets up a set of incentives and motivations which virtually ordain that the M&A, LBO craze will continue until it threatens the financial condition of the entire corporate sector. At that point, the debt-burdened companies will end up on the Government's doorstep, pleading for special assistance. And the Government will be hard pressed to say no. That is not the kind of free enterprise system we ought to have, one that speaks rhetorically of market disciplines but whispers in the closet that the Government will always bail people out if anything really nasty happens. But it is the kind of system we will end up with if nothing is done to introduce a more prudent regard for corporate capital than has been the case lately.

STATEMENT OF MARTIN FELDSTEIN, PROFESSOR OF ECONOMICS, HARVARD UNIVERSITY, PRESIDENT, THE NATIONAL BUREAU OF ECONOMIC RESEARCH

EXCESS DEBT AND UNBALANCED INVESTMENT: THE CASE FOR A CASHFLOW BUSINESS TAX

Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I am very pleased to participate in this opening day of hearings on the relation of the tax law to the rise in corporate debt.

CORPORATE DEBT AND FINANCIAL DISASTER

It is easy to understand how excessive levels of corporate debt could lead to financial instability and could turn an ordinary recession into a much more severe downturn. When corporate debt levels are excessive, a sharp rise in interest rates or a sharp decline in operating income could trigger a series of cascading defaults that could undermine both industrial firms and financial institutions.

I shall not dwell on the systemic risks that could result from high levels of corporate debt. I am here today with three distinguished witnesses—Benjamin Friedman, Henry Kaufman and Felix Rohatyn—who have warned repeatedly about the danger of the current level of corporate debt. A quartet of Cassandras is at least one too many. I shall therefore leave it to them to elaborate on the risks associated with current and prospective debt levels.

Moreover, although I appreciate the possibility that excess debt can cause financial instability, I am impressed by two considerations that suggest that the risks inherent in current corporate debt levels may be exaggerated. First, corporate debt in the United States is far lower as a percentage of GNP than in other industrial countries. Second, corporate borrowers are generally being very careful to structure their debt in such a way that, if the corporation cannot meet its full interest obligations, the subordinated debt holders would have strong incentives to cooperate with management in sustaining business activity rather than in causing a dissolution of the corporation.

But even if we are not near the brink of financial disaster, I believe that there can be no doubt that our tax rules have pushed corporations to greater reliance on debt than they would otherwise choose and than would otherwise be desirable from the standpoint of their shareholders. Companies and shareholders are taking greater risks than they should because of the strong incentives provided by our tax system.

I want to focus my remarks today on the tax bias toward debt finance inherent in the current tax system and the increased incentives to use debt that have been created by the tax legislation of the 1980s. I will also suggest a change in tax rules that could eliminate this distortion and strengthen overall business investment.

THE TAX BIAS TOWARD EXCESSIVE DEBT

Until a few years ago, corporations were generally reluctant to accept high levels of debt despite the fact that interest payments on corporate debt are tax deductible while dividend payments are not deductible. Although the restrained level of debt depressed the return to equity investors and therefore the price of corporate shares, it is easy to understand why corporate managers were nevertheless reluctant to use as much debt as their shareholders might want. While the shareholder who owns the stocks of many companies can accept the risk of an occasional bankruptcy if the average return on his protfolio of stocks is high enough, a bankruptcy could destroy the careers as well as the personal fortunes of corporate managers.

In recent years, however, managers have overcome their previous reluctance and have begun to increase their debt-equity ratios. One reason for the change in their behavior has been the fear of a hostile takeover if they did not increase the return to shareholders through greater leverage. But the 1980s have also seen three important changes in tax rules that increase the relative attractiveness of debt and that, by doing so, have added impetus to hostile takeovers as well:

(1) The new corporate and personal tax rates make the rate at which corporate interest payments are deducted substantially higher than the rate at which individuals can deduct personal interest payments. It therefore makes tax sense for corporations to borrow more for individuals to hold more and debt in their personal portfolios, just what we have been seeing.

(2) Because of the new limitations on the ability of individuals to deduct investment interest expenses, an investor who prefers a high debt-equity ratio may want the corporations in which he invests to do additional borrowing to replace the personal borrowing that he can no longer do in a tax-deductible way.

(3) The sharp rise in the tax rate on capital gains relative to the rate on interest income induces households to prefer more debt and less equity, further encouraging corporations to increase their debt-equity ratios.

THE TAX INCENTIVE TO MERGERS, ACQUISITIONS, AND LBO'S

The increase in mergers and acquisitions is also in part a response to a strong tax incentive, although one that may not be so clear even to those who are involved. Nevertheless, market pressures and the fear of hostile takeovers induce corporate managers to engage in M and A activity and in LBOs that are taxwise but that would not otherwise be justified.

The key here is that dividends are a very expensive way for corporations to get profits into the pockets of shareholders since every dollar of dividends in fully taxed at the recipient's marginal tax rate. In contrast, a shade repurchase is more "tax efficient" because the individual who sells his stock pays a capital gains tax only on the difference between the selling price of the stock and the investor's original cost. Even with equal tax rates on capital gains and dividends, share repurchases are thus more tax efficient than dividends.

Seen in this light, an acquisition of one corporation by another has tax advantages similar to a share repurchase. The acquiring company distributes some of its retained earnings which get into the pockets of individuals subject only to the capital gains tax on the increase in the value of their shares. Although the acquirer has not put additional cash into the pocket of its own shareholders, for the corporate sector as a whole three has been a clear payout of earnings that would otherwise remain trapped in the corporation.

The debt financed acquisition or leveraged buyout is even more attractive to corporate managements and shareholders because it combines the tax benefits of an equity financed acquisition with the extra tax advantage of increased debt. The debt financed acquisition is equivalent to an acquisition financed by equity plus borrowing by the acquiring company to replace the lost equity with debt.

There is no doubt in my mind that existing tax rules provide a strong incentive to increase corporate debt. Although this implies greater financial risk than would otherwise occur, it does have the offsetting advantage of lowering the overall tax burden on corporate capital. This in turn reduces the bias against corporate investments and increases the overall incentive to save and invest.

Nevertheless, these offsetting advantages are not enough to justify the existing distortions. It is possible to modify current tax rules in a way that would neither increase nor decrease the overall tax burden on corporate capital but that would reduce the current bias in favor of debt.

THE TAX BIAS AGAINST PLANT AND EQUIPMENT INVESTMENTS

Before looking briefly at one such possible change in tax rules, I want to comment on a second very serious distortion that remains in the tax law and that can be eliminated by the same change in tax rules.

One of the important ideas that shaped the 1986 tax legislation was the concept of a "level playing field" that provides equal effective tax treatment to different types of business investments. The idea is a good one that should in principle increase the overall productivity of total investment.

Unfortunately, however, although the 1986 tax law may have reduced the tax differential between equipment and structures, it did so in a way that increased the tax bias against all investment in business plant and equipment relative to other kinds of business and nonbusiness outlays. The analysis that supported the elimination of the investment tax credit and the reduction of depreciation allowances as a means of achieving a more level playing field for business investment was incorrect because it ignored the wide range of investments that corporations make in addition to outlays for equipment and structures.

A corporation is investing whenever it gives up current profits in the hope of increasing future profits. Spending money for new plant and equipment is the most obvious but not the only form of business investment. A firm is also investing when it spends money on advertising, or on improvements in customer relations, or on recruiting employees, or on research and development. A firm also invests when it reduces current prices to increase its market share and raise future profits.

But there is a key difference between investments in plant and equipment and the so-called "intangible" investments in advertising, customer good will, market share, and personnel. The outlays on equipment and structures are not immediately deducted from income but are spread over a number of years. In contrast, all of the other forms of investment are deducted immediately in calculating taxable income. The current tax law therefore imparts a significant bias in favor of doing the intangible investments and this bias was increased by the 1986 tax changes that increased the effective tax rates on equipment and structures.

The bias in favor of intangible investments lowers overall productivity because it diverts scarce corporate funds away from plant and equipment and into less productive forms of investing. Moreover, although investments in advertising and market share may eventually raise the earnings of the investing corporation, that extra profit comes largely at the expense of other companies. National output and productivity are not increased.

A CASHFLOW BUSINESS TAX

In short, we have a tax system that distorts both the way that corporations finance themselves and the investments that they make: too little equity and too much debt coupled with too little investment in plant and equipment and too much investment in advertising, customer relations and market share.

There is a tax reform that would simultaneously eliminate both of these distortions: the cashflow business tax. It would change our current corporate tax rules in two important ways. First, interest payments would no longer be deductible. Second, all investments in plant and equipment and in inventories would be immediately deductible. The tax is called a "cashflow" tax because it is levied on the company's cash revenue minus all cash expenses (including investment but excluding the company's payments to the providers of its equity and debt capital).

Eliminating the deduction for interest would put debt and equity on an equal footing and eliminate the current tax bias to use excessive debt. The immediate expensing of all investments in structures, equipment and inventories would put such investments on a level playing field with advertising, personnel training, and other "intangible" investments for which current tax law already permits expensing.

The Cashflow Business Tax would thus eliminate the two most important distortions caused by our current business tax rules. Also eliminated would be the complex regulations defining the differences between debt and equity and spelling out the depreciation provisions for different types of assets.

What about the revenue effect of such a change? I have not done a detailed calculation. But some rough estimates indicate that the revenue gain of eliminating the interest deduction would just about pay for the revenue cost of immediate expensing of all investment. The overall change in tax rules could therefore be kept revenue neutral by a small change in the corporate tax rate.

There would of course be transition problems and special issues in dealing with financial corporations. But the shift to a Cashflow Business Tax would produce a simpler, fairer and more efficient tax system.

This committee might quite reasoanbly decide that the increase in corporate debt that has motivated these hearings does not present a substantial danger to the stability of our economy and therefore that, despite the serious distortions to business finance and investment caused by existing tax rules, America has had enough tax reform for one decade. But if you decide that the tax bias in favor of debt and against investment in plant and equipment should be eliminated, I strongly recommend that you consider the Cashflow Business Tax.

U.S. POLICY IN THE NORTHERN HEMISPHERE

HON. BILL RICHARDSON

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 28, 1989

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, Dr. Robert Pastor of the Carter Center of Emory University in Atlanta is one of the clearest, most incisive voices in the country on Latin American affairs. He has recently produced two works on Latin America which are crucial for a proper understanding of the situation in the Americas: a book, "Limits to Friendship: The United States and Mexico," and an article, "Securing a Democratic Hemisphere," featured in the winter 1988/1989 edition of Foreign Policy.

These two pieces represent some of the most sensible and pragmatic thinking on U.S. policy in our hemisphere. I commend these works for my colleagues and insert a review of Dr. Pastor's book and the conclusion from the article into the RECORD for their review.

LIMITS TO FRIENDSHIP: THE UNITED STATES AND MEXICO.

(By Larry Rohter)

It is hard to imagine a more mismatched pair of neighbors than the United States and Mexico. Forced by geography to live alongside each other, they do so with misgivings that seem to deepen, not diminish, as their relationship grows more intimate. For Americans, that relationship has often meant next to nothing; for Mexicans, it means virtually everything. One nation apparently is incapable of remembering any history, while the other seems unable to forget any. The list of differences goes on and on.

Against this backdrop; "Limits to Friendship" sets out to explore and explain the mutual mistrust and misconceptions that have long characterized relations between the two countries. As Robert A. Pastor and Jorge G. Castañeda make clear from the start, they do not "wish to present a common or even compatible view of the bilateral relationship." Instead, their goal is simply to offer both perspectives, and they have chosen a format—writing alternating sections in each chapter—that enables different views on major issues (drugs, debt, immigration) to come through.

Both authors bring useful personal experience to the task, and this permits "Limits to Friendship" to focus on specifics and avoid dreary philosophizing. Mr. Pastor, who writes the sections on the United States, was the National Security council's director of Latin American affairs under president Carter and now teaches political science at Emory University in Atlanta. He cites numerous instances in which Washington's overtures to Mexico produced results quite different from those planned. Mr. Castañeda, whose father was Mexico's Foreign Minister from 1979 to 1982, is a professor of political science and international relations at the National Autonomous University of Mexico in Mexico City and a political commentator. He offers a Mexican interpretation of some of the same events described by Mr. Pastor. More often than not, the two views are complementary to, and contradictory of, each other.

Take, for instance, a dinner that an American consular officer once held for some Mexican opposition politicans. To Mexicans, Mr. Castañeda says, the diplomat's action was "a typical illustration of heavy-handed American meddling in Mexican domestic affairs," while to Mr. Pastor it was merely "part of his routine responsibilities." When the then President of Mexico, Miguel de la Madrid, visited Washington in 1984, the trip "got off to a rocky start" because "a rather low-level official" met him at the airport, Mr. Castañeda recalls. "Since the Secretary [of State] and the Vice President were abroad" at the time, Mr. Pastor replies; "no slight could have been intended." As Mr. Pastor notes, "it sometimes seems that the United States and Mexico cannot help but convert" even the most mundane transactions "into a moral allegory."

Whether deliberately or not, this book, a Spanish-language version of which is to be published this month in Mexico, itself mimics the ironies of the United States-Mexican relationship. Mr. Pastor admits flaws in Washington's policy-making procedures and the more inglorious episodes of America's treatment of its southern neighbor, but he also enumerates instances in which Mexican conduct exacerbated existing problems or created new ones. Mr. Casteñeda complains that in doing so Mr. Paster "has strayed over the border" into his own part of the book, yet he rarely acknowledges that Mexico might bear some responsibility for its difficulties with the United States. Though articulate and cogent, his presentation is largely an apologia for official Mexican positions, not a critical analysis.

Mr. Casteñeda mentions, for example, the case of an unnamed former President of Mexico who said "he could not have fulfilled his duties a single day beyond the date of his term's end" because he had become "so anti-American, so irritated by U.S. government behavior toward Mexico." It does not seem to have occurred to Mr. Casteneda that the reverse is also true: any number of well-intentioned Americans have become disgusted by the deceit, self-righteousness and corruption they often encounter in their dealings with Mexico.

Given the many apparently unsolvable differences the authors describe, it would perhaps have been more appropriate for them to describe the relationship between the two countries not as a "friendship" at all, but as a relationship characterized by an uneasy mutual ambivalence. Polls taken in both countries in 1986 and cited by the authors found that 59 percent of Mexicans regarded the United States as an "enemy country," while 53 percent of Americans did not consider Mexico a "stable, reliable, and friendly neighbor."

In such an environment, the real task for both policy makers and ordinary citizens becomes one of limiting misunderstandings, and in that respect the book contains specific suggestions. With new Presidents just now coming to power in both countries, the authors say, "the moment is ripe to consider a package deal that would involve major concessions and demands by both nations in trade, energy intelligence and security, debt, capital flight, and immigration." If, before beginning the process of negotiation, either President-elect Bush or President Carlos Salinas de Gortari wants to know why the other acts the way he does, there is no better place to start than this valuable, timely and fascinating work.

A DEMOCRATIC COMMUNITY

The final challenge in Latin America is the most important and the most daunting. Only two functioning democracies existed in South America in 1978; today there are only two dictatorships. The entire Caribbean, except Haiti and Cuba, is democratic. In Central America, all of the counties are nominally democratic; but to the extent that democracy means subordinating the military to civilian elected leaders, only Costa Rica qualifies.

Still, democracy does not exist in several countries, and it is secure in few places. The region passively watched when generals interrupted the transition process in Haiti and Panama, Argentina, Ecuador, and Guatemala have all experienced coup attempts. What if the next attempt succeeded? Sadly, too little has been done internationally to help to consolidate democracy against the threats of militarism, debt, terrorism, and factionalism.

In the second stage of the hemispheric bargain, the new U.S. president should explore with other democratic presidents of the Americas the idea of calling a special OAS summit meeting to assess the state of democracy in the hemisphere and to develop recommendations on ways to strengthen it where it exists and promote it where it is absent. If Latin leaders view the OAS as an inappropriate forum, then alternatives can be explored with the aim of establishing a democratic community.

Legal and historical precedents exist for supporting democracy. The OAS Charter and the United Nations Universal Declaration of Human Rights proclaim representative democracy respectively as a basic principle of governance and a basic human right. Former Venezuelan President Romulo Betancourt believed that his country's democracy could survive only if dictatorships in the neighborhood were replaced. Betancourt urged that the OAS only recognize "regimes born of free elections and respecting human rights." The Betancourt Doctrine proved impractical in 1959 when few Latin democracies existed; but today, when the vast majority of Latin American governments are democratic but still endangered, there is a basis for re-examining the mutual responsibilities and obligations of democracies.

The political transformation of the region has settled the debate on the definition of "democracy". In the mid-1970s, some Latin American commentators argued that true democracy should be judged by mass participation rather than by the choices people face in the privacy of a voting booth. The Esquipulas plan, with its specific requirement of representative democracy, vanquished the idea that elections were an ethnocentric North American invention alien to the Latin cultural tradition. Latin Americans still attach a broader social and economic meaning to democracy than do most North Americans; but democrats in both regions agree that, at bottom, democracy means choice—free elections, free press, freedom to organize—and that the argument that health, education, and development should precede democracy masks a self-serving effort to perpetuate dictatorship.

This convergence of definitions and systems provides an opportunity. A summit of democratic presidents should consider all steps that legitimately could be taken by a group of democratic countries in the Americas to prevent the breakdown of democracy and promote its deepening and expansion. Among the policies that could be considered are those the United States adopted during the 1970s to promote human rights. This approach involved private diplomacy, public criticism, reduction or elimination of aid, votes against loans in the international development banks, and ultimately withdrawal of diplomatic personnel. In addition, the Democratic Community could search for ways to strengthen the Inter-American Court of Human Rights.

Allegedly to promote democracy, the Reagan administration imposed severe economic measures against Panama in 1988. The administration's unilateralist approach alienated the Latin American democracies and provoked them into defending Noriega and condemning the United States. Instead of snubbing Latin American democrats, the United States should have worked with them. A collective approach could have achieved more while requiring fewer sanctions.

If U.S. and Latin American democrats agree to implement the Contadora and Esquipulas plans in Central America, that formula could serve as the basis for a collective security arrangement to secure democracy throughout the hemisphere. Since it is easier to prevent a democratic government from being overthrown than to force a military government to give up power, democratic governments should agree to a series of steps they would take to condemn and isolate coup plotters. Concerted action could then be directed at helping nominally democratic governments—such as those in Central America—to assert control over their militaries. Finally, the last task is to find effective ways to pressure the few remaining dictatorships in the hemisphere to democratize. The truly democratic countries of the Caribbean should be encouraged to play a major role in this effort.

Argentine President Raúl Alfonsín has imaginatively found ways to gain legitimate international support for the perservation of democracy. His government has signed advantageous economic agreements with Spain and Italy that were premised on the maintenance of democracy in Argentina.

The basic concept underlying these agreements could also be replicated for addressing territorial disputes. Britain, for example, could negotiate a Falklands/Malvinas agreement that would be contingent on Argentina's maintaining its democracy. It might demilitarize the islands so long as democracy reigned in Argentina. Ecuador and Peru as well as El Salvador and Honduras might explore similar arrangements to settle their border disputes. Such agreements would benefit Latin American democracies in three ways: democractic governments could take credit for negotiating an end to these disputes; militaries would lose the main justification for their large budgets and role in politics; and coups would become unpatriotic and costly in economic as well as political terms.

Although revolutionaries would have the region believe that their success in Cuba, Mexico, and Nicaragua was due to a mass revolt against poverty and injustice, the three great revolutions in these countries occurred after extended periods of economic development. If poverty had been the cause, all three revolutions would have occurred either 20 years before the actual event or 5 years after the turmoil had erased the economic gains of the previous decades. In reality, these three revolutions were precipitated by successive crises involving longstanding dictators. The opposition's demand for "effective suffrage" was denied; and the dictators were tempting targets to unite their entire countries behind those who sought change by armed struggle.

Tainted elections remain a problem. The Democratic Community ought to address that issue by establishing an international election-monitoring organization composed of senior statesmen and jurists that should observe the electoral process before, during, and after the election. The group could issue reports assessing the evidence of fraud, and the Democratic Community could take up these reports formally. As a gesture of support for the new organization, all the members of the Democratic Community, especially the United States, ought to invite it to observe their elections. It would be impractical, of course, for the organization to monitor all the elections; but it should have the discretion of choosing which ones to observe.

This organization could also work with national committees for democracy, which could be established on the model of the human rights organizations of the 1970s. These institutions became the voice of the voiceless, alerting the world to gross violations of human rights. Similarly, national committees for democracy would be nonpartisan and could issue warnings to the world when democracy seemed in jeopardy. Such warnings would attract the attention of visiting international groups and raise the costs to those who would disrupt democracy.

The Americas can no longer postpone resolving the triple threat of Central American insecurity, debt, and drugs. The coincidental timing of major elections throughout the hemisphere offers a fresh chance to resolve these problems. The United States and other key countries in the hemisphere must choose: Each can continue to seek it optimal goal by acting unilaterally, but this approach has engendered resentment without results. Alternatively, through a Democratic Community they can compromise, achieve important but suboptimal goals, and show that a multilateral approach is a more effective way to solve the problems facing the hemisphere.

In 1928 Franklin Roosevelt wrote in Foreign Affairs, "Single-handed intervention by us in the internal affairs of other nations must end; with the coöperation of others we shall have more order in this hemisphere and less dislike." Sixty years later, as the centennial of the inter-American system approaches, Roosevelt's words sound almost current.

The challenge for the new U.S. president, however, is both more arduous and more rewarding. Whereas Roosevelt was initially compelled to withdraw from Latin America, stay out of Europe, and confront the depression, the next U.S. president must devise a way to remain involved in Latin America and to use U.S. influence more effectively. The new U.S. president should work with his democratic counterparts to lift the pall of pessimism covering Latin America today and establish an enduring Democratic Community. Legitimate, collective pressure by the community could help civilian democrats to assert control over their militaries, to discourage extreme elements, and to isolate the region's remaining dictators. The new president should resolve to join the hemisphere's new democratic leaders in seizing this historic opportunity to refashion inter-American relations. Together they can prevent the political pendulum from swinging back to dictatorship.

NURSING SHORTAGE AND NURSE REIMBURSEMENT INCENTIVE ACT OF 1989 (H.R. 1140)

HON. EDWARD R. ROYBAL

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 28, 1989

Mr. ROYBAL. Mr. Speaker, given the current nursing shortage crisis coupled with the fact that our Nation's health care system depends upon the skill and caring of nurses, a package of reforms from both the public and private sector is critically needed to provide a solution to the nursing shortage. This comprehensive package of reforms should include: First, increasing funding for training, education, and recruitment; second, implementing innovative nursing practice models in all health care settings; third, increasing nurses' salaries and benefits; forth, increasing nurse antonomy and decisionmaking; and fifth, providing direct Medicare and Medicaid reimbursement to nurse specialty groups. These reforms will directly address problems in recruitment, retention, and reentry of nurses into the nursing profession.

One part of this critically needed comprehensive package is the Nurse Education Act of 1988, which was passed in the 100th Congress. This legislation authorized increased funding for nursing programs. Though I believe it should be fully funded, current budgetary constraints will make it extremely difficult to get that full funding. A second part of the reform package is clearly the responsibility of health care providers—hospitals, health maintenance organizations, nursing homes, home health agencies, and medical offices. These public and private sector reforms will do much to increase respect, authority and responsibility, and income for nurses. Most importantly, reforms should include direct reimbursement under insurance programs, including Medicare and Medicaid. That is why I am introducing the H.R. 1140—Nursing Shortage and Nurse Reimbursement Incentive Act of 1989.

Direct reimbursement provides an incentive to the nurse specialty groups—nurse practitioners, clinical nurse specialists, certified nurse-midwives, and nurse anesthetists—who want to remain in nursing, while, at the same time, earning salary and benefits commensurate with their professional credentials, education, and experience. Furthermore it would enable these specialized nurses to practice in unserved and underserved areas, expanding access to needed health care. Direct reimbursement would give nurses choices among working as salaried employees, setting up independent practices, or entering into joint practices with physicians or other certified health professionals.

The Congressional Office of Technology Assessment reports that:

Unless the barriers of direct reimbursement are altered, the potential savings from a greater use of these specialized nursing groups will probably remain unexploited even though studies show that nurse practitioners, clinical nurse specialists, certified nurse midwives, and nurse anesthetists can provide services that both substitute for and complement physicians' services, depending on the particular service or type of practice—Health technology case study 37, 1986.

Recognition of these nurses as independent providers of quality health care services through Medicare and Medicaid reimbursement policy will permit nurses to function in a capacity commensurate with their education. By enacting H.R. 1140—the Nursing Shortage and Nurse Reimbursement Incentive Act, one part of the long-term solution to the nation's current nursing crisis will be addressed.

Mr. Speaker, I ask that the bill description be included in the RECORD.

SUMMARY OF THE NURSING SHORTAGE AND NURSE REIMBURSEMENT INCENTIVE ACT (H.R. 1140)

Amends the Social Security Act to provide coverage of and direct reimbursement of services for nurse practitioners, clinical nurse specialists and certified nurse-midwives under the Medicare and Medicaid programs. Certified registered nurse anesthetists reimbursement would change only for the Medicaid program, since they are already receiving reimbursement under Medicare.

Directs the Secretary in consultation with an advisory panel made up of experts and representatives of nurses affected by this Act to: 1) design a resource-based relative value scale fee schedule; 2) conduct a study of the relative costs for physician services and for nurse services with respect to overhead (including rent, staff, billing and malpractice insurance) and other resources, and 3) recommend to Congress the appropriate relative reimbursement levels for professional services provided by physicians and nurses respectively.

Directs the Secretary, through the National Center for Nursing Research and in collaboration with the Health Care Financing Administration, to contract for studies to: 1) cost out nursing services within the acute care setting, relate current nurse intensity to current DRGs and ascertain differences in diverse parts of the country; 2) cost out hospital nursing services and study the benefits derived from setting up revenue and cost centers; and 3) gather, consolidate and disseminate qualitative and quantitative data regarding obstacles that these specialized nursing groups might encounter relative to direct reimbursement.

Directs the Administrator of the Health Care Financing Administration to provide a toll-free telephone hotline to handle difficulties which the specialized nursing groups might have relative to direct reimbursement.

Expands the scope of Peer Review Organizations (PRO) to include the nursing services performed by these specialized nursing groups (nurse practitioner, clinical nurse specialists, certified nurse-midwives and certified registered nurse anesthetists). Requires the PROs, to the maximum extent feasible, to consult with nurses from the specialty nursing groups and to utilize nurses from the respective specialty nursing groups when making final determinations of denial decisions with respect to a nurse from that specialty group.

LEGISLATION TO CONVEY TO COLUMBIA HOSPITAL FOR WOMEN CERTAIN PARCELS OF LAND IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

HON. RONALD V. DELLUMS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 28, 1989

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation to authorize the conveyance to the Columbia Hospital for Women of certain parcels of land in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes. The Columbia Hospital for Women is a nonprofit hospital that needs this legislation to build a National Women's Health Resource Center adjacent to the hospital.

Columbia Hospital for Women was chartered by Congress in 1866 and is the only hospital in the Washington area specializing in obstetrics, gynecology, and neonatology. It has through the years been a pioneer in many research and clinical services for women nationwide. These accomplishments include: the first area institution to offer mammography; the first area prenatal clinic; and the first U.S. hospital to use ultrasound technology. It is also Washington's largest birthing center.

The proposed National Women's Health Resource Center would be an institution devoted exclusively to women's health concerns and provide a mix of clinical, research, education, and information programs. The proposed national center will be a private nonprofit center totally devoted to the research of diseases that effect over 51 percent of the Nation's population. I see this as a unique opportunity for our Nation and this city and invite my colleagues to join me in cosponsoring this legislation.

H.R. —

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. CONVEYANCE OF LAND.

(a) ADMINISTRATOR OF GENERAL SERVICES.—Subject to sections 2 and 3, the Administrator of General Services is directed to convey, for $5,000,000, to the Columbia Hospital for Women (formerly Columbia Hospital for Women and Lying-in Asylum), Washington, District of Columbia, all right, title, and interest of the United States in and to those pieces or parcels of land in the District of Columbia, described in subsection (b), together with all improvements thereon and appurtenances thereto.

(b) PROPERTY DESCRIPTION.—The land referred to in subsection (a) was conveyed to the United States of America by deed dated May 2, 1888, from David Fergusson, widower, recorded in liber 1314, folio 102, of the land records of the District of Columbia, and is that portion of square numbered 25 in the city of Washington in the District of Columbia which was not previously conveyed to such hospital by the Act of June 28, 1952. Such property is more particulary described as follows: All that piece or parcel of land situated and lying in the city of Washington in the District of Columbia and known as part of square numbered 25, as laid down and distinguished on the plat or plan of said city as follows: Beginning for the same at the northeast corner of square being the corner formed by the intersection of the west line of Twenty-fourth Street West, with the south line of north M Street and running thence south with the line of said Twenty-fourth Street for the distance of two hundred and thirty-one feet ten inches, thence running west and parallel with said M Street for the distance of two hundred and thirty feet six inches and running thence north and parallel with the line of said Twenty-fourth Street for the distance of two hundred and thirty-one feet ten inches to the line of said M Street and running thence east with the line of said M Street to the place of beginning two hundred and thirty feet and six inches together with all the improvements, ways, easements, rights, privileges, and appurtenances to the same belonging or in anywise appertaining.

SEC. 2. LIMITATION OF CONVEYANCE.

No part of any land described in section 1 may be used for any purpose other than hospital, clinic, rehabilitation center, medical research institution, medical education institution, and domiciliary care institution purposes unless use for such other purpose is approved by the Administrator of General Services or by Act of Congress.

SEC. 3. USE BY UNITED STATES.

(a) USE BY UNITED STATES.—Subject to subsection (b), the United States shall retain the right to the use of the office building and parking lot located on lands conveyed pursuant to this Act. The Columbia Hospital for Women shall not be entitled to rent or other compensation from the United States for such use by the United States.

(b) NOTIFICATION AND TERMINATION.—The right to limit use by the United States under subsection (a) shall terminate on a date which is one year after the date of receipt by the Administrator of General Services of written notification that the Columbia Hospital for Women needs such property for hospital, clinic, rehabilitation center, medical research institution, medical education institution, or domiciliary care institution purposes.

SEC. 4. MODIFICATION OF RESTRICTION ON PRIOR CONVEYANCE OF LAND.

The Administrator of General Services is directed to take such actions as are necessary to modify the restriction which requires that lands conveyed by the Act of June 28, 1952 (Public Law 82-423) be used for hospital purposes and to allow such lands to be used only for hospital, clinic, rehabilitation center, medical research institution, medical education institution, and domiciliary care institution purposes, unless use of such lands for a different purpose is approved by the Administrator of General Services or by Act of Congress.

TRIBUTE TO CARLA ANGELICI

HON. LES ASPIN

OF WISCONSIN

Tuesday, February 28, 1989

Mr. ASPIN. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to a young American hero, Miss Carla Angelici. Carla, a 14-year-old girl from Pleasant Prairie, WI, displayed great courage and quick thinking on December 9, 1988, when she helped rescue a 6-year-old boy who had fallen through the ice on a neighborhood pond. Carla's actions have been praised by the Kenosha County Sheriff's Department and by her classmates at Lance Junior High School where she is an eighth grader. Now I am honored to join with my colleagues in the U.S. House of Representatives in commending Carla Angelici for her act of bravery and courage. Carla is an inspiration to us all.

UNITED STATES SHOULD STAND UP FOR HUMAN RIGHTS IN YUGOSLAVIA

HON. JAMES A. TRAFICANT, JR.

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 28, 1989

Mr. TRAFICANT. Mr. Speaker, today in the Communist nation of Yugoslavia, troops are occupying the province of Kosovo—because the people there simply desire self-determination.

Over 90 percent of the residents of Kosovo are native Albanians, yet this majority is being blatantly denied the right to govern their own affairs. Sadly, Mr. Speaker, the ethnic Albanians living in Kosovo have routinely been denied their basic rights of self-determination and cultural freedom.

While all of us in the free would are troubled by the events in Kosovo, even more troubling is the deafening silence of our State Department on this matter. Mr. Speaker, I do not take lightly the fact that the United States is the leader of the free world. We are a democracy founded on the principles of human rights and freedom. As such, the United States has an obligation to take a strong stand against any and all abuses of human rights—no matter where they occur.

The United States enjoys a close economic relationship with the Communist Government of Yugoslavia. Indeed, our own State Department urges American bankers to provide financing to Yugoslavian industry. The Yugoslavs turn around and use our money to send us Yugos and displace American workers. The time has come to tell Yugoslavia that if it wants to continue to enjoy its access to our lucrative market, then it must cleanup its human rights record.

Mr. Speaker, it would indeed be a tragic injustice if this country failed to stand up for the basic human rights of ethnic Albanians being oppressed in Kosovo. The United States cannot wear blinders when it comes to human rights. Our principles must never be sacrificed or compromised because of geopolitics.

Ethnic Albanians should have the same right to self-determination as other ethnic groups in Yugoslavia have.

I urge the State Department to break its silence and convey to the Yugoslavian Government America's deep concern over the plight of the ethnic Albanians in Kosovo.

WHAT IS BLACK HERITAGE REALLY?

HON. LOUIS STOKES

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 28, 1989

Mr. STOKES. Mr. Speaker, as you know, during the entire month of February our Nation celebrates Black History Month. This occasion affords us the opportunity to recognize the myriad contributions of Black Americans to our society. It also permits historians to explore our Black heritage and the relationship between African and human history.

I am pleased to share with my colleagues the following paper prepared by Dr. Eleanor Engram, director of the American Museum in Cleveland, OH. The paper, entitled, "What is Black Heritage—Really?," focuses on the need to acknowledge the correlation between African history and African-American culture. Dr. Engram believes that black children need to understand the continuity of their past and the achievements of their race to have a vision of their own future. She advocates the development of appropriate classroom materials and the use of museums to bridge the gaps between cultural experiences and African-American history.

Mr. Speaker, just recently I had an opportunity to hear Dr. Engram deliver a lecture on the significance of Black History Month. She captivated the audience with her unique presentation, which combined powerful oratory skills and innovative visuals.

During Black History Month, I am proud to salute Dr. Engram for her commitment to expanding our knowledge and appreciation of the African-American experience. I am pleased to share her article with my colleagues and encourage their reading of this important work.

WHAT IS BLACK HERITAGE—REALLY?

When we tell the story of African-American history, we go back as far as human history will allow because we have found that human history is African history. The January 11, 1988 issue of Newsweek magazine has on its cover an African Adam and Eve.

Anthropologists have been long aware that the evidence of the earliest human existence comes out of Africa. Now, at last, scientists agree that Africa was the place of origin of humanty—that the earliest human beings lived in Africa 250,000 to 140,000 years ago. Now we find confirmation in the work of archaeologists (scientists who examine the layers of the Earth for evidence of the past); paleontologists (scientists who analyze the skeletal remains of past life); geologists (scientists who analyze the earth for changes in its climate and their effects on the Earth and plant and animal life); and biochemists who study the nucleic acid chains of life.

The earliest human remains found to date are of a woman with black skin who lived in East Africa in Kenya. The same DNA in the cells of her fossil is in every human being on the planet today regardless of race. All of us, whether black, brown, red, yellow or white have common ancestors. We are all interrelated.

For thousands of years African people developed tools and culture and took them across the world as they migrated to the farthest corners of the globe. And wherever they went, we know that they believed that they were made in the image and likeness of God, because wherever they left evidence of the gods that they worshipped the gods looked like African people. That is, they had what we call "Africoid" features—thick lips, broad noses, and wooly hair.

Buddha's have been found in Southeast Asia, in Vietnam, in Egypt, in Japan, China, Java, Siam and India all bearing the characteristics of African people. These have all been dated between the sixth and tenth centuries A.D. Massive god heads have been found on the American continent and dated at 1,000 years before we are told Columbus discovered America. One such massive head from the Olmec culture of what we now call Mexico is in the American Museum of Natural History in New York.

In the earliest years of the Christian era, the icons of the church represented Madonna and Child as black. All over the world, and in most European cities, prior to the French Revolution, statues of Jesus and Mary were black.

Still to be found in Europe are Spain's Black Madonna, "Queen of the Pyrennees," Russia's Black Madonna, "Virgin of Kazan," Poland's Black Madonna, "Our Lady of Chestoczowa," Poland's holiest icon. It has been noted that more than 200,000 Poles make an annual pilgrimage to worship the Black Madonna.

There is a portrait of Jesus Christ, a black man, reposing in the museum in Madrid, Spain. It was painted by Medinacelli in the 12th century.

It was during the Renaissance that Europe began its exploration and discovered that everywhere they went there were people of color. For centuries, Europe traded with Africa and lived among its peoples enjoying the high levels of cultural development and attending Africa's universities. But by the 16th century, African people were being captured and sold into slavery. Artists began to portray the Madonna and Child as European. Napoleon made the statement "history is fables agreed upon," as he proceeded to disfigure the Sphinx and to destroy other evidence that all culture and civilization came out of Africa and that the architects of the great Sphinx and the great Pyramids, the inventors of the first calendar, and the first clock were of black African origin, Nubian and Kushite people.

Well before the sixth century, African people were the progenitors of philosophy, religion, the sciences of medicine, astronomy, mathematics, geometry, chemistry, biology, law, architecture, and physics. Greek and Roman knowledge came from the "African mystery systems." Plato, Euclid, Pythagoras, Aristotle and others who are believed to have provided the foundations for world civilization and culture all studied at the feet of African scholars. Hippocrates the father of medicine studied with "Imhotep," the true father of medicine. The Hippocratic oath had been vowed for thousands of years by African physicians. The scales of justice that symbolize our own legal systems are part of an ancient African belief that says to pass into the next world, one must be so free of injustice that one's heart must balance in one tray of the scale, with a feather, in the other tray.

The scales of justice are inscribed on the walls of a great pyramid constructed over 3,100 years ago.

There is evidence that iron mining existed in Africa 43,000 years ago. A mine discovered in Swaziland has been dated as 43,000 years old. The evidence that African people founded the steel industry is supported by the discovery of a 2,000 year old smelting furnace in Zaire. Nowhere else on the face of the globe was iron being melted and molded 2,000 years ago. And from this tradition, iron workers were taken across the globe to give cities like New Orleans, with its ornate iron work, their very character. All over the world skilled iron workers were black, from whence derived the term "blacksmith."

There is evidence of a mathematical system being used 8,000 years ago. The Ishango bone evidencing that system, found in Zaire is 8,000 years old.

While we think manned flight began with Wilbur and Orville Wright in the early 20th century, in Kitty Hawk, NC, there is evidence that African aeronautics existed 2,000 years ago. A model glider dated 2,000 years old was found in the Cairo Museum. The model bears a striking resemblance to our modern Hercules transport.

So they didn't bring jungle bunnies to this country, they brought skilled craftsmen, iron workers, wood workers. The furniture industries of North and South Carolina were developed with people who had centuries of woodworking skills. While slaves, we were defined as subhuman, and not permitted to enter into contract with the Government. We were therefore refused patents for the many tools we had invented. However, right on the heels of slavery, during the 1870's, 1880's, and 1890's, African-Americans invented and were awarded patents for thousands of tools that we all use and take for granted. Jan Maetzliger's invention of the shoe lasting machine guaranteed that "all God's children got shoes," for with this invention, industry was able to mass produce shoes. Elijah McCoy's invention of the graphite lubricator resulted in a mechanism so important to the railway industry that it led to the coining of the expression "The Real McCoy."

African-Americans invented and were awarded patents for the refrigerator, the clothes drier, the typewriter, the fountain pen, the lawn mower, the lawn sprinkler, the printing press, the elevator, the cooling unit, the horseshoe, the bridle, the saddle, the lantern and the animal trap, the wheels for the wagon train, the running gear for the wagon train, the smokestack for the locomotive, the wheels for the locomotive, the railway telegraph. When America says she is great because she won the West, could it have been done without the horseshoe, the bridle, the saddle? When America says she is great because the railways criss-crossed the country carrying cargo from one end to the other, could it have been done without the wheels for the locomotive, the smokestack, the railway telegraph? When we say our trucking industry made the country great because we can carry refrigerated food from California to Maine without its spoiling, could it be done without the air conditioning unit that was invented by an African-American?

Images of Africans and African-Americans perpetuated by stereotypes in the media, in school books and in our minds have caused us to literally "shrink," to hide from the reality of our great and noble contributions of the past and our potential of the present and future. Along with this shrinking, we have learned to minimize the potential of the continent that has been mother to the world.

Africa, a continent, not a country, is a continent so geographically expansive that it can contain the continental United States, India, China, Europe, New Zealand and a few smaller countries. Africa is a continent so populous (560 million people), that in Nigeria, one of more than 50 African countries, there are 107 million people, in Egypt, 50 million people, in Ethiopia, 44 million people, in Kenya, 29 million people.

It is absolutely essential that the next generation have knowledge of the evidence of the great and noble contributions of people of African descent. They are the runners to whom we must pass the baton of the future. They are the generation that will have the responsibility of bringing peace to the planet and if that is to happen it will be because we have educated them for a new leadership hallmarked by intercultural awareness and respect.

INTRODUCTION OF JOINT RESOLUTION TO COMMEMORATE THE 25TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE WILDERNESS ACT

HON. MORRIS K. UDALL

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 28, 1989

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased today to introduce a joint resolution designating the week of September 3, 1989 as National Wilderness Week.

This year marks the silver anniversary of the signing of the Wilderness Act. The act established the first system of protected wilderness anywhere in the world. The National Wilderness Preservation System now includes 90 million acres, acres where in the words of the act, "the Earth and its community of life are untrammeled by man, where man himself is a visitor who does not remain."

I am proud to be a part of the legacy of wilderness preservation and am proud to introduce this joint resolution which commemorates our Nation's continued commitment to the preservation of wilderness.

Wilderness allows future generations the chance to save and to hold open spaces vital to the life of our country. Spaces which allow our kids to sit in a quiet spot along a river or among the trees, to watch and to dream. Spaces which allow ourselves to sit and to see the beauty and the grandeur of our world without the distractions and intrusions of our daily lives. Spaces which enable us to preserve our natural heritage.

As we pay tribute to the gains we have made we recognize that many more acres remain unprotected. Many areas already designated are coming under increasing pressure because the results of adverse development are being exported into wilderness areas—acid rain is one example. In addition, Congress has yet to complete its job of review and designation of wilderness on BLM, forest and park lands in many States. These tasks require a renewed dedication and effort by all of us to insure that this vital and unique part of our American heritage is preserved and extended. The vision of the future includes continued expansion of the wilderness system in the next 25 years.

Mr. Speaker, designating a National Wilderness Week expresses our appreciation for the wilderness we have preserved, gives us the opportunity to honor the people, Republicans and Democrats alike, who have worked to preserve wilderness areas, and allows us to renew our commitment to the preservation and expansion of protected wilderness areas.

VISION FOR IMPROVING HIGHER EDUCATION

HON. NICHOLAS MAVROULES

OF MASSACHUSETTS

Tuesday, February 28, 1989

Mr. MAVROULES. Mr. Speaker, throughout my term in office I have held the improvement and expansion of education among my highest priorities. It is my firm belief that, in the long run, a society is only as strong as its educational system. We must fight to ensure equal opportunity for education in order to protect the academic, social, scientific, and military soundness of our future.

For this reason, I am submitting to the RECORD a proposal prepared by former Senator Paul E. Tsongas that outlines his vision for improving public higher education in Massachusetts. His proposal is comprehensive and insightful and I feel certain that it would serve as an excellent model for educational systems nationwide.

A PLAN FOR EXCELLENCE

(By Paul E. Tsongas)

PREFACE

This proposal is not intended to be the product of my expertise in educational policy. While I may have some knowledge about issues of higher education, there are thousands of our fellow citizens who are far more expert than I.

This, proposal instead, reflects my experience in observing and trying to understand two basic phenomena, human behavior and institutional behavior. First, after 15 years in politics I have had to draw conclusions about how people behave and why. What motivates them? What discourages them? What kind of environment allows them to flourish? Secondly, I have had broad exposure to the dynamics of institutions, both corporate and public. How do groups deal with the outside world? How do you build on enthusiasm and dedication? How do you overcome inertia? If I have any expertise it lies here in this experience base and thus this proposal.

I. WHY EXCELLENCE IN PUBLIC HIGHER EDUCATION?

A. Traditional Rationale.—The rationale for any system of higher education has long been agreed upon. Some of those reasons are obvious:

1. An enlightened society;
2. Cultural enhancement of decision makers;
3. Societal harmony through opportunity for economic and social mobility;
4. Pursuit of intellectual creativity; and
5. Career development.

B. Current Realpolitik Rationale.—But in 1989 there is a new driving force—a rationale that speaks to very real concerns that affect all of us. The new dominant need is to insure the survival of the American standard of living and quality of life by achieving true competitiveness in international trade. This requires, above all, a superbly trained, educated and motivated workforce. Only an educational system committed to excellence can produce this workforce and its leadership. This requires a general understanding that our nation has begun a decline toward eventual second-class world economic status. The race is on with the Pacific rim nations and Europe 1992. Our federal budget and trade deficits speak to how poorly we are doing. This battle simply cannot be lost. Here is where we in higher education can serve as true warriors against a threat common to all our people.

II. HOW?

Commit the gubernatorial, legislative, academic, business and community leadership of Massachusetts towards one common and stated goal: To have the best public higher education system in the United States by the year 2000.

This goal however must begin with the Board of Regents. I believe the Board is prepared to carry out its role in this mission.

III. WHAT ARE THE OBSTACLES TO EXCELLENCE?

A. Mindset.—We must face the reality that the attitude in Massachusetts is that of a two class higher education system—the privates are the first class passengers and the publics are back in the economy section. This mindset is a self-fulfilling prophesy. We have to think differently, i.e. like California ("Berkeley is equal to Stanford, and should be equal to Stanford.") We have to say and believe, for example, that UMass-Amherst can complete with Harvard and ULowell can compete with M.I.T. The students and the faculty and the Administration in each institution must believe to their core that they are in the best educational environment possible. Sure it's a long road, but achieving it is just a matter of collective will. (In addition to the institutional dynamics issues presented in this paper, it will be necessary to deal with the serious structural and academic matters that the Regents have been studying. These issues which involve such thorny items as the academic mission of each institution and the relationships between institutions. Much work has been done on these matters and the recommendations will soon be presented to the public.)

B. Our Pre-Perestroika System.—All of the incentives have historically been counter-productive. Until recently, under our system, rewards (i.e. funding) are received by every institution based on equal increases irrespective of merit or performance. This is basic socialism in a free enterprise country. (Gorbachev would understand the dynamics here perfectly.) The only way to get more than your equal share is to achieve political clout on Beacon Hill, the Governor's office or the Board of Regents. We need to introduce performance based funding allocations. In other words, excel and you'll get more funding, botch it and we'll cut your funds. In the private sector, corporate survival depends on a system of accountability. It is accountability that allows for the agony and ecstasy choice that will incentivize both the institutional presidents and their boards of trustees. The Regents have begun to move in this direction under the guidance of Chancellor Frank Jenifer. This movement should be applauded and accelerated. The dynamics of merit pay increases, challenge grants for excellence, tuition retention, etc., must become part of the system. Let's find out who the superstars are. And let's find out who are not.

C. Political Considerations.—The thorniest of all the issues that confront public higher education is the perception that political interference is the norm. Talk to the average Massachusetts resident and you will hear deep concerns about political considerations undermining academic decision making.

Those of us who have served inside the system know that the rampant political interference of the past has largely abated. But the perception remains and it severely taints the image of the system. This taint has done serious damage and continues to do serious damage. It must be removed.

We cannot allow even limited political considerations to deprofessionalize and demoralize our institutions of public higher education. An ethic which provides for any decision making based on political connections rather than merit totally undermines the hope of true excellence. It creates anger, frustration, bitterness and a sense of unfairness that corrodes personal self-respect and institutional self-esteem. The powers-that-be need to agree to a merit-based philosophy of decision making within the institutions, as well as on the larger issues of the missions of individual institutions and their structure. Form should follow need. Form should not run counter to need. We call upon the legislature to formalize this commitment and put to rest the fears of our fellow citizens. To debate about the correctness of perceptions is fruitless. In this case perceptions are truly as powerful as reality. Let us put this issue behind us.

D. Corporate Indifference.—Corporations, their leaders and their boards of directors are involved with and care deeply about the success of private higher education. Corporate CEO's serve on the boards of private universities, and academics serve on corporate boards. (On the corporate boards on which I serve, there are eight current or former academics. All but one are from private universities.) There is an unstated, perhaps even unconscious, corporate philosophy that states that marrying into the privates is extremely beneficial and marrying into the publics is asking for trouble. Generally, we have not created an environment to counter this fear. This must change. Massachusetts corporations must interlock with public higher education. In return, the publics must create the perception and the reality that such interlocking will be in the self-interest of both. We need to appeal to the corporate sense of enlightened self-interest. We cannot expect them to act out of a sense of intimidation or philanthropy. We have to convince them that they can do well by doing good.

The skills within corporate Massachusetts are truly immense. They must be applied within our system of public higher education. Our skills are not inconsiderable either. Corporate Massachusetts must utilize our skills as well.

E. Community Indifference.—Some of our public colleges and universities have been very sensitive to the needs of their host communities and regions. Generally this has been brought about by institution presidents who value the ethic of community service. But, sadly, all too many of our public colleges and universities have been negligent when it comes to developing a broad cadre of fervent supporters in their respective communities. The attitude has often been one of existing apart from the host communities, not being an integral part of them. In some instances there has been an arrogance, indeed, a disdain, particularly toward some of the older urban communities. The people in these communities obviously pick up on this instantly and the resentment is deep and powerful. Not surprisingly then, these people don't care about what happens to these institutions. Indeed, in some cases, they are delighted to see misfortune visit them in the form of budget cuts, newspaper criticism or political hatcheting. Public higher education academics must care about and be involved in the communities of this stage. They must serve on boards, reach out to relevant causes, arrange tutoring, and the like. But most importantly they must link up to the public elementary and secondary school systems across Massachusetts. There cannot be excellence in public higher education if there is chaos and decay in public K through 12.

Academics, along with the corporate sector, must adopt the public school system and bring it into shape. The ULowell field studies program suggests how this can be done. By becoming an integral and beneficial component of our communities, our institutions will develop a committed constituency of dedicated supporters. (That would be a nice change of pace.) I need not say how helpful that can be on Beacon Hill. The institutions must develop a system of rewards and incentives for community service. (A system of punishment for non-involvement should not be established. It will only drive away quality academics who just were never made for such involvement.) Each institution should be seen as the heart or soul of the community and not some unnecessary appendage whose vitality or indeed survival is thought to be irrelevant.

F. Alumni.—There is just no way to justify the reality that many alumni of public colleges act differently from alumni of private colleges. There just is not the sense that "dear old ——— depends on my contributions and participation." It's not a lack of pride, it's a lack of psychic linkage. Look at alumni fundraising. The general sense of the public graduate is "thanks, see you later." The privates suffer from the same absence of graduate responsibility and gratitude but they are saved by a minority core of loyal, giving and engaged alumi. The publics have a similar core but it's much smaller and simply not adequate. One can take heart at the record of UMass-Amherst, Salem State, Fitchburg State, to take three examples, but over all the record is not acceptable. The alumni of all our public higher education institutions must assume some of the burden of seeking excellence. Each institution should establish methods and goals and incentives to bring about that kind of alumni devotion.

G. The Board of Trustees.—The board of trustees is the most critical component of any institution, public or private. A mediocre board will inevitably result in a mediocre institution or corporation. The reverse is also true. A superb board will expect and demand and force excellence. The system of selecting the members of our boards of trustees in public higher education leaves the issue of quality appointments to sheer chance at best. Too often in the past this process has been subject to political pressures that lessen the chances of excellence. Even a governor such as our current one, committed as he is to the appointment of quality, can benefit from a process that minimizes the possibility of political interference. We need a system that insures quality. We need the same kind of appointment review process that was established for the judiciary for exactly the same reasons. There should be established an Academic Review Panel modeled after the judicial review panel. It would create criteria for selection based on categories (i.e., community representation, financial and audit skills, management experience, academic and policy perspective). It would then receive names from every source (including the Governor and Beacon Hill) and narrow the list down to qualified candidates. The Governor would then make the final decision. Criteria would vary by the mission of the institution (ULowell, for example, would have a greater percentage of technologists given its focus on engineering and computer science) but the criteria would keep the board in balance and containing all the requisite backgrounds and skills. Such a system is applauded by all relative to the judiciary. We need the same process. It would send a strong, clear, unmistakable message to each institution that sooner or later there will be a majority of board members who will demand excellence. This is accountability and performance-based evaluation at its best because it is inside the institution. Of all the recommendations, this is the most important.

IV. ACTIONS REQUIRED

A. Governor and Legislature.—A bill enacted by the General Court and signed into law by the Governor:

1. Committing to excellence in public higher education establishing the specific goal of "best in America" by 2000.

2. Reaffirming the principle of open access into the system by all our citizens, while remaining vigilant in maintaining the quality of our academic standards.

3. Calling for public higher education to involve itself in the community, particularly the public school system.

4. Establishing the Academic Review Panel.

5. Calling on corporate Massachusetts to interlock with public higher education through serving on academic boards of trustees, inviting academics onto their corporate board of directors and to explore the numerous opportunities for exchange relationships at every level.

6. Reaffirming the principle that decision-making within the public higher education system should take place free of any political consideration.

7. Endorsing performance-based evaluation as one of the criteria for levels of institutional funding and endorsing the notion that the criteria should be openly arrived at and periodically reviewed.

8. Calling upon alumni of public higher education institutions to strengthen their relationship with their respective alma maters by a commitment to fundraising and participation equal to that of any private institution.

V. THE MECHANISM

Multually Reinforced Triangle [1] (MRT)

Theory: Make each sector of the triangle a valued partner in the mission of each other sector. Establish enlightened self-interest wherein each sector sees its own success and/or survival linked to the success and/or survival of each other sector. Create standards of excellence in all three sectors to allow for respect across the triangle.

CONCLUSION

If the political powers embrace this concept; if the corporate powers participate with enthusiasm; if the media endorses the concept and keeps public higher education central in the public discourse, and; if the citizens of Massachusetts demand excellence;

We will have the best public higher education system in America;

We will be a model for other States;

We will serve our country by helping to give it the weapons necessary to achieve economic prosperity through true international trade competitiveness.

I am ready for the challenge. I hope we can join hands and share in this adventure.

POLITICS AND STARVATION IN THE SUDAN

HON. MICKEY LELAND

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 28, 1989

Mr. LELAND. Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of the resolution before this body which reflects the growing concern of so many House and Senate colleagues on the worsening famine which is enveloping the Sudan. It is, of course, always a tragedy when anyone in this world of such abundant resources succumbs to starvation. It is a tragedy beyond comprehension when hundreds of thousands, perhaps as many as a million, people—largely children—starve to death as a result of politics and a conflict in which they are pawns, not participants. But such is the situation in the Sudan.

Exact numbers are uncertain, but there seems little doubt that well over one quarter million southern Sudanese perished in 1988 as a direct result of the dislocation, destruction and chaos caused by civil war. Perhaps a million have starved to death since 1983. These deaths were of civilians, not combattants. These deaths were of people in the way of conflict, people cut off from outside relief by the conflict, people who were denied food, water or medicine because of ethnic origin or religious or political affiliation.

The southern Sudanese who perished from famine in 1988 were lost because of the indifference and hostility of government and rebel authorities—military and civilian—who proved to be quite willing to use food as a weapon in their conflict. Access to those in need has repeatedly been denied relief agencies as both sides maneuver and manipulate the affected population for their own gain. The abuses of the concept of safe passage of relief items have been well documented. Relief planes and truck convoys have been the target of gunfire. Private relief agencies have been expelled by the government and harassed by the rebels. Food for the dislocated population has been repeatedly stolen by soldiers.

The Select Committee on Hunger and the House Foreign Affairs Africa Subcommittee conducted a joint hearing last July to examine the Sudan famine—and United States Government policies in response to that famine. The findings of that hearing were sobering. It appeared clear from evidence presented that the government of the Sudan, an ally of the United States supported by United States military, economic, development and food assistance, was less than determined that relief assistance reach those not clearly aligned politically. A pattern seemed evident of a government at best indifferent to the plight of many of its citizens. This pattern was clear from a long series of attempts for the most part successful—on the part of government authorities to preclude effective relief operations simultaneous with orchestrated attempts to have the international community condemn the SPLA (Sudanese People's Liberation Army—the rebel forces battling the government) for blocking relief efforts. As discouraging as evidence concerning the government's use of food as a weapon was, the lack of resolve of our own State Department to forge a more satisfactory response to the emergency was more so. The U.S. Government had seemingly allowed itself to be manipulated by Sudanese authorities into public silence about outrageous acts administered by government agents. Our relief efforts did not extend to those in need behind rebel lines. There was no indication of pressure from Washington on the Khartoum government to allow relief efforts to expand. There was little evidence of a plan to break through the barriers to getting relief to those in need.

The forebodings of catastrophe in the Sudan experienced by the participants in that hearing proved to be justified. Congressional delegations and relief agency experts over the past 8 months have verified the extent of the Sudan emergency and documented its causes. The truth is thousands of Sudanese civilians are needlessly losing their lives as politicians and field commanders sacrifice them as pawns in this conflict.

We cannot easily alter the situation in the Sudan. But we can be certain that no one doubts the position of the U.S. Government on the question of using food as a political weapon. We must be heard condemning this practice by whomever may be attempting it—and heard in a loud voice. We must be certain that our own relief efforts extend to those located across arbitrary political lines. We must resolve that the complexity of the situation will not fatigue us but, instead, that the horror of it will result in our determined efforts to make certain that these children not starve.

It is important to note that the relief operations launched by the U.S. Government—specifically those of AID's Office of Foreign Disaster Assistance—and the private relief agencies within the past few months have succeeded in reaching many desperate people in the Sudan with food, medicine, and a chance for survival. These efforts prove that more can be done. We in Congress must now resolve that more will be done.

The passage of a Congressional resolution will not, by itself, satisfy our obligations to the victims of famine in the Sudan. But passage of this resolution is a clear signal that we cannot be among those indifferent to the tragedy. I strongly urge my colleagues to support this measure.

IN RECOGNITION OF LT. COL. JEFF ROCK, A LEADER OF SOLDIERS

HON. EARL HUTTO

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 28, 1989

Mr. HUTTO. Mr. Speaker, on March 1, 1989, Alan J. "Jeff" Rock will be promoted to lieutenant colonel in the U.S. Army in recognition of his potential for increased responsibility within our Nation's oldest service. Shortly thereafter, Lieutenant Colonel Rock will depart Washington to assume command of the 2d battalion, 27th infantry, at Fort Ord, CA, having served since August 1987 in the Secretary of the Army's Legislative Liaison Office.

Commissioned in 1971 as a lieutenant of infantry from the U.S. Military Academy at West Point, Lieutenant Colonel Rock has had a history of command and staff assignments of increasing responsibility and of great value to the Army and the Nation. For example, he taught leadership training at the U.S. Military Academy from 1980 to 1983. He was later selected to attend the Marine Command and Staff College in 1983–84.

In recognition of his leadership qualities, he became executive officer of the 1st battalion, 32d infantry, at Fort Ord in 1984.

Most recently, he has served as a program officer responsible for the Army's liaison with the Congress concerning critical procurement programs and ammunition issues. His service has proven invaluable to the operation of the Readiness Subcommittee of the House Armed Services Committee. While we don't agree with Jeff on his choice of teams when Notre Dame plays Penn State, it is with the gratitude and best wishes of this body that Jeff Rock begins his tenure as a lieutenant colonel and the remainder of his surely bright Army career.

In 1975 he was presented with the "Others" Award by the Salvation Army for his devoted service to the needy.

Dr. Sobel also served his country through his service in the National Guard, where he attained the rank of lieutenant. He is a member of the American Legion Memorial Post and the Jewish War Veterans.

He is a member of Temple Shalom, Succasunna, NJ, where he celebrated his second Bar Mitzvah at the age of 83.

Mr. Speaker, above and beyond all of this, what is best known about Dr. Sobel by those whose lives he has touched for nearly a century is that he is truly a compassionate, caring man who has dedicated his life to helping others. Most assuredly, through his tireless and dedicated efforts to all of mankind, Dr. Sobel has made his community, his State, our Nation and, indeed, our world, a better place to live.

It is with great pride then, Mr. Speaker, that I ask you to join me in saluting a great man, physician, and humanitarian, Dr. I. Jerome Sobel of Passaic, NJ.

TRIBUTE TO MAYOR CARMEN ROSAMILIA

HON. JOSEPH M. McDADE

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 28, 1989

Mr. McDADE. Mr. Speaker, it is with deep sadness that I report to my colleagues the death of Carmen Rosamilia, mayor of Renovo, PA, one of the finest public servants and warmest individuals I have ever known.

I first met Mayor Rosamilia about 7 years ago when his town was reapportioned into my congressional district. On my initial visit to Renovo, the mayor greeted me with open arms and an invitation to work with him in bringing new job opportunities to a town where the unemployment rate reached 85 percent after the major factory closed. He showed me his community with great pride, introduced me to Renovo's citizens and enthusiastically pledged to work with me in rebuilding the local economy. I very vividly remember a meeting he arranged for me with community leaders in the warmth of his own home.

Carmen had a deep concern for the people of his area based on nearly a half century of public service. He served for 20 years as a Renovo Borough councilman and for 27 years as the mayor. It is difficult to imagine Renovo without his able leadership and warm, dynamic presence. He was a fixture in his community not only as a civic leader, but as a businessman who owned and operated his own barber shop for most of his life.

Mayor Rosamilia was close to the people who elected him year after year. The citizens of Renovo respected him as a mayor who shared their concerns and they liked him as a neighbor who had a personal stake in the well-being of the community. He was known as a dedicated family man and as a public official who committed his time, talent, and energy to helping his area.

Carmen lived his entire life in Renovo. He was born and educated there, and raised his own family in the community he loved. Mayor Rosamilia is survived by his wife of over 50 years, Jenniemay, one son, two daughters, seven grandchildren, and two great-grandchildren.

There can be no greater tribute to a man than to say that he made a lasting contribution to his family and his community. Mayor Rosamilia was such a man. It was a privilege to know him and to work with him. I join the citizens of the Renovo area is paying tribute to a remarkable man. We mourn his passing, and we will deeply miss him.

CONGRESSIONAL ENCROACHMENT IN FOREIGN POLICY CAUSED REFUGEE PROBLEM

HON. GERALD B.H. SOLOMON

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 28, 1989

Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Speaker, the next time we recess I might respectfully suggest you drive down to Brownsville, near the Mexican border, to inspect the fruits of your labor to be de facto Secretary of State.

It ought to make a great photo op, you shaking hands of thousands of Nicaraguan refugees grateful for your success in helping their Marxist masters consolidate their revolution and export it all over Central America.

This flood of refugees—now about 2,000 a week—began a year ago, precisely after Congress pulled the rug out from under the Contras, and less than a year after Lt. Col. Oliver North predicted it.

Speaking of predictions, Mr. Speaker, it appears increasingly likely that El Salvador is next on the list. Then it will be a matter of predicting whether Costa Rica will go before Honduras.

A recent Wall Street Journal editorial describes the tragedy with its usual eloquence. On the same day, a Peter LaBarbera article in the Washington Times described a Heritage Foundation symposium on our "Imperial Congress," which the participants agreed is causing a constitutional crisis. The article and editorial go well together, one illuminating the other.

It is my pleasure to place both in today's CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

[From the Wall Street Journal, Feb. 23, 1989]

JIM WRIGHT'S BUS PEOPLE

"It won't take 20 years, Senator. It will take a whole lot less. The consolidation of the Communist regime in Managua will result in the spread of that revolution as they themselves have advocated. You will see democracy perish in the rest of Central America, a flood of refugees crossing the American borders and, potentially, the construction of a Berlin-type wall along the Rio Grande to keep people out."—Lt. Col. Oliver North, in response to a question by Sen. Orrin Hatch during the Iran-Contra hearings, July 12, 1987.

Talk about prophecy. TV viewers in recent days have been treated to the sight of exactly what Col. North predicted, thousands of Central Americans pouring across the U.S. southern border into Texas, asking for political asylum. Harassed immigration officials are setting up detention centers. The only thing missing is Col. North's Berlin Wall, but there is a plan for a deep ditch near San Diego.

Such are the consequences of the Jim Wright foreign policy. Jim Wright, you will remember, is the fellow who snatched away Central American policy from Ronald Reagan some years back on the grounds that the Speaker of the House is far better equipped than the President to command the diplomatic service, the CIA, United States air and ground forces and all the ships at sea. Since then, the United States has not had a Central American policy, or at least not anything that might give pause to some of the more prominent thugs of the region, such as Danny Ortega, Tomas Borge and Manuel Noriega. Having been denied security by Speaker Wright, citizens of the region are coming to seek it in the U.S.

Many will be disappointed, Immigration and Naturalization Service Commissioner Alan C. Nelson announced Monday that thousands would be held in a tent city outside Brownsville while awaiting word on their applications for political asylum.

Previously, Nicaraguan refugees were automatically granted work permits and allowed to travel while their asylum requests were being processed. It was assumed that their fears of persecution back home were well-founded. Many have been working and paying taxes in the U.S. But now they and new arrivals face deportation. Mr. Nelson said Monday that Nicaraguans were exaggerating their fears, but that depends on whether you regard economic collapse and political oppression as fearful.

The current flight began last spring, shortly after Congress pulled the plug on the Nicaraguan Contras. That convinced many thousands that the communists, with their heavy shipments of East-bloc weapons, would prevail and spread their influence, which is what they are doing. So those thousands packed their belongings and began the long bus ride up through Guatemala and Mexico to South Texas, hoping to move from there to Miami, Los Angeles or other communities where their fellow expatriates have found refuge. More than 40,000 Central Americans—over whelmingly Nicaraguan—have taken this route over the past six months. They're now coming in at 2,000 a week.

The INS believes it can stop the flow with the "Brownsville Pen." But that is doubtful, even if the border patrol begins corralling refugees like cattle. Says Mark Schneider, a lawyer who works with the refugees in Harlingen, Texas: "It's a show; the INS people think they can deter refugees from coming by talking tough. But folks around here know that they will pass into the States through other regions. The only reason they've been choosing this as the point of entry is that it's a cheap, $15 bus ride from Mexico City to Matamoros. And then it's a hop across the border into Brownsville."

Nevertheless, thousands now face the prospect of being sent home. Deportation notices are being sent out in Nicaraguan refugee communities.

Meanwhile, the Nicaraguan communists are pursuing their "revolution without borders." Huge shipments of land mines and other terrorist weapons arrive in Nicaragua for guerrillas in neighboring countries. Latin terrorists claim responsibility for bombings and assassinations from base camps in Managua. Nicaragua itself is a ruin. El Salvador, where the Carter administration administered a big dose of socialism as an ill-considered antidote to communism, has also declined economically despite huge infusions of American cash. Nicaragua's armed anti-communist opposition, the Contras, has been sidelined by a lack of support from the U.S. Congress. So now a nation is in flight to Jim Wright's back doorstep, just as Ollie North predicted. Perhaps George Bush could arrange a trip to Brownsville for Speaker Wright, just to remind him of the consequences of his efforts to appease the left.

CONGRESS USURPING PRESIDENT'S AUTHORITY, SCHOLARS SAY

(By Peter LaBarbera)

Congress has expanded its powers far beyond traditional limits, causing a "constitutional crisis" in the United States, a group of scholars said yesterday.

"Congress is increasingly an administrative body," said John Marini, adjunct fellow at The Claremont Institute, a California-based conservative think tank. "It competes with the [president] in terms of running the bureaucracy and basically undermines the Constitutions' separation of powers."

Mr. Marini made the comments at a Heritage Foundation symposium promoting the newly released book he co-edited, "The Imperial Congress: Crisis in the Separation of Powers."

"Congress should return to its traditional role of making the laws—what it is not doing, and what the Constitution says it should be doing," said Thomas West, a visiting scholar at the Heritage Foundation and a contributor to the book.

Mr. West said that despite President Bush's friendly overtures to Congress, he will soon find his programs thwarted by Capitol Hill and will be forced to campaign publicly against the body to defend his wishes.

"[Mr. Bush] will face a choice: either to cooperate with this 10-year trend [of decreasing presidential clout] . . . or do something to increase his presidential power," he said.

Mr. West added that the best deterrent to Congress' abuse of power is public opposition, like that directed at the recently proposed 50 percent congressional pay raise. The raise was slated to go into effect without a vote until a barrage of grass-roots criticism forced Congress to vote it down.

Mr. Marini, a political science professor at the University of Nevada, said past presidents from Richard Nixon to Ronald Reagan contributed to the crisis by acquiescing to a draining of their constitutionally mandated duty to administer the law.

"The executive branch has not protected its prerogatives in the way the Founding Fathers thought ambitious men who reached the highest office in the land would, "Mr. Marini said.

He and several other contributors to the book who addressed the conference urged Mr. Bush to "fight for his constitutional powers."

"President Bush must do, in short, what President Reagan never did . . ., take responsibility for upholding the institution of the presidency," said Gordon Jones, executive director of the House Republican Policy Committee and co-editor of "The Imperial Congress."

He called disappointing Mr. Reagan's "tendency . . . to compromise all too quickly" on laws that upheld congressional powers, which the former president theoretically favored abolishing.

The scholars assailed congressional "micromanagement" of federal policy, including private deals between congressmen and federal agencies and the accumulation of extraordinary powers by entrenched representatives.

The book cites the case of Rep. Jamie Whitten, Mississippi Democrat, the longest-serving member of the House who has been chairman of the Appropriations' subcommittee on agriculture for 38 of the last 40 years. Due to his continual influence on federal farm programs, Mr. Whitten has gained a reputation as "permanent secretary of agriculture," the book says.

It quotes Mr. Whitten as saying: "Don't you see? All anyone ever wants is special advantage over the next fellow. Understand that, and you've understood the intent of every law ever passed."

The book calls the lawmaker "an earnest proponent of using the law to give a special advantage to his favored constituency."

Mr. Marini said inadequate media attention on the workings of Congress—especially at the district level—has aided the slow acquisition of power by the legislative branch. This, he noted, has helped make incumbents safer than ever from election defeat.

"Rarely do you find the local press critical of its representative unless he finds himself in trouble," Mr. Marini said, "Most local reporting tends to rely on the press releases of the congressman's staff."

Mr. Jones said the congressional trend toward issueless campaigns and away from taking a strong public stand on a divisive issue has led to elections that turn not "on which policy is best for the nation" but on who can get most from the federal bureaucracy.

"You have a situation in which the congressman helps create the mess and then goes home and says he can do more for his constituents in dealing with the bureaucratic maze than his opponent," Mr. Jones said, "It's incredibly cynical."

Mr. Jones, like other participants yesterday, said Congress is not likely to reform itself. The scholars urged the president to veto legislation that chips away at his authority as well as any legislation he believes is unconstitutional.

They also called for greater media and public focus on the behind-the-scenes dealing of congressmen.

THE STUDENT FINANCIAL AID IMPROVEMENT ACT OF 1989

HON. MARGE ROUKEMA

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 28, 1989

Mrs. ROUKEMA. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing the Student Financial Aid Improvement Act of 1989. This bill will ensure that our scarce Federal student aid dollars will go to those students who need the most help with school expenses while saving millions for taxpayers. The provisions of the bill will modify the formula used to compute eligibility for student assistance. One major change that the bill calls for is the exemption of the net value of a family's principal residence from the student aid eligibility formula. The reasons for this change are compelling. In my district, the Fifth District of New Jersey, as well as in many other metropolitan areas of the country, the booming real estate market of the past decade has made many families increasingly house rich but cash poor. Families are told they have too much equity in their homes for their children to qualify for Federal student financial aid, yet these same families cannot afford to carry a home equity loan. We should not hold eligibility for loans hostage to rising real estate values.

Other provisions of the bill will ensure that those students claiming to be independent of parental support truly are independent before being eligible for greater aid awards. The proposed legislation will close a loophole that now allows any student not claimed as a dependent by his or her parents to automatically qualify as an independent student in the third and fourth years of school simply by receiving the full amount of a guaranteed student loan as qualifying independent income. Closing this loophole will avoid possible fraud and misuse of scarce financial resources.

My bill further amends the Higher Education Act of 1965 by eliminating inconsistencies that can result in the double-counting of student earnings as both resources and assets. Under current needs analysis, a student's prior year's earnings are added to any portion of that income placed in a savings account and the total is used in the formula to determine available assets. This serves as a disincentive for students to save. While a student is expected to contribute to the cost of his or her education, the needs formula should not count the same resources twice.

Another potential area for fraud and misuse addressed by the bill pertains to students' parents who enroll in college courses simply to use these costs as an offset to the amount they are expected to contribute to their child's education. The bill stipulates that the parents must attend school on at least a half-time basis in a degree or certification program in order to deduct these expenses when calculating their expected contribution to their child's education.

A final provision of the Student Financial Aid Improvement Act of 1989 which I introduce today explicitly permits financial aid administrators to exercise a greater amount of professional discretion in assisting low-income independent students with families. Recognizing that uniform application of the standard maintenance allowance can result in denial of Federal student assistance to otherwise qualified low-income students with families, Congress should allow financial aid administrators to adjust the cost of attendance figures to better serve those who truly deserve Federal financial assistance.

CHERRY HILL MAYOR RECEIVES AWARD FROM B'NAI B'RITH

HON. JAMES J. FLORIO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 28, 1989

Mr. FLORIO. Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I take this opportunity to bring to the attention of my colleagues Mayor Susan Bass Levin, of Cherry Hill, NJ, who on April 2, 1989, will receive the B'nai B'rith Community Service Award.

Elected the second woman mayor in the township's history, Susan took office in January 1988 with an innovative and straight-forward approach to public service. From the outset, it was apparent that the township's new chief executive was willing and able to make the tough decisions that the job demanded. Indeed, the administration has consistently delivered efficient and effective municipal services with a special emphasis upon an open means of communication between the mayor's office and the citizens of Cherry Hill.

This open-door policy has allowed the township's residents to have a strong and valuable voice in governmental affairs. From the establishment of citizen advisory boards which unite Cherry Hill's diverse neighborhoods to the regular town meetings with serve as opportunities for conversation and discourse, Susan has proven her commitment to providing thoughtful and responsive government to the people she was elected to serve.

Having worked with Susan through her involvement with the New Jersey Association of Women Business Owners, the chamber of commerce, and as a delegate to the 1986 White House Conference on Small Business, I am very much aware of Susan's dedication to fiscally sound government. Her understanding and intellect will undoubtedly continue to ensure Cherry Hill's commonsensical approach to financial planning well into the 20th century.

Mr. Speaker, the Community Service Award being presented to Mayor Susan Bass Levin by B'nai B'rith is a much deserved recognition for her efforts on behalf of the citizens of Cherry Hill. I take great pride in calling Susan a friend and ask that all of my colleagues join me in paying tribute to her upon this most auspicious occasion. As I applaud her commitment to public service, I also applaud the support that her family—her husband, Benjamin Levin and daughters, Lisa and Amy—has given her over the years. With this dedicated spirit, Mayor Susan Bass Levin will without question succeed in facing the difficult challenges that lie ahead.

FLOOR STATEMENT REGARDING WILLIAM MILLER

HON. RICHARD RAY

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 28, 1989

Mr. RAY. Mr. Speaker, in November 1988, William T. Miller of Columbus, GA, was introduced into the beverage world hall of fame at the National Beverage Industry Convention in Atlanta. Mr. Miller has recently retired as vice president of production for the Royal Crown Cola Co.

Mr. Miller is considered by many to be the father of America's diet soft drink industry. He created a sugar-free drink in response to a father's desire to please his diabetic daughter. The young girl distributed the drink to her friends and its popularity grew. Royal Crown Cola started producing the soft drink and labeled it "Diet Rite" in 1962. Mr. Miller has since watched diet drinks climb to 30 percent of today's soft drink market.

I have had the privilege and pleasure of knowing Bill Miller for many years. Bill is a family oriented man who possesses a sincere concern for others and a unique social consciousness. He spends a considerable amount of time in several capacities with the St. Paul United Methodist Church, and works actively with the Boy Scouts and Junior Achievement. Bill also spearheads Royal Crown Cola's practice of providing low-cost college loans to Columbus area students.

Bill has devoted time to serve as chairman of my Muscogee County Advisory Committee for the past 6 years. He has been a trusted and helpful advisor and consultant.

THE JUAN BAUTISTA DE ANZA TRAIL

HON. GEORGE MILLER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 28, 1989

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing legislation today, along with 29 of my colleagues, to designate the Juan Bautista De Anza Trail as part of the National Trail System.

In 1775–1776, De Anza led a small band of settlers from the Nogales, AZ, area overland to California and then north to the San Francisco Bay area. Carried out under adverse conditions and in virtually unknown territory, the De Anza expedition was a truly remarkable achievement and led to the settlement of northern California.

The De Anza Trail, which is some 1,200 miles long, follows the general route of the expedition—from Nogales to the bay area.

Local citizen groups have been active in their support of designating this trail as a National historic trail. George Cardinet, the executive director of the Heritage Trails Fund, has been a persuasive advocate for the trail. He, and other citizens along the route of the trail, have helped determine the location of the trail and to organize support for its inclusion in the National Historic Trails System.

Including the De Anza Trail into the national system is an important step toward recognizing and commemorating an important event in our history. I hope that the Congress will move quickly to enact this bill.

TRIBUTE TO MOLLY GILBERT

HON. BARNEY FRANK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 28, 1989

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, this Friday, March 3, a very well-deserved tribute is being held in Swansea, MA, on behalf of Molly Gilbert. Molly is a very impressive 7-year-old, the daughter of two equally impressive people, Mary Ann and Douglas Gilbert.

When Molly was 10 weeks old, it was discovered that she had a liver disorder. Last December 24, she was the beneficiary of a liver transplant at the Pittsburgh Children's Hospital. As the nicest possible Christmas present for Molly, her parents, and the many, many people who have come to root for this wonderful and determined child, the transplant was the best of all possible Christmas presents.

This Friday, the people of Swansea will be turning out to pay tribute to Molly and, while this is not perhaps explicitly part of the event, to pay tribute to themselves. The people in the community have been superb in their efforts on behalf of the Gilbert family. The response of the people of Swansea in this situation has been a model of the way in which a community in this country expresses its mutual respect and commitment to helping. People have donated money, services, and perhaps most difficult of all, their time on behalf of the effort for Molly. And Molly has, of course, responded in perfect fashion. She is a Girl Scout, she takes dancing lessons, and she is a very much admired student at the Gardner School in Swansea.

Mr. Speaker, at a time when there is a lot of attention being given to volunteer efforts as one way—among many—of helping alleviate the problems that face us in this society, the great efforts of the people of Swansea on behalf of the Gilbert family, and the enormous dedication and love for each other that the Gilbert family has shown, deserve attention.

The Gilbert family, and all of their many friends in Swansea deserve to have a very good time on Friday night.

RECOGNIZING A BRAVE FIREFIGHTER

HON. JOHN P. MURTHA

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 28, 1989

Mr. MURTHA. Mr. Speaker, on Monday, February 15 a terrible tragedy occurred in Johnstown, PA, when firefighter Richard Roberts was electrocuted while battling a fire at an apartment building.

It was fitting that at his funeral an outpouring of support occurred in a procession that included 115 fire trucks and 112 personal vehicles.

We all particularly feel this kind of loss because we know that our Nation and our communities can only survive and prosper because of the dedication of our public service personnel such as Richard Roberts. We are a nation whose greatness has come from the sacrificing, dedicated personal lives of millions of citizens, citizens such as Richard Roberts who selflessly served his community, and unfortunately died in that service.

Through this recognition, I want to acknowledge the debt of our entire Nation to Richard Roberts and the many men and women like him who serve us all. While no words can compensate Richard's family for their loss, I hope they do take pride in Richard's public service and in his commitment to his community. It is in the highest tradition of our great country and I am proud to recognize an outstanding American.

CONGRATULATIONS TO THE CAFARO FAMILY OF YOUNGSTOWN, OH

HON. MICHAEL DeWINE

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 28, 1989

Mr. DEWINE. Mr. Speaker, Winston Churchill once said, "Some see private enterprise as a predatory target to be shot, others as a cow to be milked, but few are those who see it as a sturdy horse pulling the wagon."

I would like to take a moment to recognize the vitality and strength of the free enterprise system as envisioned by Mr. Churchill. There is no better embodiment of this vision than in the contributions of the Cafaro family of Youngstown, OH.

In 1969, the Cafaro Co. built Eastwood Mall in Niles, OH, located midway between Youngstown and Warren. This $1½ million retail complex has served as the flagship for the Cafaro Co., as they have become the fourth largest developer of shopping centers and malls in the United States. During this time, the Cafaro family roots have remained in Ohio even as their economic impact has spread throughout the country.

This year we are celebrating the 20th anniversary of Eastwood Mall. I would like to take this occasion, however, to commemorate not only Eastwood Mall's 20th anniversary, but also the spirit and determination of the Cafaro family who have so added to the economic vitality of our country. At Eastwood Mall alone, their efforts have added 3,000 jobs to the local economy. It is this commitment to private enterprise which is the cornerstone of our Nation's prosperity.

As the Congress considers proposals designed to keep our country competitive in the world economy and prosperous at home, we would do well to look at the example of the Cafaro family and remember that the best enterprise is private enterprise.

I know my colleagues in Congress join me in congratulating the Cafaro Co., on this auspicious day.

BALANCED BUDGET AMENDMENT

HON. WAYNE OWENS

OF UTAH

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 28, 1989

Mr. OWENS of Utah. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing a balanced budget amendment to the Constitution, in order to restore badly needed fiscal credibility to our Government. It is simply irresponsible to go on fooling ourselves into believing that deficit spending is harmless; our constituents don't buy it, our trading partners don't buy it, and neither should we.

Last year our public debt cost us $150 billion in interest payments alone, $150 billion that should have gone to productive uses in our economy. And with interest rates on the rise, that figure will only get worse unless we deal with our budget deficit quickly and credibly.

We can no longer afford to rely on fiscal gymnastics to explain away our massive deficits. When the smoke and mirrors are cleared away, the fiscal year 1989 deficit is expected to be nearly $30 billion off the Gramm-Rudman mark. Regrettably, the fiscal year 1990 deficit will probably stray even further from the Gramm-Rudman target, given the unrealistic economic assumptions under which the new budget is being formulated.

With my amendment in place, the President would be required to submit a balanced budget to Congress each year. Additionally, Congress would be prohibited from deficit spending unless it has obtained a 60-percent majority to do so, with a mandatory roll call vote. If for some reason Congress did determine that outlays should exceed revenue during a given year, that excess would, by law, be repaid during the next year. Finally, my bill would prevent any revenue raising bill from passing without first obtaining majority support, again by a rollcall vote.

It is time to give our constituents what they deserve: A government that spends money wisely and lives within its means, and a constitutional amendment to keep it that way.

LEGISLATION TO REQUIRE A NEW, PERMANENT WARNING LABEL ON CIGARETTE PACKAGES AND ADVERTISING

HON. JIM SLATTERY

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 28, 1989

Mr. SLATTERY. Mr. Speaker, today I am reintroducing legislation to require a new, permanent warning label on cigarette packages and advertising.

This label would read: "Surgeon General's Warning: Nicotine in Cigarettes Is an Addictive Drug."

The new, permanent warning label would be in addition to the current four rotating labels.

Surgeon General Koop's 1988 annual report verified the scientific evidence that nicotine in cigarettes is addictive.

According to this year's report, cigarette smoking accounted for more than one of every six deaths in this country, killing 390,000 Americans. It is the main avoidable cause of death in our society.

Congress has the responsibility of warning both smokers and potential smokers that before becoming a statistic, they'll become an addict.

I hope my colleagues will join me in battling one of the most commonly used drugs in America—nicotine.

This legislation has the support of the American Heart Association, the American Cancer Society, and the American Lung Association.

ERIK McMILLAN—NFL STAR ROOKIE

HON. WILLIAM (BILL) CLAY

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, February 28, 1989

Mr. CLAY. Mr. Speaker, it is always inspiring to watch the outstanding achievements of our next generation. One such inspiration is a 22-year-old St. Louis native named Erik McMillan. Erik is earning a reputation as an up-and-coming National Football League star. After an explosive year as a rookie defensive back for the New York Jets, the Associated Press named him the National Football League's Defensive Rookie of the Year.

Erik McMillan follows a family tradition of excellence in sports. His father, Ernie McMillan is a former standout Cardinal football player and his uncle Shellie achieved national acclaim as Sweet Charlie Brown, a snappy dribbler for the Harlem Globetrotters.

I am pleased to take this opportunity to congratulate Erik McMillan on his fine performance and to wish him every continued success. I am also happy to share with my colleagues a sampling of press reports about the triumphs of Erik McMillan.

[From the St. Louis Post-Dispatch]

JETS' MCMILLAN MAKES HIS MARK IN NFL DEBUT

(By Dan Caesar)

Whether he's playing in the defensive backfield for the New York Jets or roaming the streets of the nation's largest city, Erik McMillan suddenly finds himself thrust into a new and unfamiliar situation.

Last year, McMillan was the top defensive player at the University of Missouri, where he had more unassisted tackles (203) than anyone else in the team's history. This season, he is one of two rookies starting in the Jets' defensive backfield. And he has discovered it is a long way from Columbia, Mo., to New York City—both on and off the field.

"This city has tons of people, and half don't even know what they're doing or where they are," McMillan said. "I don't like New York. It's not my style of living. I'm just here to play ball. At least I don't have to live here after the season."

But this fall, he's a New York City area resident. And McMillan, son of former Cardinals tackle Ernie McMillan, has taken advantage of the Jets' desire to revamp what was a porous defense. He started at free safety Sunday in the Jets' 28-3, opening-day loss at New England, and received high marks for his performance. The Patriots threw two touchdown passes, both to Irving Fryar—who beat veteran cornerback Bobby Humphrey each time.

"Erik played real well," Jets secondary coach Mike Faulkiner said. "The only knock was that he dropped one ball that was right in his hands that he should have intercepted. It hit him right in the chest and bounced off. I told him that if it was a bullet, he would have been shot dead."

But Faulkiner said that was about the only thing he could say negative about McMillan's debut in the National Football League.

"We had him doing a lot of things," Faulkiner said. "We play a 4-3, and we had him at linebacker some of the time, where he came up and played the run. He never had to cover a receiver one on one, but he did cover the running backs that way sometimes and did a fine job. We even sent him in on a blitz a time or two."

That is an unusually diversified role for a rookie, especially one playing in his first regular-season game.

"We asked him to do things other defensive backs don't do," Faulkiner said. "He does a lot more than a rookie is expected to do. But I don't really consider him a rookie anymore. He's played in four preseason games, one regular-season game and two scrimmages. That's seven games, almost as much as a full college season."

The Jets have big hopes for McMillan, who Faulkiner said was in for all 71 of the Jets' defensive plays Sunday. They like his speed, versatility and perhaps most of all, his aggressiveness.

"I don't want this to sound wrong, but he's an intimidating hitter and he's the kind of hitter that it could be another Darryl Stingley situation with him," Faulkiner said. Stingley was a New England receiver who was left paralyzed by a hit from Oakland's Jack Tatum in 1978.

"Erik's leverage when he hits somebody is something else," Faulkiner said. "I don't mean to sound bad, but he could be deadly. He's a weapon."

But after one pro game, McMillan hasn't developed that reputation yet. And he knows the workload will increase as opposing quarterbacks zero in on seeing if he and fellow rookie James Hastey, who plays right cornerback, can handle their jobs.

"We'll get all the work we'll need," McMillan said. "They'll be testing us a lot. I'm ready for that. I enjoy the aggressive part of the game. And we'll be getting lots of on-the-job training."

At Mizzou, McMillan played cornerback, weak safety, and strong safety. But he said he never had the responsibility he does now. For the Jets, McMillan runs the defensive backfield. He calls plays, and barks out alignment assignments.

When told of what his son did Sunday, Ernie McMillan was not happy. Erik made four unassisted tackles and was in on three other tackles. The seven tackles in which he was involved was the most for anyone in the defensive backfield.

"I hate to hear that," Ernie said. "That's way too many for someone in the backfield to be in on. That doesn't speak too well of what's up front (on the defensive line)."

Erik is following in this father's path in more ways than one. Besides both being in the NFL, Ernie also started his first game when he was a rookie in 1961 and then went on to become an All-Pro during his 14-year playing tenure with the Cardinals.

"Everything fell into place for me," Ernie said. "(Kenneth) Panfil got hurt and I got the job right off the bat. Then Erik gets to start right away, too—that's nice."

But not too nice.

"I really hope everything works out for him, because that's an awesome responsibility he has there," the elder McMillan said. "To jump right out there, especially at safety, is a big load for somebody still learning."

And McMillan knows his son will receive plenty of early tests.

"He's playing in a passing division, with (Miami's Dan) Marino and (Buffalo's Jim) Kelly," Ernie said. "He's going to have to learn to be careful not to settle back at free safety and get lulled when they do a running play or two and then not protect the guy coming across the middle. It's a tough assignment."

But both father and son are excited about Erik's situation.

"I talked to him right before the game, and I had a hard time settling him down," Ernie said. "He was talking so fast, I couldn't slow him down. I knew he was pretty pumped up."

And Erik said he knows his dad is exhilarated about the situation.

"He's really fired up," Erik said. "He's given me a lot of advice over the years, and it's nice to be able to attain this level. We're proud of each other."

Missouri coach Wood Widenhofer thinks McMillan can end up as a star in the NFL.

"Erik has all the tools to be a great player," Widenhofer said. "He is, as far as athletic ability, right up there with the big time. He's the kind of guy you build a defense around. He was our big-play man all last year."

McMillan was ecstatic when the Jets drafted him, in the third round. He quickly discovered that he had a legitimate shot at starting as a rookie, because the Jets were searching for a way to tighten a defense that ranked 20th in the league in pass defense last year.

"I didn't want to ride the bench," McMillan said. "I'm just fortunate enough that the Lord has been behind me and put me in a good situation. It's really a learning experience. I'm trying to pick up what I can.

"I just have a lot more calls to make than I did in school. The players are about the same size, but the tempo is taken up another notch. It's more intense."

McMillan also will be keeping one eye on the fortunes of Mizzou's football team this fall. It seems that he is blind to Mizzou in the other eye.

"I think they'll do better because they have a lot of returning players on defense, but I don't know anything about the offense," he said. "Never did. I didn't pay any attention to the offense when I was there, so I really don't know anything about it now."

McMillan knows plenty about defense, however. He was burned his share of times at Mizzou, but he also returned three interceptions for touchdowns last season, tying a National Collegiate Athletic Association record.

"I really think he can be a good pro player," his father said. "I know he has the athletic ability. If he can put everything else together, he'll go far.

"It's a tough thing, though. Believe me, I know. But he has the ability to be something special."

YOUNG ERIK MCMILLAN IS FROM SPECIAL LINE

(By Ira Berkow)

NEW YORK.—I knew of Erik McMillan's father, Ernie, and Erik's uncle, Shellie, much before I ever heard of Erik, before anyone had. It was a time in the 1950s when Erik was not yet the faintest glimmer in his father's eye.

They were, though, dramatic times, hopeful times, searing times for the McMillan brothers, growing up in the ghetto area of 47th Street, known widely as "the meanest street in Chicago."

Erik is the outstanding, sometimes explosive 22-year-old rookie defensive back for the Jets.

When viewing Erik, one can see the resemblance to his father and uncle—the solid cheekbones, the engaging smile—and you can hear the intensity and passion in his voice, which carry over to his play, as they did with his dad and uncle.

Growing up in Chicago, I saw Shellie play center for the remarkable DuSable High School basketball team. He was one of the stars along with Paxton Lumpkin, later a snappy dribbler with the Harlem Globetrotters, and Sweet Charlie Brown, who would team with Elgin Baylor to help take Seattle University to the NCAA finals.

Ernie, Shellie's younger brother, was a sophomore substitute on the DuSable team that was one of the finest schoolboy teams ever, called the Wonder Five and still talked about today.

In 1954, the year, coincidentally, of Brown vs. Board of Education, the landmark civil rights ruling by the Supreme Court that overturned "separate but equal" public schooling, the DuSable Panthers became the first all-black team with a black coach to reach the highest level of an organized integrated sports program in America.

Undefeated, they gained the finals of the state tournament in Illinois, and lost in a close game that some felt had questionable calls.

Several DuSable players received athletic scholarships when few blacks, especially from 47th Street, got them.

Shellie was one of the first black players at Bradley University. He played for the Pistons and Hawks in the National Basketball Association.

Ernie went to the University of Illinois and played football. Later he was an offensive tackle for 16 years with the Cardinals and the Packers, made the Pro Bowl four times, and was an assistant coach with both teams.

The year 1954 seemed filled with possibilities, but there were deep racial antagonisms and indignities, of course, some that would affect the brothers forever.

One time Shellie played in New Orleans against Loyola University—in one of the first integrated college games in the South—and fouled out. Fans began to sing, "Bye Bye, Blackbird." Shellie left the court with angry tears in his eyes.

Today discrimination sometimes takes more subtle forms. Examples are the absence of black head coaches or top black executives in the National Football League, and what seems a quota system for assistant coaches. Ernie, unemployed now, sends out resumes, but hasn't heard an encouraging word.

Erik was raised in a setting different from that of his father and uncle, in the middle-class suburbs of University City, Mo., and Silver Spring, Md.

"I know I was more fortunate growing up than my father or uncle were," said Erik. "I got anything I needed, but I didn't get everything I wanted. My dad tried not to spoil me."

Erik was graduated from Missouri with a degree in business administration, was a football star and a third-round draft pick by the Jets. His speed and spring and knowledge of the game elevated him to a starting position.

The other day, he received some news and called his dad from the Jets' locker room. He told him he was getting an all-expenses-paid trip to Hawaii. "Oh," said Ernie McMillan, "how's that?"

"Because," said Erik, pleased at how he had set up his father, "I made the Pro Bowl team, dad."

His father said, "You're not serious." He knows that rookies, especially rookie defensive backs, rarely make it. Al Toon, the wide receiver who was also picked, walked by. Erik put him on the phone to finally convince his father.

"I'm proud of Erik," Ernie said later. "I like that he's aggressive, and positive. What I don't like is some of that mouthing, and finger waggling that he and some of the other kids think intimidates the opponent. They see that stuff on TV and imitate it. I tell him I don't like it, but he just looks at me. He thinks it works."

Beyond football, Erik said, "I feel I have the chance to do whatever I want, as long as I step on the right stones along the way."

Ernie McMillan, who has come far from 47th Street in Chicago, understands that formidable racial barriers remain in this country. "The only way things can change for the good is for people like Erik to think the way he does," he said. "I hope he's right."

LIFE WITH A FOOTBALL FATHER—ERIK MCMILLAN GETS HIS INSPIRATION FROM HIS FAMOUS DAD

(By Jeff Krupsaw)

As a youth, Erik McMillan spent lots of his time among giant men in white uniforms.

Famous St. Louis Football Cardinal players such as Dan Dierdorff, Tom Banks, Jamie Rivers and Bob Reynolds were his friends.

"They would take me around like I was their son," McMillan says. "They would ask me, 'Do you like football? Your dad is a good guy.' They would take me on the practice field, let me try on the shoulder pads. They would take me in like I was their own kid."

But he was Ernie McMillan's kid. And his dad had a spell over him that hasn't worn off.

Maybe it all those years of following his dad to Busch Stadium, where his father played for 15 years as an offensive tackle. "It was always like that's my dad's job." Erik says "He said he was going to a game, it was like he was going to his job. It's just like anybody else who's dad went to the office to work.

Erik would hold his father's helmet after games.

"A lot of people would ask me, 'Do you want to be like your dad?'" he says. "I didn't know."

Now he knows.

At breakfast last Saturday morning before Missouri's season-opener with Illinois, freshman Erik McMillan was eating his Wheaties when teammate Robert Curry shoved a magazine in front of his bowl.

For McMillan, it turned out to be good reading and good therapy.

Inside the publication was a story about a former Illinois lineman who McMillan knows very well. It was about his father, Ernie, who played for the Illini from 1958-60 before going to the National Football League.

"When I saw his picture and that long article, it made me get more pumped," says Erik, who was preparing to play in his first game as a Collegian. "It made me know what I had to do if I'm going to be as good or better than he was."

Erik has quite an example to follow.

Ernie made it in the National Football League after being drafted in the 13th round. He lasted 15 years with the Cardinals and two more with Green Bay Packers by having an inner drive that surpassed most and one that impressed his son even more.

"My dad, that's my No. 1 idol right there," Erik says. "My dad is my greatest motivation. He gets me motivated."

Even if he had not seen the article in Illini Update, this young Missouri redshirt would have had plenty of incentive Saturday in Champaign, Ill., playing against his dad's old team on television in front of more than 78,000 fans.

"I was more determined than anything else," Erik says. "I wasn't nervous. I knew what I had to do. Just hustle and play technique. You've got to run and hit hard."

In doing so, he led a beleaguered Missouri defense with seven unassisted tackles and was one of two Tiger defenders to grade a winning performance.

Like any father, Ernie, now a scout with the St. Louis Cardinals, watched the game on television.

"I don't think he was rooting for Illinois, but I know he was rooting for me," Erik says.

"I was excited for him," says Ernie, who was pleased with Erik's performance. "The first thing I wanted to see was his aggressiveness."

At 6-foot-1, 190 pounds, Erik has no choice but to hit hard. Not many defensive ends can play major-college football at a size of a cornerback.

Of course, Erik makes up for his lack of size with an electronic timing of 4.45 seconds in the 40-yard dash and a 33-inch vertical jump.

Erik hardly takes after his dad in physical stature. Ernie played for the Cardinals at 265 pounds and Erik's cousin Howard Richards, a former Missouri All-American who now plays for the Dallas Cowboys, weighs more than 270 pounds.

"Hopefully, Erik'll get bigger," Ernie says.

"He's got good ability," Missouri head coach Warren Powers says, comparing Erik to recently departed MU defensive end Bobby Bell. "He needs to get more weight."

Size doesn't worry Erik, or Missouri weight coach Russ Ball, who says Bell was about the same size as McMillan when he came to Missouri. Already, Ball says McMillan has increased his bench press to 280 pounds.

"My weight will come with maturity," Erik says. "I just have to rely on my quickness and inner strength."

Ernie laughs when asked if his son inherited his speed and quickness. "They used a calendar when I ran," he says.

In months and years to come, Erik hopes to be a vital part of the Missouri team. But he doesn't plan on participating in another performance like the Tigers turned in against Illinois.

"Everybody's been saying I had a good game," he says. "I thank them for the compliment. But that's not good enough. You've got to work harder to do better. That wasn't us last Saturday. This Saturday, the real Missouri Tigers will show up. I don't think you'll ever see us again like that, not for the next four or five years."

Erik says his dad had praise for him after Saturday's game. "He said he was looking for enthusiasm and hustle," McMillan says. "You've got to play with enthusiasm, and you've to play like you want it. You've got to play with enthusiasm and get after people. Otherwise, you can't play."

The younger McMillan has proven that he can play, yet he ranks behind Eric Troy on second-team at defensive end.

That doesn't get him down. But when he does hang his head a little bit, he knows where to go for inspiration.

"It's like this, when I get depressed, I call my dad and tell him what's bothering me," Erik says. "If I can't do that, I keep his picture around."

Maybe Erik McMillan's son can say the same thing some day.

JETS' FREE SAFETY PLAYS SMART

Erik McMillan of the New York Jets, who led the AFC with eight interceptions, was named the National Football League's Defense Rookie of the Year by The Associated Press on Tuesday.

McMillan, a free safety from Missouri drafted on the third round, was the only rookie defensive player named to the Pro Bowl. Although he missed three games because of a foot injury, McMillan easily finished first in balloting by a panel of sportswriters covering all 28 NFL teams.

Linebacker Chris Spielman of the Detroit Lions was a distant runner-up.

Erik, the son of Ernie McMillan, former All-Pro tackle for the St. Louis Cardinals, was the cornerstone of the Jets' rebuilt secondary. He returned two of his eight pickoffs for touchdowns and had three interceptions of Dan Marino in a 44-30 victory at Miami.

"Erik came into camp and showed he could handle the starting job," coach Joe Walton said. "He's aggressive, he learns quickly, he plays hard and smart."

The Jets started four new defensive backs this year; McMillan, cornerbacks James Hasty, also a rookie, and Bobby Humphrey, a converted receiver, and strong safety Rich Miano. They combined for 16 of the team's 24 interceptions, which led the AFC and was third in the league.

"It's been a very satisfying year," McMillan said. "When I came to minicamp, I didn't think there was any chance of starting with Lester Lyles and Jerry Holmes there. They were two of the most popular guys, and I thought they'd be the last guys cut. They were the first guys cut.

"The Jets were telling me I'm the man. It was quite evident because there was no one else to turn to."

It wasn't until the eighth game of the season, the victory at Miami, that McMillan felt comfortable.

"That was the first game I knew exactly what the offense was trying to do to us and also knew everything about the defense," he said. "That whole week started my foundation."

McMillan even engaged in a few verbal jousts with Marino, who had thrown for 521 yards but was picked off five times.

While McMillan got most of his recognition for his pass defense, Jets defensive coordinator Bud Carson was just as satisfied with the rookie's work against the run.

"Erik likes to challenge people and he does that best supporting against the run," Carson said. "He'll knock a guy's head off if he gets the chance, and he wants to get involved."

McMillan could have been involved in severe overmatches this year. How many rookie defensive backs have an immediate impact in the NFL—particularly in the AFC East, where they face receivers such as Mark Clayton and Mark Duper in Miami, Stanley Morgan and Irving Fryar in New England, Andre Reed in Buffalo and Billy Brooks in Indianapolis?

McMillan credits Walton, Carson and secondary coach Mike Falkkiner for "having the faith in me to give me the job. They could have gone with a veteran and had me sit, maybe play in passing situations (as a nickel back). They didn't do that and it worked out."

Miano, a four-year veteran who is the oldest of the Jets' DBs, lives in Hawaii. He attends the Pro Bowl each January as a spectator. This time, he'll have someone familiar to watch.

"I'm looking forward to it," Miano said. "Erik has earned it."

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Wednesday, March 1, 1989

The House met at 2 p.m.

The Chaplain, Rev. James David Ford, D.D., offered the following prayer:

May the words we speak to each other, O gracious God, carry with them the respect that every person deserves, tempered by our own limitations, our understanding or experience. May we profess the truth as we know and believe and may we ever learn to speak in ways that enhance that truth, that uphold the human spirit, that bring light to our common concerns, and always respect the integrity of every person. In Your name, we pray. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The SPEAKER. The Chair has examined the Journal of the last day's proceedings and announces to the House his approval thereof.

Pursuant to clause 1, rule I, the Journal stands approved.

PLEDGE OF ALLEGIANCE

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. VOLKMER, lead the Members in the Pledge of Allegiance.

Mr. VOLKMER led the Pledge of Allegiance as follows:

I pledge allegiance to the Flag of the United States of America, and to the Republic for which it stands, one nation, under God, indivisible, with liberty and justice for all.

RESIGNATION AS MEMBER AND ELECTION AS MEMBERS TO CERTAIN STANDING COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following resignation as a member of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs:

WASHINGTON, DC,
February 28, 1989.

Hon. JIM WRIGHT,
Speaker, U.S. House of Representatives, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: In accordance with the rules of the Democratic Caucus, and in light of my election to the House Post Office and Civil Service Committee, I must resign my membership on the House Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

Sincerely,

PAUL E. KANJORSKI,
Member of Congress.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the resignation is accepted.

There was no objection.

Mr. HOYER. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Democratic Caucus, I offer a privileged resolution (H. Res. 96) and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

H. RES. 96

Resolved, That the following named Members, and Delegate, be, and they hereby are, elected to the following standing committees of the House of Representatives:

Committee on Government Operations: Jim Bates, California.

Committee on Post Office and Civil Service: Paul E. Kanjorski, Pennsylvania; Ron de Lugo, Virgin Islands.

Committee on Public Works and Transportation: Carl C. Perkins, Kentucky.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

THIRTY-FIFTH ANNIVERSARY OF HOUSE TERRORISM

(Mr. KANJORSKI asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. KANJORSKI. Mr. Speaker, I make a special request that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. EMERSON] be allowed to join me at the podium during my 1 minute.

Mr. Speaker, the reason the gentleman from Missouri, BILL EMERSON, and I rise today is to call the attention of the House and the United States to the fact that terrorism is not new in the world. Political terrorism has existed for a long period of time, and today we celebrate, or at least we commemorate the 35th anniversary of the day the House of Representatives was fired upon by terrorists in this very Chamber.

Two witnesses to that act of terrorism are here today. Both the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. EMERSON] and I had the pleasure of serving the U.S. House of Representatives as pages that very day, and as a matter of fact, both of us were very close to the column in the back of the Chamber over the Democratic page booth that caught one of the shells fired by the terrorists. Both of us experienced being struck in this very Chamber as part of history.

I would like to call Congressman EMERSON up with me today and to share with the American people and, of course, our fellow Members, a photo that was taken and appeared in 1954 in Life magazine as the "Photo of the Year." I call attention to the fact that here is young BILL EMERSON, my roommate, with his mouth open, and behind him is young PAUL KANJORSKI when we were 16-year-old pages at that time carrying one of the injured Members out of the House of Representatives.

I would also like to caution my colleagues and call to the attention of the Speaker and my friends on the Democratic side that this incident occurred in the 83d Congress of the United States. At that time, the majority party in this House was the Republican Party.

I may say in parentheses that this was the last year in which the Republicans held the majority in the House, Mr. Speaker, so there may be some evidence of the fact that the Democratic Party has brought tranquility and peace to the House of Representatives.

THIRTY-FIFTH ANNIVERSARY OF HOUSE TERRORISM

(Mr. EMERSON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to join my friend of longstanding and my colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. KANJORSKI] on this commemorative occasion. I do not think it is a celebration.

As one who has never been particularly age conscious, I stand in awe of the fact that this event occurred 35 years ago today, and I remember it as though it were yesterday.

As PAUL noted, he and I were pages on the Democratic side of the House, and we were on duty at that time. Speaker Martin was presiding, and when the shooting occurred in this gallery up here, Speaker Martin stepped behind the column there. There was great confusion in the House. I think there were a couple hundred Members present. As a matter of fact, we were in the midst of a division vote, and the yeas had just been seated, and the nays were rising when this clamor occurred up there.

My first thought was that this being the season of the year when senior school trips start arriving in town, I thought that someone had tossed a pack of firecrackers over the gallery. But when I looked up, I could see fire coming out of the end of the barrels of those guns.

The lady up there, Lolita LaBraun, was trying to unfurl a flag, and it was over as soon as it started. A House Member, Jimmy Van Zandt, from Pennsylvania, and a page at the time, and since a clerk, Lee Thomas, ran up to that gallery to try to apprehend the culprits.

Buck Rogers was the doorman up there, who had a heart attack on the spot. The culprits got away, and were apprehended down at the bus station trying to get out of town. They were tried and sentenced to long terms, but they were later pardoned back in the late 1970's.

It was an interesting occasion. I have often thought it was a terrible thing to have happened, but since it did, I was glad I was here to observe that little anecdote in American history.

I might say it was a great pleasure for me personally when my friend, PAUL KANJORSKI, joined us here two terms ago. He and I were roommates and colleagues of that era, and it was great to see an old buddy come back to Congress.

PAUL, it is good to join you here today.

ANTIDRUG EDUCATION IS WORKING

(Mr. EDWARDS of California asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Speaker, there is good news indeed in this morning's papers: drug use among high school seniors has dropped to the lowest levels in a decade. A survey released yesterday shows that use of cocaine, marijuana, and PCP by high schoolers declined in 1988, continuing a trend of the last 2 years.

This proves that a key element of the drug programs put into effect by this Congress in 1986 and reinforced last year are working. That key element is education. The study shows that students are avoiding drugs not because of drug tests, not because they will lose their drivers license or their student loans. No, high school students are turning away from drugs because they are learning that drugs are harmful. The educational programs that this Congress has insisted be part of our Nation's effort against drugs are working.

This decline occurred even though that the students believe drugs are more readily available than ever. As our law enforcement officers will admit, interdiction can never solve the drug problem. More police and the military cannot stop the flow of drugs. We should stick with what works. This latest survey shows that education of our youngsters will work. We can raise a drug-free generation through our schools.

DO NOT RUBBERSTAMP THE RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE BASE CLOSING COMMISSION

(Mr. SAXTON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SAXTON. Mr. Speaker, a resolution is being introduced today which should command the attention of every Member of this body.

Every Member should be aware of this resolution, because they will ultimately be required to cast a recorded vote on it.

The resolution, cosponsored by myself and many other Members of the House, calls for the outright disapproval of the recommendations of the Base Closing Commission.

I know that many of my colleagues are currently predisposed to approve the Commission's list of base closures realignments.

That disturbs me greatly. It disturbs me because, as I stand here, hearings are taking place, and the evidence is clear: The savings that the Commission has projected will never, ever be realized.

In fact, millions of taxpayers' dollars will be squandered on new and unnecessary military construction.

This will not be the last time I ask my colleagues to reject the Commission's findings. Rubberstamping, a bad recommendation, serves no one's interest.

ADD CASCO BAY TO THE NATIONAL ESTUARIES PROGRAM

(Mr. BRENNAN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BRENNAN. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation to assist my home State of Maine and the communities surrounding Casco Bay in their efforts to keep the bay clean.

Casco Bay, on the southern coast of Maine, covers almost 1,000 square miles, and contains more than 400 islands. The greater Portland metropolitan region, which adjoins Casco Bay, is the largest population center in Maine. The bay supports active commercial and recreational fisheries. Researchers have found that the bay is truly exceptional in its biological productivity. But the environmental health of Casco Bay has been the subject of increasing attention and concern in southern Maine.

Although Casco Bay is still relatively clean, growing evidence points to a potential decline in environmental quality unless decisive action is taken.

Researchers with the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration found surprisingly high levels of heavy metals, including lead, silver, and zinc, in fish livers. The researchers also found PAH's in sediments that were fourth highest among 44 sites tested around the country.

Maine's Department of Environmental Protection found unsafe levels of bacteria this past summer at Portland's east end beach. The State has also released a report indicating that 27 percent of Casco Bay's shellfish flats are closed due to bacterial pollution.

As population in communities surrounding the bay has grown, municipalities have struggled to handle increasing flows of sewage and stormwater runoff. The city of Portland's water district was recently sued by a coalition of environmental organizations for alleged violations of the Clean Water Act.

The legislation I am introducing would add Casco Bay to the list of estuaries around the country that are to receive priority consideration by the EPA for inclusion in the National Estuaries Program.

Currently 12 estuaries around the country are participating in the program, and 4 estuaries were added to the list to receive priority consideration last year.

In Maine, public support for keeping Casco Bay clean is strong. Addition of the bay to the Estuaries Program is supported by the State of Maine and by Maine environmental organizations.

No other estuary in Maine has been considered for this program. The lessons learned from an estuaries management conference in Casco Bay can be applied to a score of other bays along the coast.

Casco Bay needs our help now. My colleagues, I ask for your support and assistance in having this unique estuary considered for inclusion in the National Estuaries Program.

WORKER HEALTH BENEFITS PROTECTION ACT OF 1989

(Mr. SCHULZE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SCHULZE. Mr. Speaker, today, I am introducing the Worker Health Benefits Protection Act of 1989. This legislation will allow companies to continue providing retirement benefits in spite of rising health costs, high retiree to worker ratios, and new accounting rulings.

My bill contains two major provisions—first, distressed companies may be eligible for Government-guaranteed loans to provide retiree health benefits. The loan would be repaid by curtailing tax benefits from net operating loss carryovers.

Second, it would allow tax-free pension plan reversions to fund retiree health trusts. Studies indicate that reversions of this sort constitute a significant revenue gain.

This legislation does not mandate benefits, but does provide an avenue for companies which wish to continue to help their employees in retirement.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to support this legislation and give employers the opportunity to uphold their commitments to their employees.

THE FOREST SERVICE BUDGET AND THE LOSSES FROM TIMBER SALES

(Mr. JONTZ asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. JONTZ. Mr. Speaker, this morning the Subcommittee on Forests, Family Farms and Energy of the Committee on Agriculture examined the Forest Service budget and again next year millions of taxpayers' dollars are proposed for below-cost timber sales. In fiscal year 1987, 75 out of 119 of our Nation's forests, almost two-thirds of them, lost money on timber sales.

In Alaska we are losing 75 cents for every dollar we spend on selling timber.

Mr. Speaker, by cutting back on below-cost timber sales we could save $50 million, $100 million, or considerably more which could be well spent in our forests for firefighting, fish and wildlife enhancement or other purposes.

With the budget deficit our Nation faces and many unmet needs in our Nation's forests, below-cost timber sales are a luxury we can no longer afford.

NATIONAL ECONOMIC COMMISSION DASHES DEFICIT REDUCTION HOPES

(Mr. PORTER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, with the Republicans controlling the White House and the Democrats controlling the Congress, true deficit reduction can only be achieved by negotiation.

Each side must stop insisting that the budget be balanced on the other side's priorities and must, instead, bring their own priorities to the table.

Democrats must bring entitlements and social spending, Republicans, revenues and defense spending, and each one must offer something of these priorities to the common solution.

This should have been the message of the National Economic Commission, appointed over a year ago amid high hopes for national consensus in addressing the deficit problem.

This wasn't their message in their final report today, and those hopes have been dashed.

Progress rests now on a strong statement by the financial markets that the deficit must truly be reduced, and a change in attitude by the leadership of both parties.

Otherwise, we will see yet another year of rosy economic assumptions, smoke and mirror budgeting, and reliance upon a fast-growing Social Security reserve to mask over our lack of resolve and courage to address this serious national problem.

INTRODUCTION OF RESOLUTION DISAPPROVING THE RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE DEFENSE SECRETARY'S COMMISSION ON BASE REALIGNMENT AND CLOSURE

(Mr. BROWN of California asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Speaker, I rise to express my opposition to the recommendations of the Commission on Base Realignment and Closure and to announce my introduction today of the resolution of disapproval that would block the implementation of the base closings recommended by the Commission. During the 2 months since the release of the Commission's report it has become disturbingly clear that the Commission did not accomplish its mandate. Together with other Members whose districts would be affected by the base closings, my staff and I have spent countless hours reviewing the Commission's work and the substance of its recommendations. Serious questions have been raised about the net results of the Commission's recommendations as well as the merits surrounding many of the individual bases recommended for closure.

For myself and many other Members, the difference between our understanding of the Commission's mandate and the actual recommendations produced is striking. If implemented, the Commission's recommendations will close far more bases, but save far less money, than had been predicted. Moreover, while Congress was led to believe that the Commission would view potential cost savings as a key motive for its work, we now know that a more nebulous criteria—the military value of the base structure—was the Commission's primary focus. Thus, the base closures are predicted to save only $5.6 billion over a 20-year period, which is a far cry from the $2 to $5 billion annual savings we thought would result from this endeavor. A recent report from the Congressional Budget Office has raised questions that even these savings may be too optimistic. It is simply inequitable to ask our local communities to forfeit the major source of their economic livelihoods if the resulting savings are marginal.

A close review of the merits surrounding each base recommended for closure reveals that the justifications given by the Commission are often seriously flawed. Recent testimony given before the House Armed Services Committee showed that implementing the Commission's recommendations may, in fact, undermine our defense rather than enhance it. I have concentrated my own efforts on the situation at Norton AFB, and will therefore defer to my colleagues to review the specific merits of the other bases recommended for closure. Combined, the questions raised by my colleagues and I challenge the credibility and veracity of the Commission's work. Rather than accept the Commission's work at face value, I would urge my colleagues to take a closer look at the recommendations in order to determine if significant benefits will accrue from the base closings.

RURAL ENTERPRISE ZONES

(Mr. STANGELAND asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. STANGELAND. Mr. Speaker, it is no secret that many who live in rural communities, like a majority of my district, are still feeling the effects of the 1982 recession.

This is why today I am introducing the Rural Enterprise Zone Act of 1989, legislation that will foster economic opportunities for those living in struggling rural areas.

The Rural Enterprise Zone Act is designed to attract new and existing businesses into depressed rural communities by providing several meaningful tax incentives. Additionally, my bill directs the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development to administer a grant and loan program to assist entrepreneurs with business startup costs.

I am convinced that with just a little incentive, countless innovative small businessmen will locate their enterprises in depressed rural areas. The result would be economic growth, jobs, and opportunity for millions of Americans who have yet to participate in the economic expansion.

My initiative is similar to the legislation championed for years by Representatives Kemp and GARCIA, except that it concentrates solely on improving rural America. I urge my colleagues to join as cosponsors.

LEGISLATION ALLOWING STATES TO BAN EXPORT OF UNPROCESSED TIMBER FROM PUBLIC LANDS

(Mr. DEFAZIO asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DEFAZIO. Mr. Speaker, today, I am introducing a bill to allow States to make policy that is consistent with a longstanding Federal practice: the practice of banning the export of unprocessed timber from public lands.

As early as 1968 it was obvious that if this Nation was going to maintain a viable domestic wood processing industry, we would have to restrict the export of raw logs. Log exports from Federal lands were first limited by Congress in 1969 and, since 1973, have been banned entirely.

But in order for the States to take similar action, they need an act of Congress, and that is what I am proposing today.

The issue is very simple—will the Pacific Northwest develop into an industrial economy—exporting its finished products to Japan and other nations on the Pacific rim—or will it remain a colony, selling its natural resources, and its heritage, at bargain basement prices?

The economies of Oregon and Washington are in a crisis. Plywood and lumber mills are closing for lack of logs. Yet, at the same time, vast quantities of those same logs are being shipped overseas. That's got to stop, and my bill is the logical place to start. I ask my colleagues for their support.

PROHIBITING STATES FROM TAXING PENSIONS OF OUT-OF-STATE RESIDENTS

(Mrs. VUCANOVICH asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Mrs. VUCANOVICH. Mr. Speaker, in response to a growing antitax movement in my State of Nevada and in many other States, I am introducing a bill today which would prohibit States from taxing the pensions of out-of-State residents. This measure would no longer allow States to impose an income tax on the pensions that retirees earned before moving to another State.

There are many retirees who have moved to other States finding their pensions taxed by the State of their former residence. I feel that it is unfair that these people are being taxed by States where they receive no benefits and cannot vote. Retirees on fixed incomes should live comfortably, without worries of being unfairly taxed by other States.

Certain State laws give those States the right to attach the pensions or assets of nonresidents to collect taxes owed, and even hire collection agencies that can take away the automobiles of pensioners.

There are millions of senior citizens in the Nation today and the number is growing rapidly. If this tax is not prohibited or at least restricted in scope, the economic impact on the people and the country will be tragic. I urge my colleagues to join me in this fight for America's senior citizens.

SUPPORT NOMINATION OF EDWARD DERWINSKI

(Mr. BONIOR asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BONIOR. Mr. Speaker, I want to express my support today for President Bush's nomination of Edward Derwinski to be the Nation's first Secretary of Veterans Affairs.

Mr. Derwinski is a World War II veteran, having served honorably in the U.S. Army as an infantryman in the Pacific theater and with the Japanese occupation forces in 1945-46. He also served in this body for 24 years and has held key positions at the State Department since 1983.

I met with Mr. Derwinski recently to discuss important issues facing the millions of veterans who have served their Nation so valiantly. He is aware of the severe funding shortages within the VA and of the pressing needs of an already understaffed and underfunded health care system.

We have a tough budget battle ahead to secure adequate funding for veterans' programs, but I am confident that Mr. Derwinski will be a forceful advocate for America's veterans at the President's Cabinet table. I hope the Senate will act soon to confirm Mr. Derwinski, and I look forward to working with him.

PARTISAN FIRESTORM ENGULFS PRESIDENTIAL NOMINEE

(Mr. COUGHLIN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. COUGHLIN. Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate that President Bush returns from a highly successful mission abroad to a partisan firestorm at home.

Through an exhausting agenda, the President, a former U.S. emissary to China, renewed old acquaintances with leaders in the Far East, an area of the world which has grown in international importance, both economically and strategically. It is an area in which the United States has historically maintained a pivotal role. Seasoned in foreign relations, the President recognizes that in a world made smaller by advances in communications and technology, and thus more interdependent, the U.S. role in that region must not diminish.

Meeting with 20 world leaders and discussing matters ranging from Sino-Soviet relations to Middle Eastern questions and Southeast Asian issues, the President gracefully moved to center stage as the leader of the Western World in the global theater.

In the meantime, an increasingly partisan firestorm has developed here at home over President Bush's choice for Secretary of Defense, former Senator John Tower. In our 200-year history, never has a Cabinet nominee of a newly elected President been rejected.

With lots of rumor and innuendo to ravage Senator Tower's reputation, but no apparent substantive evidence of lack of fitness to serve, the campaign against Senator Tower has become an increasingly partisan exercise. This is wrong. The President should not be denied the services of an admittedly qualified candidate for Secretary of Defense on the basis of rumor or partisan posturing.

FAMINE IN SUDAN

(Mr. ACKERMAN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ACKERMAN. Mr. Speaker, at this moment, Sudan is experiencing the worst famine on the globe. In 1988 alone, between a quarter and a half million Sudanese, many of them children, died of starvation. Two to three million have become refugees, many walking hundreds of miles to Ethiopia in search of food. The great tragedy is that this famine is not a natural phenomenon—it is man-made, brought on by a civil war between the Government of Sudan and the Sudanese People's Liberation Army [SPLA]. There is enough food to feed almost everyone in Sudan but both sides in the civil conflict use food as a weapon of war and actively prevent relief from reaching the hungry masses.

Monday, 11 of our colleagues joined me in introducing House Concurrent Resolution 58, which deplores the use of food as a weapon by both the Government and the SPLA and expresses support for all efforts that reach imperiled Sundanese. The resolution urges the President and the Secretary of State to reassess our relationship with Sudan unless that Government actively facilitates relief to its starving masses and begins negotiations for a peace accord to end the bloody civil war.

The message of our concurrent resolution is clear: Enough is enough; the suffering in Sudan must end. Too many innocent people have suffered, too many children have died for us to sin by silence any longer. I urge my colleagues to support the resolution on famine in Sudan.

DEATH PENALTY FOR DRUG DEALERS

(Mr. GEKAS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, if anyone in this Chamber still remains squeamish about the imposition of the death penalty in proper cases, I would refer him or her to the development in New York City where a drug law enforcement agent was coldbloodedly killed at the hands of drug dealers. That is exactly what our debate was about last year when we were considering the drug comprehensive bill that finally passed the Congress and signed into law by the President of the United States, and when we consider the ever-increasing momentum of this war, we can stop at nothing, because the drug dealers themselves will stop at nothing. They will execute judges, they will shoot down drug law enforcement officers, potential witnesses, anyone who gets in the way of their criminal enterprises, and so we have taken this first proper step.

All we need now to do is to raise the consciousness of the American public as to the drastic measures required to win this war on drugs.

SUPPORT RESOLUTION OF DISAPPROVAL ON BASE CLOSINGS

(Mr. BROOKS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, I am honored to join with the gentleman from California, Mr. GEORGE BROWN, as a cosponsor and strong supporter of the resolution of disapproval, and I urge my colleagues to do the same. The Galveston homeport, currently under construction in my district, is one of the supposedly "unnecessary" bases recommended for closure by the Commission. It is part of the strategic homeport program, extensively debated in Congress. It enjoyed the strong support of not only my House and Senate colleagues but of the administration and the Department of Defense. It was resolved by these parties, no more than 4 years ago, that the strategic homeport program was the best method for implementing the militarily sound principles of dispersal, battlegroup integrity, and increasing our naval presence in our geographic flanks. Congress felt strongly enough about the merits of these principles that it provided over $28 million in appropriations for the Galveston homeport over the past 2 years.

The Commission has decided, however, that Congress, the administration, and the Department of Defense, were wrong. In doing so they prove the very reason I opposed the whole idea of setting up a base closure Commission in the first place—that it is wrong to put into the hands of a small group of nonelected appointees, who are accountable to no one, decisionmaking authority with such grave implications for our national security. I urge my colleagues to support this resolution of disapproval, as our only means of blocking this irresponsible delegation of authority.

SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATION FOR FISCAL YEAR 1989 VETERANS' BUDGET

(Mr. SMITH of Texas asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Mr. Speaker, yesterday the House Committee on Veterans' Affairs submitted its report on the proposed budget for fiscal year 1990. In that report the committee recommends $32 billion in budget authority and $30.7 billion in budget outlays for fiscal year 1990. In addition, the committee recommended a supplemental appropriation in the amount of $520 million to remedy the severe funding shortfall currently facing the Department of Veterans' Affairs [DVA].

I want to express my full support for the committee's recommended level of funding with particular emphasis on the $520 million supplemental appropriation for the current fiscal year.

And I want to commend the leadership and members of the House Committee on Veterans' Affairs for their very thorough and dedicated work highlighting the current status of benefit programs and services being provided to this Nation's veterans.

During special hearings conducted by the Veterans' Affairs Committee last summer, inadequacies in the VA hospital system were identified and confirmed by numerous witnesses.

Additionally, the results of a formal survey conducted by the Veterans' Affairs Committee on all 172 VA hospitals, along with evidence gathered during 16 direct staff visits to medical facilities across the country, reveals a severe structural and funding problem within the VA hospital system.

There is no doubt about the need to address the issue of the veteran health care system immediately.

The portion of the Federal budget devoted to veterans' benefits and programs today is slightly more than half the average level during the 1960's and the 1970's. As the committee report shows, the demands on the veteran health care system are increasing. An aging veteran population, AIDS, and posttraumatic stress disorder [PTSD] are just some of the demands being placed on the DVA hospital system.

Curiously, all measurements of the resources committed to maintaining veterans' benefits and services have been declining while the demand on the system increases.

According to information provided by the House Veterans' Affairs Committee, 13,000 VA hospital beds were not in service last year. Of the 13,000 beds closed on June 30, 1988, 30 percent were attributable to either staffing or funding shortages. The survey conducted on VA medical facilities revealed that, on average, there is shortage of 183 full-time employees per medical center. During committee hearings the VA Administrator conceded that fiscal year 1988 employment levels could not be maintained during this fiscal year without a supplemental appropriation.

Unfortunately, solving the staffing and bed problems would not necessarily result in increased health care availability to veterans. As the committee report points out, individual hospital administrators are transferring moneys between accounts in order to meet daily operating expenses. This right-pocket to left-pocket funding situation only disguises the serious shortfall in DVA medical accounts. Eventually, the piper must be paid or veterans go without medical care.

The committee's recommended supplemental appropriation is urgently needed to restore the proper level of medical services to veterans.

Once the current DVA funding shortfall is addressed, immediate priority needs to be assigned to bringing the entire veterans' health care system to a level that will sustain the expected demand on resources that demographics and technology will dictate in the future.

Over half of DVA's medical facilities are over 30 years old. The DVA's recent capital facilities study documented that 69 of the 132 DVA medical facilities built before 1970 received a fair, poor, or failing rating on their physical condition. The current budget request if less than last year's and almost half what was requested by the Department of Medicine and Surgery.

Further structural decline has occurred because, as the Veterans' Affairs Committee reports, capital investment funds have been shifted to meet recurring expenses such as salaries. This action has resulted in a backlog of needed replacement equipment that approaches $600 million.

Mr. Speaker, the failure by Congress to address this issue and give it the priority it deserves will, as the Veterans' Affairs Committee reports, "ultimately result in second-rate or no health care for the veterans of our Nation."

I urge my colleagues to support full funding for the veterans' programs established in law, beginning with a immediate supplemental appropriation for fiscal year 1989.

INTRODUCTION OF THE PORNOGRAPHIC MAIL PROHIBITION ACT

(Mr. RIDGE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. RIDGE. Mr. Speaker, picture if you will the following scenes: A little boy comes home from school and picks up the mail as he enters the house. A little girl is allowed to open so-called junk mail addressed to the resident of that address. Yes, typical scenes from typical days in thousands of households. Unfortunately, for many households, this scene is becoming increasingly shocking and unpleasant. Unsolicited, sexually oriented advertisements are sent to homes in our districts every day. These advertisements are full color, explicitly offensive and indecent in and of themselves.

Unbelievably enough, this type of advertisement is sent to our homes every day. Even more unbelievable is the fact that mail porn is sent to senior citizens, families with small children, and yes, even the children themselves. Of course, forms may be filed with the Post Office asking not to receive mail porn, but the burden is on the innocent in their homes, not the porn operator.

Mail porn operators send out thousands of these advertisements in the hopes of gaining just one new customer. They are willing to offend thousands of people in their homes to find just one who is interested. Now I ask you: Just whom are we trying to protect?

In the 100th Congress, I introduced the Pornographic Mail Prohibition Act to protect the innocent in their homes. This year, 129 of my colleagues have joined with me to introduce the Pornographic Mail Prohibition Act into the 101st Congress. When enacted violators of this legislation will be subject to a civil fine of $25,000 as well as criminal forfeiture penalties. As the Supreme Court has stated: "[n]othing in the Constitution compels us to listen to or to view any unwanted communication, whatever its merit * * *" (Rowan v. Post Office, 397 U.S. 728, 737 (1970)).

It is time we stop placing the burden on people in their own homes. By supporting the Pornographic Mail Prohibition Act, you can help shift this burden to where it belongs—on the mail porn operator.

THE SCIENCE, MATHEMATICS AND RESEARCH TECHNOLOGIES SCHOLARSHIPS ACT

(Mr. SLAUGHTER of Virginia asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SLAUGHTER of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, the United States may be surpassed by foreign nations in the technological arena due in large part to an ever-increasing shortage of qualified scientists, mathematicians, and engineers. This technological shortage is posing a threat to the welfare of the American economy and to our national security as well.

In order to meet the enormous challenge of this growing technology gap, today I am introducing the Science, Mathematics and Research Technologies Scholarships Act. To promote the study of engineering, mathematics, and the life and physical sciences, this legislation provides scholarships for the most academically qualified, competitive and interested college juniors. In addition to 2 years of undergraduate support, these scholarships will grant 2 years of graduate financial assistance to those recipients most qualified to pursue additional postgraduate studies.

In return for the scholarship, the scholarship recipients will be called upon to use their technological skills and knowledge for summer and postgraduate service in a science, mathematics, or engineering related capacity in the employ of the United States or with an organization performing services for the United States. Thus, through this program, the Government would invest in the academic pursuits of certain outstanding students by providing financial incentives for them to continue their education in fields that are critically important to the Nation in return for this service.

RESIGNATION AS LEGISLATIVE COUNSEL OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HUTTO) laid before the House the following resignation as legislative counsel of the House of Representatives:

U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, DC, February 16, 1989.

Hon. JIM WRIGHT,
Speaker, U.S. House of Representatives, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I hereby submit my resignation as Legislative Counsel of the United States House of Representatives effective at the close of business February 28, 1989.

Sincerely yours,

WARD M. HUSSEY,
Legislative Counsel.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the following communication from the Speaker:

The Clerk read as follows:

U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, DC, February 21, 1989.

WARD M. HUSSEY, Esq.
Legislative Counsel, U.S. House of Representatives, Washington, DC.

DEAR WARD: I have received your letter of February 16, 1989, stating that you shall retire as Legislative Counsel to the House of Representatives effective on February 28, 1989. I accept your resignation with profound appreciation for the devoted service you have rendered since 1946 to the House and its Members and, indeed, to the Nation.

The Office of Legislative Counsel has come a long way since its origin as the Legislative Drafting Service in 1919. It has become one of the essential institutions of the House, a truth that is ably demonstrated by the nearly universal reliance of Members and committees on its professional services. Especially under your leadership, the Office has flourished as a reservoir of expertise from which Members of the House can draw the nonpartisan advice and assistance that is indispensable to the clear, faithful, and coherent expression of legislative policy. The example you have set, since 1946 as a consummate legislative draftsman and since 1972 as the foresighted head of the Office, bespeaks a blend of skill and dedication that, in my experience, is unsurpassed.

I know I speak for the entire House of Representatives when I say that you leave here with our admiration, our respect, our gratitude, and our heartfelt wishes for many years of happiness and much success in your future endeavors.

Sincerely,

JIM WRIGHT,
The Speaker.

EXPRESSING GRATITUDE OF THE HOUSE FOR THE SERVICE OF WARD M. HUSSEY AND LAWRENCE E. FILSON

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution (H. Res. 97) expressing the gratitude of the House of Representatives for the service of Ward M. Hussey and Lawrence E. Filson, and I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

H. RES. 97

Whereas Ward M. Hussey was appointed to the Office of the Legislative Counsel in November 1946 and Lawrence E. Filson was appointed to that Office in October 1949;

Whereas Ward M. Hussey and Lawrence E. Filson have provided 83 years of service to the House of Representatives as members of the Office of the Legislative Counsel;

Whereas Ward M. Hussey has served as the Legislative Counsel for 17 years and Lawrence E. Filson has served as the Deputy Legislative Counsel for 17 years;

Whereas Ward M. Hussey has been the principal draftsman of all the Federal income tax laws beginning before the enactment of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954; and

Whereas Lawrence E. Filson has been the principal draftsman of all major social security laws since 1954, including the original medicare and medicaid and supplementary security income laws, the Congressional

Budget Act, and significant housing legislation: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the House of Representatives expresses its gratitude to—

(1) Ward M. Hussey and Lawrence E. Filson for their combined service to the House of 83 years, and

(2) the Office of the Legislative Counsel for its 70 years of assistance in the drafting of legislation considered by the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI] is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, for the purposes of debate, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. ARCHER], and pending that, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, the resolution before the House pays a well-deserved tribute to two men who are leaving one of the least publicized yet most important offices on Capitol Hill. Yesterday, Ward Hussey, the legislative counsel for the House, and Larry Filson, the deputy counsel, retired. Their combined service in the Office of Legislative Counsel amounts to a total of 83 years. Their contribution to the work of the House of Representatives is immeasurable.

The Legislative Counsel Office is one of the most important and respected on Capitol Hill. The House depends on the office at every stage of the legislative process: From the drafting of a bill for introduction to the final version of conference agreements. It is there that our decisions are translated into statutory language. The Office of Legislative Counsel enjoys a reputation for professionalism and fairness that is unrivaled on Capitol Hill. Ward Hussey and Larry Filson helped establish the office's tradition of excellence.

Ward Hussey joined the Office of Legislative Counsel in 1946 after his World War II service in Okinawa. His service experience setting up a postal system for civilians led him to consider a job with the Government. This in turn led to a lifetime of public service and personal sacrifice.

Ward has often told us how difficult it was in those early days when, as the most junior staff person in the office, he would always get the last carbon copy from the old typewriters: A copy so faint and smeared that it was barely readable. But Ward persevered, and on March 1, 1972, he became only the fourth House Legislative Counsel since the office was established in 1918.

The Committee on Ways and Means has come to know Ward as the country's most knowledgeable expert on the Internal Revenue Code, but when he first joined the staff, he did not work on tax legislation. In fact, early in his career he helped draft the Marshall plan, and its statement of purposes, which established the framework for the rebuilding of post-war Europe.

In 1952, however, he began to work exclusively on tax legislation. This occurred, in Ward's own words, because no one else in the office wanted to work on tax bills. Knowing of the many frustrations to be encountered in this area, I can understand why no one wanted to draft tax legislation.

Soon after becoming the "tax man" at legislative counsel, Ward began a 9-month effort rewriting the entire Internal Revenue Code. His product became the Internal Revenue Code of 1954. Thirty-two years, and many tax bills later, Ward once again rewrote the entire Tax Code when he directed the drafting of the Tax Reform Act of 1986. The Tax Reform Act of 1986 has a very special meaning for me. Its enactment would have been impossible without the expertise and energy of Ward Hussey and his staff.

Larry Filson, a graduate of Park College and Columbia Law School, joined the Office of Legislative Counsel on October 1, 1949. He became assistant counsel in 1952 and deputy legislative counsel in 1972. Larry has drafted legislation in many areas of Federal law, using in his early days a now antique Royal manual typewriter.

A sampler of the landmark laws that reflect Larry's drafting skill would include—

(1) All of the major Social Security laws since 1954, including the original Medicare, Medicaid, and supplemental security income laws,

(2) The National Aeronautics and Space Act of 1958,

(3) The Congressional Budget Act of 1974,

(4) The Gramm-Rudman-Hollings Acts of both 1985 and 1987, and most recently,

(5) The Family Support Act of 1988.

Over the years, countless members and their legislative assistants have not only been helped, they've been saved because of Larry's expertise. Many a stalled legislative drafting session has been salvaged by Larry taking a draw of his pipe and saying, "I think what you're really trying to do is this." As if by magic, the right words would appear.

Mr. Speaker, it is a rare occasion for the House to adopt a resolution of this sort, but I can think of no more deserving recipients of this honor. The careers of Ward Hussey and Larry Filson are an example of public service at its finest. I know that all of my colleagues join me in thanking them for their service to their country and to this House.

Ward, Larry, we will miss you and we wish you all the best.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. ARCHER. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I'm very grateful for this opportunity to join Chairman ROSTENKOWSKI in offering this resolution honoring Ward Hussey and Larry Filson.

Their retirement today from the Office of Legislative Counsel is indeed a reflective occasion for those of us who have worked with these two gentlemen over the years.

Yes, it gives us a great chance to say a heartfelt "thank you" to these men who absolutely epitomize what it means to toil in the background. It also, however, represents a sad moment, when we must witness the passing of an era.

"Ward Hussey" and "Larry Filson" are not household names in this country * * * and, unfortunately, relatively few Americans will ever know about the contributions that they have both made to this Nation during their distinguished careers.

That's the way they wanted it. In fact—in an interview several years ago—Ward commented that one of the specifications for his job is a "passion for anonymity."

That may be a rare commodity in the Nation's Capital, but, in truth, it's one of the noble traits of these two men—which allowed Ward and Larry to be so successful in carrying out their responsibilities.

They are, and have been throughout their long careers, true professionals who epitomize the definition of public service.

Both of them could have shined in careers in the private sector, and enjoyed far greater financial rewards for their labors.

They chose instead to focus their brilliance on helping the Congress put into workable language the ideas we generate that affect the lives of all Americans.

Described by a close friend of mine as the quintessential wise man on the Social Security Act, Larry Filson, Deputy Legislative Counsel, has been known to insiders as Mr. Social Security.

He has drafted all of the major additions to the Social Security Act since the early 1950's.

That includes the Social Security Disability Program, the Medicare Program, the Supplemental Security Income Program, and, of course, the major Social Security Amendments of 1983.

Those who have had the pleasure of working with Larry in the late hours of final drafting sessions appreciate not only his expansive program knowledge and professionalism, but also his affable, accommodating nature and his dry wit.

Larry will be missed by all of us. He is a gentleman and the consummate scholar of the Social Security Act.

Likewise, no one will ever surpass the knowledge of the International Revenue Code possessed by Ward Hussey, House Legislative Counsel.

While one of his greatest achievements was the drafting of the post-World War II Marshall plan, he is, without a doubt, known now as Mr. Tax Code.

A key writer of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, he drafted all of the additions to that document, as well as its replacement, the Internal Revenue Code of 1986.

His ability to frame complex tax concepts in simple legislative language is legendary.

Former tax staffers refer, with reverence, to Ward's way of rising from his chair during a heated debate in a drafting session, going to the chalkboard and outlining, in a now silent room, the essential elements of a solution.

A significant part of the lasting contributions of these two men will not be found just in the printed words they drafted.

They also have served as teachers and counselors to other generations of dedicated public servants, who in turn have carried on their commitment to precision in putting legislative action into the written law.

They never lost sight of the importance of that vital step in carrying out the will of the people, through their elected officials in Congress.

Ward and Larry, we hope that this Resolution honoring you on the occasion of your retirements, conveys how grateful we and the Nation are for the service you've rendered.

Neither you, nor your contributions to our Nation, will be forgotten.

Thank you, and God bless you.

Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from California [Mr. THOMAS].

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HUTTO). Without objection the gentleman from California [Mr. THOMAS] will control the balance of the time.

There was no objection.

□ 1450

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PICKLE].

Mr. PICKLE. Mr. Speaker, it is good that we are going to take this time today to pay our respects to these two senior officials. Some of the people who might be listening to any replay of this might wonder, "Why would you single out two people when there are hundreds and hundreds of people up here on the Hill?"

But there are occasions, however, when we should do this, for here are two people who really helped to mold legislation over the years for the betterment of the Republic.

I marvel at times because I wonder how can we get legislation that we vote on for final passage when we have labored for months and months on a particular bill, formulated a policy, and then said conceptually this is what we have agreed to. We go home at midnight and the next day at noon a 200-page bill is prepared for us to vote on in legal form. Now, that sounds like almost an impossibility, and it is. Sometimes there are little flaws made, but can you imagine the years and years of training it takes to be able to master that type of a project. We could not do it if we did not have veteran people like Ward Hussey and Larry Filson.

Larry, I know from personal experience, helped us draft the Social Security reform bill of 1983 and has kept with it over the years. We can all be proud that the trust fund is solvent. In fact, unfortunately, it is being looked upon as a potential source of funds for other uses. But we have done a good job with the 1983 legislation and Larry Filson is to be commended.

Ward Hussey has been here for 43 years. You must have gone back to even before JAMIE WHITTEN came to the Congress, about the same time, so you are older almost than the Capitol Dome.

Well, it makes us feel good that we have had people who are professional. You two are typical of people who make the Congress look good. You have drafted legislation that has been in the public interest. The Nation is proud of you and those of us who work with you on the committee give you our special thanks.

Mr. THOMAS of California. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

I consider myself a junior member of the firm, and so in my remarks I will reflect on what I find to be a constant amazement, and that is those of us who are out front, for example on the Ways and Means Committee, and get all the attention, all of the picture time and all of the ink time in producing what people consider the law of the land, have to understand and appreciate that it is very much like making a movie. Those people who are up there on the screen are only up there on the screen performing a very small part of what puts them up on the screen. What we have had in Ward Hussey and Larry Filson are the finest directors, the finest cameramen, the finest sound men, the finest stage men. They are everything else that makes a motion picture a motion picture.

When we argue the concept in a tax bill and we do argue the general concepts, they have to take what is sometimes a fairly vague message and not only put it into legislative language, not only make sure that the sound is in synchronization with the picture on the screen, but also make sure that what is said fits in with what is becoming a far more complex world than was the case just a few years ago, and that is if a desired change in one area affects something else that is already on the books, do you fit it in while making it a whole? That is if the sound and picture are in sync, is it in focus? Is the color correct? Are there people on the stage making noises that we do not know about that show up on the film? All of that has been their responsibility, without the credit, without the spotlight, but with the dedication to not only make us look good, but somehow beyond what I consider human resources be virtually infallible in doing that job, not in months, not in weeks, not even sometimes in days, but required to perform within hours and always doing it with no complaint and with total accuracy. Those are the kind of people that are in our employment. We do not often put the spotlight on them.

I would like to take this opportunity once again in saluting Ward and Larry to reflect on all the other employees who perhaps have not had as critical a job for as long a time, but perform just as admirably.

So from a junior member of the firm, thank you. I do not know who in the world figured out both of you retiring at the same time, but talk about loss of institutional memory, I am worried about a work product for a few years until we get some people up to speed. Having said that, I know you have trained people underneath you to perform as admirably as you have.

Thank you for your years, thank you for your contribution, thank you for making us look as good as we are, and as the author says in the book, these folks made it all correct and if there are any mistakes, they are attributable to us, not them.

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. GUARINI].

Mr. GUARINI. Mr. Speaker, let me rise and add my voice to these well-deserved commendations to Ward Hussey and Larry Filson.

For more than 80 years, they have served this House. They have served our country with distinction. For more than eight decades they have embodied the highest ideal of public service. Often under great pressure and always with integrity and skill, they have served in the front lines of democracy, helping the wheels of government turn.

Those on the Ways and Means Committee have a special feeling for Larry and Ward. From the Marshall Plan to the Tax Code, from the space program to Social Security, we can see the helpful hand of these two distinguished gentlemen.

In a free country, it is often the quiet, unheralded voices that give meaning and substance to the ideas of freedom. Others get the credit, while their accomplishments live on in the laws of our land.

Year after year, day after day, and hour after hour, on law after law, Ward Hussey and Larry Filson have stood on the front lines, and indeed in the trenches.

My friends, wish you both well. We will miss you. The House will miss you. Our Nation will miss you, your talents, your energy and your skills.

Today's commendation is a tribute, a statement of appreciation, a statement of thanks. Because of you, America is a better place and our Nation is grateful for your service.

In a free country that perhaps is the greatest accomplishment and compliment to all or any of our public servants.

Good luck. We wish you successs and happiness in your future endeavors and in your retirement. The best to both you two fine splendid gentlemen.

Mr. CRANE. Mr. Speaker, while on one hand we regret having Ward Hussey and Larry Filson leave us, on the other hand it is with genuine pleasure that we wish them well in their retirement from being of the greatest of assistance to this House of Representatives.

I don't envy those who will try and fill the shoes of these two men—they are the very heart of the House Ways and Means Committee. Oh, yes, we debate and set policy in our efforts to draft legislation. And when we're finished, that's about what we have—a policy statement. And that's when the real work begins; when Ward Hussey and Larry Filson sit down and draft the final product upon which we vote. This pair leads the team which puts our intentions into workable, statutory language while avoiding any substantive changes. It is with their help that we are able to produce a final tax bill. It is not going to impress, or please, many tax-paying citizens to learn the identity of these "tax writers," but we on the Ways and Means Committee know the unimaginable value of these two gentlemen.

It is said, quite accurately, that Ward Hussey knows the tax code better than anyone else. He certainly should. He put in 43 years in the House Legislative Counsel's Office—serving as legislative counsel since 1972. On many occasions I have gone on record as stating that no one had read the Tax Reform Act of 1986, although this voluminous tax law affects every American citizen. I was wrong. While certainly no Member of Congress read the bill before it was passed, Ward Hussey read it. He had to—he wrote it.

In a career that goes back to the end of World War II, Ward has placed his imprint on a great deal of legislation, including such historic documents as the Medicare bill and the Marshall plan. He even had time to help an Irish-American Congressman from Chicago draft a bill which annexed Canada to the United States.

Forty years ago, in 1949, Larry Filson joined the Office of Legislative Counsel. Since 1972, he has served as deputy legislative counsel. For four decades, his hand has helped craft legislation, expertly molding it from the rough form in which it emerged from committee debate until he had fashioned it into a magnificent piece of legislative art exactly reflecting the thoughts of committee members.

His 40 years have seen him take his expertise into such varied areas as Social Security, space, family support, and the budget.

We join in wishing the very best to these two fine gentlemen as they step into what we certainly hope will be the pleasant moments of retirement.

Mr. DOWNEY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to join my colleagues on the Committee on Ways and Means in honoring Ward Hussey and Larry Filson. These two men personify the notion of selfless public service.

In an era where staff on the Hill turn over like the leaves on a tree, the careers of Ward Hussey and Larry Filson stand out like great oaks in a forest. Their knowledge, their wisdom, their respect for and dedication to the House of Representatives as an institution is unparalleled. They are also people for whom no deadline is too short, no request too unreasonable. As they serve as an example to us all, they will be sorely missed.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on House Resolution 97, the resolution now under consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. THOMAS of California. Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time, and I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

FEDERAL EMPLOYEES RECOGNITION WEEK

Mr. SAWYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service be discharged from further consideration of the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 22) to designate the week beginning March 6, 1989, as "Federal Employees Recognition Week," and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. RIDGE. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I yield to my friend and colleague, the gentlewoman from Ohio [Ms. OAKAR], who has been the chief sponsor of this resolution.

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

First of all, I want to say how delighted I am to see two new members on our committee who have already assumed leadership positions, my colleague, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SAWYER], the chairman of this distinguished committee, and the distinguished ranking minority member of the committee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RIDGE], both outstanding individuals, and I am proud to have the pleasure of serving with them on this committee.

Mr. Speaker, ironically, this resolution, which would designate March 6 to 12 "Federal Employee Recognition Week," is very appropriate. We have just seen and heard the distinguished individual and chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI], and his colleagues, herald two gentlemen who have served for many years as legislative counsel to the House of Representatives. They are among the people whom we are honoring today. We are honoring Federal employees, people who are civil servants, many of whom give a career, their lifetime, to the Government of this great country, and, Mr. Speaker, there are 3 million Federal employees, and about 2 million retirees.

Mr. Speaker, they are the reasons, I believe, that we are the greatest country in the world, because they have devoted themselves to civil service and Federal service, and I was pleased not only to hear the words of the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI], about the two distinguished individuals who had served this House as counsel, but I was pleased that President Bush, as one of his first gestures he has made as President, was to pay tribute to Government employees.

However, I do want to take this opportunity while we are recognizing them to say that in the last few years in particular I have been somewhat dismayed to see the kinds of compensation that we give to our Government workers, always being at the cutting edge of our Government cuts in the budget.

In this year's proposal, for example, we see that, once again, there is going to be an attempt to deplete part of their pension and their health benefits and not give them the raise that we would give those who serve in the military, cut some of their health benefits and so on. This is not the way we ought to be treating people who serve the Government, and these people are not only the wonderful people who serve as our staff, they are people who protect our borders, they are people who are our astronauts, and Sally Ride, for example, was a Federal employee, and those astronauts who were killed in service because of the space mishap were Federal employees; they are individuals who work at our military installations, they are individuals who, indeed, make sure that our older Americans and disabled Americans get their Social Security checks.

Mr. Speaker, it is about time, I think, we say thank you not only in terms of paying tribute to them during this recognition week, which I am delighted to have sponsored and had so many cosponsors, but it is about time we put our actions where our words are, and that is why I would urge my colleagues to take a look at the budget assaults and really save us the pain, I think, of once again taking out our budget cuts on the backs of those who serve us the best, and for this reason, I want to thank my distinguished chairman for paying tribute to all Federal employees.

Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman, because I know his remarks will be devoted to the two individuals who have served as Federal employees for many years.

Mr. Speaker, I will be placing the remainder of my remarks in the RECORD, and I will simply say "thank you" to our Government employees and "thank you" to the retirees who do and who have done such a great job for all Americans.

Mr. RIDGE. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, I yield to my friend and colleague, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SAWYER].

Mr. SAWYER. Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of House Joint Resolution 22, to designate the week beginning March 6, 1989, as "Federal Employees Recognition Week." I commend the sponsor of this resolution, Congresswoman OAKAR, for her tireless and longstanding efforts on behalf of the Federal work force.

As a new member of the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, I am proud to join Ms. OAKAR in saluting our Federal employees.

Often in life, we take for granted the delivery of many services and benefits, not stopping to consider the real people who make these real services available through their hard work.

This is particularly the case with services we receive from the Federal Government.

Federal employees process the monthly benefits our senior citizens and veterans receive. They deliver the mail we receive almost daily. They guide thousands of planes in and out of airports, inspect factories and plants for adequate health and safety measures, and conduct research in the hope of finding a cure for life threatening diseases such as cancer and AIDS.

From the Federal Bureau of Investigation to the Drug Enforcement Administration, Federal employees put their lives on the line to reduce the flow of narcotics, the possession of illegal weapons, and the incidence of other criminal behavior which threatens the safety of our communities.

Day in and day out, Federal employees administer programs in housing, education, and job training, all of which will improve the standard of living and expand opportunities for many Americans.

We expect a lot from our Government, but the hard work of those who ensure the efficient operation of the Government often goes unrecognized.

Federal employees deserve our appreciation and recognition for the services they perform. Despite pay scales and benefits which do not keep pace with comparable private sector wages and benefits, Federal employees continue to serve their Government and the people of this Nation with loyalty, dedication, and genuine expertise.

I urge my colleagues to join the gentlewoman from Ohio [Ms. OAKAR] in setting aside next week to recognize and thank our Federal employees for improving the quality of life for all Americans.

Mr. RIDGE. Mr. Speaker, we have a $1 trillion Government, and we are fortunate to have 3 million Federal employees who are committed to delivering many of the services contained within that huge dollar figure by services to people in the communities we represent, and I join my colleagues in support of this resolution.

Mrs. MORELLA. Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend our colleague from Ohio for introducing House Joint Resolution 22 to designate the week beginning March 6, 1989, as "Federal Employees Recognition Week."

The resolution rightly recognizes that the many valuable services performed by this highly talented, educated group of individuals are inadequately recognized, both by Federal officials and the public.

Without these employees, we would be a nation of laws without implementation. We, as a nation, are dependent on Federal employees for the smooth running and organization of each facet of our daily lives—our food and agriculture; the monitoring of the environment; the setting of standards of health products, weights and measurements; banking, securities, commerce, hospital care for veterans, Social Security benefits, and numerous other examples.

Federal employees very seldom get a simple "thank you" from the Federal officials, let alone the public. Nor are Federal employees appreciated in terms of monetary reward. They are paid an average of 26 percent behind their colleagues in the private sector. Furthermore, the President's budget proposal indicates only a 2-percent raise for Federal employees. This is no way to show appreciation for the Federal work force or to help bridge the pay gap. Holding the salary of the Federal work force to a minimum will also affect the retirement pay of these individuals and again, keep them at a lower economic level than their private sector counterparts. This is most unfair to those people who have chosen public service as their life's career. They know that they will not amass great wealth on a Federal salary. By the same token, the Federal Government should not keep them at a low level during and at the end of their career.

Again, Mr. Speaker, I want to commend the gentlelady from Ohio for her thoughtful recognition of Federal employees and am pleased to be a cosponsor of the measure. I urge my colleagues to approve the measure.

Mr. WOLF. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of House Joint Resolution 22 which designates March 6–10 as "Federal Employee Recognition Week."

I represent a congressional district which has as many Federal employees and Federal retirees as any in the Nation. I am a former Federal employee myself, serving at the Department of the Interior before coming to Congress.

I can tell you from firsthand experience that civil servants are among the hardest working and most dedicated professionals this country has. They are highly regarded citizens who are activists and leaders in their communities.

Simply put, Federal employees perform jobs that are important and that the American people demand and rely on.

I believe it is only appropriate that we recognize our Nation's civil servants with this resolution which I am proud to support and cosponsor.

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of House Joint Resolution 22, which designates the week beginning March 6, 1989, as "Federal Employees Recognition Week."

Mr. Speaker, as the ranking Republican on the House Committee on Post Office and Civil Service it gives me a great deal of pleasure to stand here today to recognize our 3 million dedicated Federal employees. Federal employees have been an integral part of the American work force and have made numerous contributions toward our Nation's prosperity. Federal employees are dedicated men and women who perform a vital and valuable service to all Americans each day. They have invested many years developing the expertise and experience necessary to ensure that our needs, which are so often taken for granted, are met in the most efficient effective way.

Mr. Speaker, in recent years Federal employees have taken the brunt of criticism aimed at the Government. There have been repeated attempts to cut the pay and benefits of our Federal employees whose pay lags 25 percent behind the private sector. Yet, our Federal employees find Government service an honorable and rewarding career and continue to serve with dedication and commitment.

Mr. Speaker, "Federal Employees Recognition Week" provides this House with the opportunity to thank the men and women in Federal service as well as acknowledge their contributions to our Nation.

Mr. McMILLEN of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I'd like to add my support for House Joint Resolution 22, "Federal Employees Recognition Week." The week, March 6–13, marks a time when we can pay special tribute to a group of people that get far less praise than they deserve.

There are 3 million Federal employees in this Nation—more than 50,000 living in the Fourth Congressional District. The tasks these people perform often go unnoticed by us, but are vital to the operation of important services we depend on everyday: the handling of Social Security checks; monitoring the skies over airports; and patrolling our shores in defense of the Nation. We have come to depend on these services, but often forget that there's a person who must do each and every task.

These unsung heroes of the Nation deserve a national thank you and a week to recognize their effort. Their job requirements often demand them to go above and beyond the call of duty. One group estimated that every year Federal employees donate between $600 and $800 million in uncompensated overtime. This, at a time when their pay and benefits are often reduced. Two years ago Federal employees' pay was temporarily frozen and retirees received no cost-of-living adjustment [COLA] for inflation. This year President Bush's budget is proposing a similar 1-year freeze on COLA's for Federal and military retirees as a means to balance the budget. These public servants are not the ones who should be expected to pay for the excessive budget deficits run up over the last 8 years.

Federal employees have contributed more than their share to the growth and betterment of America. Since 1945, 38 Nobel Prizes in medicine or physiology have been won by people employed by the Government or receiving Government support. It was a Census Bureau accountant who was responsible for one of the early breakthroughs in computers, and a Department of Defense scientist who developed the first integrated circuit.

Our Nation cannot begin to repay the debt to Federal employees and retirees. Their selfless service often goes unnoticed—but not this week. This week we pay tribute to these unsung heroes—a tribute that's long overdue.

Mr. RIDGE. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HUTTO). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

H.J. RES. 22

Whereas Federal employees serve the people of the United States by enabling the Federal Government to carry out its duties in an efficient manner;

Whereas more than 3,000,000 individuals are employed by the Federal Government;

Whereas many valuable services performed by Federal employees are often inadequately recognized by Federal officials and by the people of the United States; and

Whereas Federal employees should be commemorated for the contributions that they make to the efficient operation of the Federal Government: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the week beginning March 6, 1989, is designated "Federal Employees Recognition Week", and the President of the United States is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe such week with appropriate ceremonies and activities.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. SAWYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the subject of the joint resolution just passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

LEGISLATION TREATING SEMIAUTOMATIC ASSAULT WEAPONS IN SAME MANNER AS AUTOMATIC MACHINEGUNS

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HUTTO). Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California [Mr. STARK] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of 33 other Members from both parties, including 18 from California, I am introducing today a bill which treats semiautomatic assault weapons in exactly the same manner as current law for full automatic machineguns.

Assault weapons are not traditional hunting weapons. Assault weapons have no practical value to a civilized society.

If anyone can tell me why the AK–47, the Uzi, the MAC–10, the TEC–9 shouldn't be treated in the same way that full automatic machineguns, please come forward.

Our pragmatic approach bans the future importation and domestic manufacture of a specific list of semiautomatic assault weapons, including the AK–47, the Uzi, the MAC–10, the TEC–9 and several other assault weapons recommended as the weapons of choice of drug dealers, violent criminals, and terrorists. Current ownership is grandfathered, with future purchasers required to go through the same steps as those for fully automatic machineguns: a background check and approval from local police, registration of the weapon, and payment of a $200 transfer tax.

These assault weapons are found in the cities of Beirut, Tripoli, and Johannesburg. They shouldn't be the drug dealer's weapons of choice the cities of Los Angeles, Oakland, or even Des Moines, IA.

Assault weapons are weapons of war; assault weapons are the weapons of drug dealers and violent criminals, they are the weapons of terrorists and psychopaths.

Enough is enough. It is time to close the loophole in the law and stand by the side of law enforcement, before more psychos mow down the next schoolyard.

THE PRESIDENT'S BUDGET

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FRANK] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, I would like to talk today about the budget submitted by the President. My talk will be incomplete because the budget is incomplete.

The first thing that ought to be noted is that George Bush began his term with the most extraordinary refusal to exercise the powers of the Presidency that we have seen in a long time. Many of us became, in 8 years, accustomed to Ronald Reagan insisting on his right as President to exercise the prerogatives of that office. Indeed, many conservatives who were once critics of the excessively powerful Presidency that they thought began with Franklin Roosevelt, many of these conservatives during the 1980's were critical of what they argued were congressional intrusions on legitimate Presidential prerogatives.

It was very surprising, therefore, to have George Bush begin his governance by submitting to us a budget in which he resolutely refused to tell us how he thinks a substantial amount of the Federal money ought to be spent. He is clear in some things. President Bush is clear that we should increase military spending this year in dollars sufficient to meet inflation, which is a far larger increase than he grants to almost any other part of the Federal budget.

President Bush was also clear that we should cut the Medicare budget which provides funds for the sick elderly by $5 billion, a cut which I believe unwise, which will clearly, in my judgment, have adverse consequences on the elderly who are sick, and on those who try to care for them.

But when it comes to the great bulk of programs that the Federal Government deals with, education, the environment, housing, transportation, a number of programs in that general Government area, many of which are quite important in carrying out social purposes, purposes to which the President pays allegiance, George Bush sent us the unbudget. What the President said was here is the amount that I think we have to cut, and it is a very substantial cut, and here are some programs. Now Congress, I am not going to tell you how much I think should be spent on any of them. I am only going to tell you in general that they ought to be cut.

Mr. Speaker, it is a failure of the most egregious sort on the part of the President to exercise his constitutional and statutory responsibilities, and it bespeaks, unfortunately, a lack of courage on the part of the President.

What he was confronted with was a series apparently of internally inconsistent promises which he made during the campaign. He promised increased military spending. He promised to raise no taxes and, in fact, to lower some, capital gains for people who are wealthy, some others in the oil and gas industry. At the same time, the President said that he would increase spending in several domestic areas. He said he would increase spending for education, he would increase spending for the environment, he would give special tax breaks for day care, he would give special tax breaks in other areas.

What we got was a man who said he would be for more defense spending, cut some taxes and increase no others, an education and environment President. And he took office and he found, as many of us believed, that it was not possible to do all of those things.

What we got from President Bush was a very good speech, one which outlined a number of goals which most of us in the House adhered to, and I believe that to the extent there was disagreement with most of those goals it came on the Republican side because George Bush talked about a very active and affirmative Federal Government. The previous conservative position I thought was we should not have a Federal Education Department. George Bush represents a President who thinks that the Federal Government should strongly influence standards by which teachers are judged, eligibility, teacher certification. That is a very great reach forward of Federal influence. I welcome it.

The problem is that the gap that exists between George Bush's well-intentioned speech and George Bush's budget is enormous. We have been used to the trade deficit and the budget deficit. We now have the budget speech deficit from George Bush, because the budget he sent us simply does not carry out promises that he made.

He dealt with that in a way that seems to me wrong for the President of the United States. He did say, as I look at it, "I tell you that I want to cut taxes for these groups of people, and I tell you that I do not want to increase taxes in a single place elsewhere." George Bush is a rare man, Mr. Speaker, he can look at that Federal Tax Code and say that he cannot find in it a single loophole worth closing. He looks at the Federal Tax Code and says it is perfectly fair. There is not a group anywhere that is being at all undertaxed relative to the rest of us. There is not any group anywhere that is taking advantage of a nook here and a cranny there to pay too little.

I do not think that is accurate. But he is the President and he has the right to make his own recommendations.

But what that has led him into do is to take the great bulk of what we call the discretionary, domestic programs, education, job training, the environment, community development, housing, transportation, a very large number of programs to which he said, making rhetorical tribute in his speech, said to Congress, here, cut them some, but I will not tell you where I am going to cut them. It is transparently political in the worst way. What he is saying is that there is pain to be spread around, so Congress, you do it.

I am not suggesting that Congress ought to insist that the President do it alone. Of course, it will be the job ultimately of this body to say what the final cuts will be in the legislation which we will send to the President to sign or veto. But it has heretofore, since we adopted the Budget Act, always been considered the responsibility of the President also to say what are his priorities, and what George Bush says is "Well, I need you to make very bad cuts in education and in transportation and in the environment and housing and other areas, but I want to be kind and gentle, so I am not going to tell you where I am going to do it."

It is the most extraordinary refusal on the part of a President to exercise his legitimate authority that I have ever seen. It is, in short, an absolute abdication of the responsibility to exercise any leadership whatsoever.

But even in these times, the President had to make some choices. And the next thing to be noted is that to the extent that he did make some choices, because he could not avoid them altogether, he made choices which fail sadly to carry out his promises to improve our capacity to deal with social problems.

Let me at this point, Mr. Speaker, say I want to anticipate those who say is the gentleman saying that money is always the answer. Money is not in any case a sufficient way to deal with social problems. But in most cases, and absence of adequate resources hampers our ability to deal with problems.

What is interesting to me is some of my conservative friends who most frequently denigrate money as an indicator of support, who most frequently say we need not measure commitment to programs in money spent, when it comes to the single biggest spending category of the budget, the military budget, they take the exact opposite position.

When Ronald Reagan and those who supported him during the 8 years in office and those who continue to advocate that position talk about national defense their position is that you measure your commitment to it in dollars, among other things. That is not a wholly inaccurate. Although I do believe that as a result of the execssive rate of spending increases and the absolute lack of management we saw particularly under Secretary Weinberger when he focused his considerable energies almost exclusively on "more" and not at all on "better" or even "well," and I believe there is clearly room to economize.

But clearly all of us recognize that the more resources you put into a problem the better you will deal with that problem. Now those resources obviously will be better utilized if they are sensibly employed, but money is one relevant measure. And what George Bush has done is in almost every area, cut back further and further in areas that have already been hurt badly.

The Center on Budget and Policy Priorities, which does, I believe, consistently the best budget analyses, accurate, responsible, value-laden. They are people who think that the poorest people in this very wealthy society have some claim on the rest of us so that they do not live degraded existences. They believe, as I do, that in a country as wealthy as we are, with the free enterprise system which functions as well as ours does, we can afford some percentage of our resources to take care of those who would not otherwise be able to live minimally decent lives, particularly those for whom there is some reason other than personal sloth, which leads them to be in difficult situations.

Let me read, Mr. Speaker, from the most comprehensive budget analysis which they did, which I intend to append to my remarks at least in part. "An analysis of the Federal budget proposals unveiled February 9 by President Bush indicates that claims that the budget would make significant stride toward a 'kinder, gentler nation' must be treated with skepticism. The budget does contain some new domestic initiatives. However, a number of the new initiatives are either smaller than the administration's budget rhetoric would indicate, turn out not truly to represent increases when the budget numbers are carefully examined, or are actually new cuts that have been skillfully packaged and presented to appear as increases."

The problem, Mr. Speaker, is that George Bush's commitment to ever-increased military spending, coupled with his determination not to close a single hoophole in the Federal Tax Code, not to get an additional dollar from people who might be held not to be paying their fair share, leaves him no choice but to reduce our capacity as a Federal Government to protect the environment and provide help for the homeless and provide other needy people with important aspects of their lives.

Let me go back to the center for Budget Priorities, or more accurately Center on Budget and Policy Priorities, "In addition, the majority of the domestic programs in the budget that are not entitlements, along with some that are entitlements, would be lumped together into one large category. Total spending or outlays for this category would be frozen in fiscal year 1990 at $136 billion, the same level as in fiscal 1989. The budget does not specify the amounts by which each program in this category should be reduced, a matter that is left for negotiations with Congress. However, to freeze total spending for this category of programs would require that substantial cuts be made in these programs below the level needed to maintain fiscal year 1989 service levels into fiscal 1990 after taking inflation into account." In other words, George Bush gives the military a full compensation for inflation and we are talking here—I should not say the military because I believe the individual members in the military are fully entitled to that. I believe that individual members who volunteer to serve this country under great danger many times, at considerable inconvenience and difficulty at almost all times, they are fully entitled individually to the compensation for inflation. But that does not mean that you have to compensate the entire defense establishment, contractors and everything else, for inflation. Remember we are talking here about continuing to give favored treatment in the budget to that element in the budget which has already received the biggest increases during the 1980's.

Pentagon spending has greatly increased. What George Bush is saying is that "I am going to fully protect them from inflation on top of the large amount they have already gotten to." Whereas programs like housing, environmental programs which were badly cut during the eighties, they will not even be given an inflationary factor.

Let me quote again from the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities in a release that they put out entitled "The Bush Defense Budget" dated February 16, 1989, "The burden of deficit reduction: Under the Bush budget defense would make only a small contribution to deficit reduction, $0.6 billion of the $27 billion in cuts needed to meet the fiscal year 1990 Gramm-Rudman-Hollings target."

I trust, Mr. Speaker, I may refer to those three distinguished Members of the Senate in their bill-named capacity. I hasten to point out that I make no comment on those three worthy gentlemen. I simply mention their names because that is the way in which we know the bill.

Let me go back now to quoting: "While defense accounts for more than 25 percent of Federal spending, it would contribute less than 3 percent to the required reductions. Defense might actually contribute nothing to deficit reduction, since Congressional Budget Office estimates of defense outlays are $3 billion higher than the administration.

"The small defense contribution leaves the bulk of reductions to be made by nondefense programs, since the administration has ruled out revenue increases.

"Under the Bush proposal defense budgets would make future deficit reduction efforts more difficult, because budget estimates are for 1 percent growth of budget authority in fiscal 1991 and 1992 and 2 percent in 1993."

That is the Center for Budget and Policy Priorities. Let me point out those last numbers they talk about are in addition to inflation. So they will compensate them more than inflation.

Here is where we are under this budget: Medicare; Medicare provides some, by no means all, some medical assistance to people who are 65 and sick. If you are 65 and not sick, you do not get anything from Medicare. People do not draw on their Medicare entitlement unless they are ill.

If you are 65 and sick, the George Bush budget says, "I am going to give you $5 billion less than we need just to stay where we are." Now older people who understand the reality of Medicare know that thanks to the Ronald Reagan budgets and our failure as a Congress to change them—now we did change them some. We made the Reagan budgets less harsh in their impact on the elderly for 8 years. For 6 years the other body was controlled by the Republican Party and they were allies, generally, of the President there. The last 2 years with Democratic control of both bodies we were able to lessen the harshness of the Reagan budget on the elderly.

George Bush wants to continue that path. He wants to give the military full compensation for inflation, the military which has already been substantially funded at a very high rate during the eighties, and he gets that in part by cutting medical care. People should understand that the cost of those Stealth bombers at hundreds of millions of dollars per plane, the costs of inefficiency and corruption at the Pentagon, the cost of the high fees which Pentagon contractors pay to lobbyists so that they can compete with each other for these large amounts of money, the costs of the strategic defense initiative which John Tower and George Bush have said they probably do not think will work as Ronald Reagan pictured it, one of the costs of all of those things is a cut in the money that goes to pay for the elderly sick.

Let me return to the discussion which the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities gives. They talk about the Bush new domestic initiatives, because remember the first point of the Bush budget is it fails to include the most essential elements of the budget. It does not tell us where the President thinks there should be cuts. It is a cowardly budget. It is a budget which gives up Presidential prerogatives of which we have heard so much. The President should be aware that he will sound somewhat hollow to many of us if in the future he insists that his prerogatives are being taken away when he voluntarily gave up more power than I have ever seen any President ever give up, when he said with regard to $136 billion in Federal spending, "Here is this pot, it needs to be substantially cut and don't look at me, guys, you are on your own, because it would be an unpopular thing to do and I am looking for a honeymoon to last another year or two."

The second point though is that even the areas where the President did indicate what he was going to do, the actuality is, sadly, not up to the standard of civility and humane public policy that the President set.

The thing I think it is important for us to use is the standard George Bush set for himself in the Inaugural Address and the State of the Union Address saying he wanted to do more for the environment and more for education, and talked how he would expand Medicaid benefits. We are measuring George Bush by the standards he deemed to be appropriate. He fails, sadly fails, by his own standards.

Here is what the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities says, and Mr. Speaker, it is my intention to submit these documents for the RECORD. I invite people on the other side, as public defenders of the President, to come forward in future days. Let us have the debate on the budget. I suppose they defend George Bush's refusal to tell us where he thinks the cuts should be made. That is their right. Let us talk about it.

I would like them to tell me they think it is okay to cut $5 billion out of Medicaid, and perhaps they can show me how, as the President said it would not hurt the recipients. I think that is wrong. I don't think we can further squeeze the providers, the doctors and nurses and administrators and others, and not have the negative impact on the recipients that we have already seen. But I will submit these and we will have discussion of them.

Let me read again from the Center on Budget Policy Priorities. "In a number of areas identified in the budget as new domestic initiatives, the actual proposals to move toward a kinder, gentler Nation do not appear to match the rhetoric that accompanies them." Medicaid, "the budget proposes to expand coverage to reach poor, pregnant women and young children." Mr. Speaker, there is insignificant explanatory material about what that means. It says the Bush budget proposed to expand mandatory coverage for pregnant women and infants, which would be an increase, and also Medicaid covers for immunization for children up to age 5, not otherwise covered. But then, Mr. Speaker, we get the unfortunate kicker, "at the same time," and this is the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities, "at the same time, however, the Bush budget fails to include any new funds to cover these expansions. Every dollar is increased Medicaid funding to cover these expansions is offset by a dollar in new Medicaid cuts. As a result, the total amount requested for Medicaid is identical, to the dollar, to the amount the Office of Management and Budget has said is needed to fund Medicaid under current law without expansions."

The President came and stood in this Chamber and said, "I am proposing the following expansions of Medicaid," and he was speaking the truth when he said that. Sadly, he was not speaking the whole truth, because he did not tell us he was going to finance those expansions of Medicaid by cuts elsewhere in the program. So, yes, some poor people will be better off, and I welcome that, but they will be better off only because other poor people will be worse off, and that is not a morally acceptable way to govern a strong and wealthy and compassionate Nation, and not kind, and it is not gentle to pit the poor against each other. Certainly not when we are giving the military a continuation of the kinds of increases they have already gotten.

Let me go on, Mr. Speaker, and there is more here about education which will go in the RECORD, and move on to the area of education. President Bush said he wanted to be the education President. Let me read from the center again. "Despite the President's claim, the budget would not do more for education, and the inclusion of several modest new education initiatives, the overall education budget would be cut. Funding for the Department of Education will be cut $100 million below the levels needed just to keep even with inflation and to maintain the current level of educational services. According to the Bush budget, some $17.3 billion was appropriated fiscal year 1989. To keep pace with inflation and avoid reduction, $18 billion would be needed in 1990, but the budget proposes slightly less, $17.9 billion in 1990." Skipping a paragraph which I will include in the RECORD, let me read again, "Analysis by the Senate Budget Committee staff has found that the Bush request for this part of the budget is $100 million in outlays below the amount requested in the Reagan budget despite the presence of education and Head Start, areas the President said he would expand. Most other programs in this area are lumped into the category from which $9.6 billion reductions would be made, and more deeply than in the Reagan budget."

In other words, in what he submits there are cuts, and this is again in the area where the President said he refuses to tell us what he thinks is right, so it will be cut even more. That is where we are in the area of education.

Then we get to the area of housing and homelessness. I was struck during the political campaign when then-Vice President Bush said in response to Governor Dukakis, who was responding to a question on the homeless, "Governor," the Vice President said, "you are confusing the issue of the homeless and housing." I do not wish to dispute the Vice President's bad grammar. He said, "Governor, you are confusing the issue of the homeless and housing." Mr. Speaker, that is a subject and sentence worthy of contemplation. Think about it. We are confusing the issue of the homeless and housing. In other words, we should separate the issue of the homeless from the issue of housing. Mr. Speaker, that is why they are homeless. They have been separated from housing. I thought he must have misspoken. How can we talk about separating the homeless from housing. But I heard the speech on the budget, and in contrast to his predecessor, George Bush speaks with more compassion and understanding and intelligence about the homeless. He does not purport to believe that they are people who like the outdoors, who willfully refuse to take the bounty of a great Nation. He understands that there are problems, some in societal arrangements, some in their own persons, and he understands there are serious economic and social programs for which society has a great deal of responsibility leading to the homeless situation, and he said, unlike President Reagan, he would be for funding the McKinney Homeless Act, named for our late and extraordinarily compassionate, decent colleague, Stewart McKinney. The McKinney program, for those who know the homeless program, is a very important one. It filled the big missing gap in our policy. It is an emergency and short-term program by nature, by the design of Stewart McKinney, and provides very short-term emergency relief for people who are in great pain. George Bush said in his speech that he wanted to provide more counselors for the homeless, better shelters for the homeless, and job training, and promised to do several things for the homeless, and then I read the budget and he does in the budget propose to do some things for the homeless, but Mr. Speaker, none of them include getting them new homes.

This budget is a disaster from the standpoint of trying to provide housing for individuals.

Once again, it comes from a man who finds not a single loophole in the Federal budget worth closing, who apparently believes we have achieved absolute fairness in the tax law, who, in fact, would like to reduce some of the rates, he says ultimately, which is a gamble that we will be in any way, benefit wealthier people. About that, there is no doubt. The tax cuts George Bush proposes he believes will bring us more revenue, ultimately others think they will not. They will all clearly put more money in the short term in the pockets of the wealthy, and he proposes no way to counter that effect.

He is also a man who wants to continue the extraordinary buildup of spending for the military. You know, Mr. Speaker, nowhere in what George Bush has said since he became President, in the state documents and elsewhere, have I seen any indication that he thinks we should be getting a greater contribution on the international security burden from our very wealthy allies. I have seen no sign that President Bush plans to increase American pressure to get our European and Asian allies, many of whom are quite prosperous today, to share the defense, and I am not one who says we should force them to increase their own military spending, but I must say that if the Western Europeans feel menaced by the Warsaw Pact, I expect them to increase their own military spending. But if they do not feel menaced, do not. I do not understand why it is in our interest in insisting that they act menaced, to the tune of allowing us to spend billions and billions of dollars to defend them from the threat that they do not feel themselves is terribly pressing.

As far as Japan, it is not wise to urge them to increase their own military spending, but many areas which again could take over burden from us, they have begun to spend more on foreign aid that is overdue and welcome, but not enough. There are many more things to do, including payments to us, for burdens we undertake. There was never any reason for Ronald Reagan to have allowed the Japanese to receive the free escort service which we provided for them for so long. Not forever, but for so long when we sent our ships into the gulf.

There were good strategic reasons for us to do it. There were even better economic reasons for us to insist that the Japanese contribute some. But George Bush apparently finds no fault with that situation. So he tells us we do not have enough money because we have to increase military spending; we cannot ask that we get the contribution from our wealthy allies.

How do we do that? We continue the assault on the housing area. Yes, the McKinney program will be increased, but the George Bush budget covers this, and let me now quote again from the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities: "The growing shortage of affordable low-rent housing is widely thought to be one of the principal causes of growing homelessness." This is my aside, Mr. Speaker: That is not an assertion of overwhelming controversiality, that one reason we have more homelessness is that there are many fewer units available that those people can afford to live in.

Now, the Center continues: "The budget proposals fail to address this problem—containing the same low-income housing proposals as the Reagan budget—and may actually aggravate it through the reductions proposed in the low-income housing programs." So once again they are in that box.

Mr. Speaker, as the Democratic Study Group pointed out in its most recent study of the budget dated February 27 and as the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities and others have pointed out, not only does the George Bush budget fail to live up to its own promises to be kinder and gentler, it is in several areas considerably worse overall than the Reagan budget by the standard George Bush has set. He is the one who said that we have got to be gentler and kinder. Kinder and gentler than what? Kinder and gentler than Herbert Hoover? Kinder and gentler than America in the 1890's or Britain in the 1920's? One assumes that when the President uses the comparative words, "kinder and gentler," he means then the 8 years that preceded him, and his budget fails to do that.

Mr. Speaker, for the last few years a very strange phenomenon has existed around here. A majority of my colleagues in both Houses voted for the bill known as Gramm-Rudman-Hollings, a bill which I never thought made an enormous amount of sense, and having voted for it, people then used it to scare small children and others who are impressionable. The argument would be that you must give in on this and you must give in on that or else you will get the invocation of the sequestration provisions of Gramm-Rudman-Hollings.

Mr. Speaker, it is hard to be definite at first because the Bush budget is such an example of an "unbudget," because George Bush so adamantly refuses to live up to his responsibilities as President that he will not tell us, let me remind the Members, Mr. Speaker, exactly or even approximately what programs should be cut, because he wants to get the political credit for those cuts being made but he does not want to identify the ones he thinks ought to be cut. That is a terrible failing in a democratic leader.

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to see that my colleague, the gentlewoman from California [Mrs. BOXER], is here. She is one of the leaders on the Budget Committee in this House who is trying to get fair consideration and who is pointing out that the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings sequestration, which has been something people have been using with which to scare others, would actually have less social negative consequences on this country than if we were to adopt the George Bush budget.

Mr. Speaker, at this point, to elaborate on this, since she is one who has been leading the fight on sensible budget priorities, I yield to my distinguish colleague, the gentlewoman from California [Mrs. BOXER].

Mrs. BOXER. Mr. Speaker, I want to commend the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FRANK]. Once more, he is bringing to the public the issues of the day that are of utmost concern.

Mr. Speaker, we have had many diversions in the last couple of weeks. There is a very contentious nomination of a Defense Secretary being considered over in the other body. We have had the President off to Canada, then off to Japan, and then off to China, and in the middle of all this we are struggling with the President's budget.

As the gentleman from Massachusetts says, first of all, there was a big mystery as to what this budget really was. Second of all, we had heard some very nice words from the President. They were kinder words, they were gentler words, but behind the kinder words and the gentler words unfortunately lies a meaner and a harsher budget.

I was so elated when I heard the President making his first speeches, his inaugural speech, for example, and his speech to the joint session. He talked about children, he talked about the problems of drugs, and he talked about the horrors of the homeless people. Yet when we cut through this budget, what we find is an incredible fact. The man who says he wants to be the Education President, George Bush, has in his own budget stated through his own Education Secretary that what we have is actually a cut from last year when we figure in inflation. His education budget is 1½ percent up from last year's budget, but when we add in the 4½-percent inflation, it actually cuts education.

How is this investing in children? How is this kinder and gentler?

We also hear today that Mr. Darman, the OMB Director, states that we should use the Reagan cuts, that the Reagan cuts will now become the Bush cuts. Well, when we take a look at the list of those cuts, I say to my friend, the gentleman from Massachusetts—and I am sure he knows this well—the cuts are unbelievable. The cuts would include the Job Corps, the Low Income Home Energy Assistance Act, VA education benefits and medical care. The Legal Services Corporation would be wiped out. It would also include child welfare services, community services block grants, State student incentive grants, and the Job Corps. It is amazing.

I remember during the campaign that President Bush said—and perhaps the gentleman from Massachusetts remembers this—that the reason he was picking Senator QUAYLE to be Vice President was because of the very successful Job Training Partnership Act Program that the Senator had put together along with Senator KENNEDY.

Well, when we have Mr. Darman in front of the Budget Committee, I say to my friend, what we find out is that they do not even have a suggestion as to what that particular program ought to be budgeted at. They say, "Congress, you decide, because it is not really a priority for us," and they threw it in that pile of programs which they really do not think are that important and which we have even entitled "the blank box."

So here is a key program that supposedly led to the selection of DAN QUAYLE, and President Bush does not even have a number for it.

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, if the gentlewoman would permit me ask this, I gather we have gotten something new from Mr. Darman in today's budget hearing?

Mrs. BOXER. Yes.

Mr. FRANK. Previously with Mr. Darman so adamantly refusing to tell us where he thought the cuts should be, I thought that "OMB" now stood for "off my back," because that was where he was trying to get the burden of decisionmaking.

David Stockman was not everybody's favorite person around here, but David Stockman never tried to duck the responsibility. He said, "Cut here, but don't cut there."

But I gather that Mr. Darman now is prepared to tell us that after all this they are going to give us the Reagan budget, is that correct?

Mr. Speaker, I yield further to the gentlewoman from California.

Mrs. BOXER. Mr. Speaker, the press reports indicate, I would tell my friend, that that is correct, that they are going to use the Reagan cuts. For example, in the education program, what we now know is that the "Education President," Mr. Bush, has stated he wants to put forward $400 million of new programs. Well, we applaud that. We are very happy to see that investment.

On the other hand, when we ask what the cuts are, we find he is going to cut $500 million. So we see new initiatives of $400 million, and he is cutting programs that really work—and I mentioned some of them before—to the tune of $500 million. When we get all through with it and we add a few things here and there, we essentially have no new programs in the Education Department that are going to make a whit of a difference.

So Mr. Darman has today told the press that we would use the Reagan cuts, and that is where we stand. I would like to say to the gentleman—and I am very pleased that he brought this up because I did send around this letter to our colleagues—that he is right, because when we look at the Gramm-Rudman cuts which were supposed to be so devastating, we find that the Bush budget is worse.

Mr. FRANK. In the nondefense area, of course?

Mrs. BOXER. That is correct. And I want to make this further point: When we look at the military spending that the Bush administration is putting forward, there is a $9 billion increase.

Mr. FRANK. And that is described to us as a freeze. A freeze to the military is a $9 billion increase, whereas an increase for education is a $100 million cut?

Mrs. BOXER. The gentleman understands it. This is a new kind of mathematics which is amazing to me. And as the gentleman points out, we continue to hear these beautiful words about being kinder and gentler and caring, and you look behind it, and what do we see? We find the same old guns-versus-butter type of budget cuts.

I want to point out to the gentleman that $9 billion to the military in increases in budget authority, compared to cuts in Medicare, cuts in many of these programs that I mentioned before on the domestic side of the budget, means that when we get through with it, what we find, I say to my friend, is that the cuts are at the ratio of 40 to 1, domestic spending taking 40 times more than defense spending in the Bush budget to get down to that Gramm-Rudman cut.

So it seems to me, I say to my friend, the gentleman from Massachusetts, that he has done a great service today, because I do not think the people understand this. This Bush budget is the best kept secret we have around here, and I think it is time people started to make them account for their own budget numbers.

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentlewoman from California [Mrs. BOXER] is exactly correct, and I appreciate what she and others have done to educate me and our colleagues on this, but of course the President is very skillful at presenting himself. He is under no obligation to give the bad news. He did not take an oath to tell us in his speech the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth. He told us the truth and nothing but the truth.

However, Mr. Speaker, there were some truths that were extracted from that particular speech. As my colleagues know we have got the good news in the speech, and the bad news is in the budget.

However I do not fault them for failing to live up to their responsibilities in the democratic process for sending us that un-budget, for sending us a budget which mandates cuts in programs involved in the environment, and education and transportation and not saying where they want to do it.

As the gentlewoman from California [Mrs. BOXER] has pointed out, they have presented us with a situation in which, if we were forced to choose between their budget and sequestration, sequestration would be better. We are not, and, as I know, the gentlewoman agrees with me because she has been a leader in trying to make America stronger militarily by making our Pentagon more efficient, and I should say that, if it were not for the resistance which a number of people, one of whom is now the Vice President of the United States, had led to efforts that she was involved in a few years ago, we would have had a much more efficient Pentagon because we had a rejection of these efficiency reforms that she had.

However, Mr. Speaker, what is clear to us now is, if we look at the underspending that goes on in Asia and Europe militarily, if we look at the vast changes going on in the Soviet Union, we are spending under George Bush's budget billions and billions more than is rationally necessary for the military, and that is not just a waste. It is coming at the price of adequate spending in education, and we are continuing to goldplate the Pentagon while we impose great deprivation in other areas.

Mrs. BOXER. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FRANK] will yield on that point, I think the gentleman is exactly right.

As my colleagues know, this is an issue where I feel all of America is with us. When we talk to people about the various ways we can spend this Federal dollar, to a person, essentially they say, "Hold military spending. Don't give it any more dollars."

Mr. Speaker, I would like to pose something to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FRANK]. If the gentleman were in business and he knew that one of his subsidiaries of his corporation was full of waste, fraud and abuse; as a matter of fact, there were scandals surrounding that particular subsidiary, would the gentleman give that subsidiary full cover, full inflation, while starving the parts of his business that were really doing well?

Mr. FRANK. No, I certainly would not, and I would not hire to run that subsidiary someone who had gotten wealthy helping it stay the way it was over the last few years.

It is extraordinary because on the one hand, as the gentlewoman from California [Mrs. BOXER] clearly says, they acknowledge that there have been inefficiencies and there have been abuses, and at the same time they want to spend it not only—it is one of the few programs to get the full inflation increase this year.

The President says in the years to come, "Let Gorbachev be making cuts, and let the West Germans continue to spend 2 percent, or whatever, compared to our 6 percent of the GNP. We're going to go even above the inflation rate."

Mr. Speaker, that is on a basis which is already wildly inflated. It is a full inflation percentage increase on the most favored part of the Federal budget by far.

Mrs. BOXER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FRANK] is correct, and I would like to say to the gentleman that we have to look at what has gone on before. We cannot put blinders on.

We have seen a 100-percent increase in this budget. When Jimmy Carter left office, it was 150 billion, and he had started a buildup that he had felt was necessary, and perhaps it was necessary to begin to look at some of the problems we were having at that time.

However suddenly, when President Reagan came in, we did not see steady growth that could be understood. We saw these wild periods of growth in which we had a 100-percent increase in nominal terms of the dollars going to the military.

Now I do not care how good the people were who are expending those dollars. When we put that kind of money into a program, it just simply is going to go awry.

Mr. Speaker, where I feel we are making a mistake now is we have got a golden opportunity; I say to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FRANK], to begin to say to the Pentagon, "Now is the time to reform."

Now we have had a gentleman by the name of Dick Godwin who was brought in as the first procurement czar. Now this is no liberal, this is no Democrat. This is a conservative Republican gentleman who happens to come from California who told the Committee on Armed Services that without cutting one weapons system we could save $16 billion each and every year out of the military budget.

So what does President Bush do? He just throws another $9 billion instead of using this as a golden moment.

Mr. Speaker, the other point I would like to make is a point that the gentlewoman from Colorado [Mrs. SCHROEDER] has been making, as well as other Members of Congress, which involved burden sharing. Now I am not one of these people who think we can abandon our allies or anything else, but I can say from a $100 billion budget that goes to the NATO countries that it seems to me that we can look at the Pentagon right in the eye and say, "Let's collect about ten billion of that hundred billion, and why don't we try that for a number?"

Mr. FRANK. Absolutely.

The gentlewoman from California [Mrs. BOXER] is the mother of two wonderful children, who I have had the pleasure of meeting, and I want to pick up on her metaphor of nonabandonment. As a mother I know the gentlewoman has been very concerned. She and her husband have provided well for those children. At some point; let us say in 15 years when her children are in their thirties and both, being very bright, are earning large amounts of money. I do not think anyone would consider it abandonment if she stops fully supporting them.

Mr. Speaker, World War II has been over since 1945, and it is hardly abandonment for us to say to the NATO allies, and to Japan and others in Asia, "Look, what was appropriate for us in the immediate postwar aftermath when you were really infants in terms of economic capacity because of devastation in the war, and so it was legitimate for you to rely on us so heavily, but this is now a mutual enterprise," and we would not be abandoning our allies by insisting on some mutuality in bearing the burden any more than the gentlewoman from California [Mrs. BOXER] would be legally liable for abandoning her two very bright and self-sufficient offspring who are 35 years old and doing very well.

Mrs. BOXER. Mr. Speaker, I am going to make sure that my children read the statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FRANK] because I think the gentleman is on target here.

The point is abandonment is a good word because I think frankly in this country we have been adandoning our children for the last 8 years. We are losing them to drugs, we are losing them to teenage pregnancies, we are losing them to dropout rates, and the fact of the matter is that we have got an opportunity here, a golden moment in history, when burden sharing should really translate into saved dollars. We have military procurement reform, and I will quote the President.

The President said, "I want to wring the last dollar of waste out of this budget," and that should translate to dollars, and, if we can do that, I submit to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FRANK] that we can have a budget that truly invests in our people and one in which we have a strong defense that we can rely on and that is what I hope we will be working on in the future.

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentlewoman from California [Mrs. BOXER], and, Mr. Speaker, I am going to conclude at this point. I am struck again; the gentlewoman has the talent for picking out things that people say that illuminate when she quotes the President as saying that he was going to wring out the last dollar of waste. If we then look at what he proposes for the Pentagon, he apparently believes there is not a dollar of waste there because, not only is he going to save any money at the Pentagon, he is going to continue to favor them above any other government department in funds.

Mr. Speaker, we will be continuing this discussion of the Bush budget. Maybe we will get the President to tell us what he really things about some of these areas. In any case, we believe that there are a majority of us here who are not prepared to cut medical care, and cut environment and cut education, and, when the budget deliberations come forward, even the President can duck; his coparties over here cannot, and those issues will be put forward.

Mr. Speaker, at this point I yield back the balance of my time.

The documents referred to follow:

A MEANER, HARSHER AMERICA?—THE BUDGET SPEECH VERSUS THE BUDGET PLAN

Despite President Bush's rhetoric about a kinder, gentler America, it appears that, for the majority of domestic programs, his budget would require harsher cuts than either the final Reagan budget or automatic sequestration under the Gramm-Rudman law.

On February 9, in his budget speech to Congress, President Bush stressed his commitment to education, environmental protection, and programs to aid competitiveness. He also insisted that, for most government programs, his budget requires at most a freeze on overall spending.

However, as the analysis in this report demonstrates, for the majority of domestic discretionary programs the Bush "freeze" would actually require overall fiscal year 1990 appropriations to be cut well below the fiscal year 1989 level. And while the President's speech highlighted the small handful of education and environmental programs that he proposes to expand, his budget places most programs in these areas in the category to be cut, rather than expanded.

For domestic programs, the Bush budget would be more austere than Gramm-Rudman sequestration. While sequestration would require overall domestic outlays to be reduced by about $12 billion below baseline levels (based on Administration assumptions), the Bush budget appears to require an outlay reduction of $20-22 billion.

The Bush budget is also more austere than the fiscal year 1990 budget proposed by President Reagan. Although President Bush is seeking smaller savings in entitlements than sought by President Reagan, overall cuts in domestic discretionary programs would be almost twice as large under the Bush budget as under the Reagan budget.

This report illustrates the impact of the Bush plan on various specific domestic programs. For a more general analysis of the Bush budget, see DSG Special Report No. 101-3, "The Bush Black Box Budget," February 15, 1989.

The Bush budget proposal lumps most domestic discretionary programs [1] into a general category that budget analysts have begun calling the "black box". This category includes, for example, most aid to education, most environmental programs, job training, social services, highways, mass transit, veterans' medical care, and many agriculture programs. For this "black box" category, President Bush proposes that overall outlays in FY 1990 be no higher than overall outlays in FY 1989, with the details of spending for individual programs to be determined later.

Although President Bush characterizes his domestic proposal as a "freeze", its effects would be quite different from the budget freezes that have been used by Congress in the past several years to help meet deficit targets. What Congress has meant by a freeze is freezing appropriations (budget authority) at the previous year's level. Such a freeze produces savings by holding appropriations below the amount needed to keep up with inflation.

President Bush, however, wants his freeze to apply to outlays, rather than to appropriations (budget authority). Attempting to freeze outlays creates severe complications, and can require very substantial cuts in appropriations. The problem is that outlays in any given year often depend more on prior-year appropriations and on various other hard-to-control factors than they do on new appropriations.

Thus, for many programs, achieving an outlay freeze would require cutting FY 1990 appropriations not only below the amounts needed to keep up with inflation, but also substantially below the FY 1989 level. (See the Appendix on page 15 for a more detailed description of why an outlay freeze can require substantial budget cuts.) The net effect of attempting such an overall freeze on outlays would be substantially greater reductions in appropriations for domestic discretionary programs than would be required either by sequestration or by the FY 1990 Reagan budget.

IMPACT OF BUSH FREEZE ON DISCRETIONARY PROGRAMS

On the following pages are some examples of the severe impact that an outlay freeze of the type proposed by President Bush could have on key domestic programs. Additional examples are provided in the table beginning on page 6 and in the accompanying graphs.

[1] Discretionary programs are those where spending levels are determined through the annual appropriations process. The other basic budget category is entitlements, which are programs where spending levels are effectively determined through the eligibility rules and benefits formulas set by the substantive law governing the program. The majority of domestic programs fall into the discretionary category (although overall spending for entitlements is larger.)

For illustrative purposes, these examples assume that the outlay freeze is applied on a program-by-program basis. While it is possible that, within the overall confines of the Bush proposal, some individual programs could receive outlay increases above a freeze level, the result would be to require cutting other programs by even more than the following examples indicate.

Compensatory Education—Compared to the level estimated by CBO as necessary to maintain current services, appropriations for the compensatory education program for disadvantaged children would be cut 46% under the Bush outlay freeze—compared to 8% under sequestration and 1% under the Reagan budget. (This 46% cut is necessary because most FY 1990 outlays in this program have already been set by prior-year commitments and new commitments must be dramatically scaled back to keep outlays level.)

Vocational & Adult Education—Appropriations for vocational and adult education would be cut by 44% below the CBO current services level under an outlay freeze. In contrast, the Reagan budget would have provided this program a full inflation adjustment, and the program would be cut 8% under sequestration.

Student Financial Assistance—Under the Bush outlay freeze, appropriations for financial assistance for needy students would be cut by 15% below the CBO current services level. Sequestration would require an 8% cut. The Reagan budget called for only a 3% cut.

Superfund—An outlay freeze would require an 83% cut in Superfund appropriations (which fund the cleanup of hazardous waste sites) below the CBO current services level for two related reasons: 1) under current policy, outlays would rise substantially between FY 1989 and FY 1990 due to large increases in appropriations in recent years; and 2) most of the FY 1990 outlays have already been set by prior-year commitments, requiring drastic cuts in new appropriations to keep outlays level. By contrast, the Reagan budget had targeted Superfund for a 17% increase in appropriations above a current services level.

EPA Pollution Abatement and Compliance—Under the Bush outlay freeze, appropriations for the pollution abatement, control, and compliance activities of the EPA would be cut 18% below the CBO current services level. In comparison, the program would be reduced by 8% under sequestration and by 6% under the Reagan budget.

National Parks—Compared to the level required to maintain current services, freezing outlays for National Parks operations would require cutting appropriations by 7%. The Reagan budget had only proposed a 3% cut in these appropriations.

Job Training—Appropriations for job training services, important in improving the labor force's productivity, would suffer a 34% cutback below the CBO current services baseline under the Bush outlay freeze (again, because more FY 1990 outlays in this program have already been set by prior-year commitments.) Under sequestration, this program would be cut by 8%, and under the Reagan budget, by only 1%.

Aid to Highways—Under the Bush outlay freeze, appropriations for federal aid to highways would be cut by 7% below the current services level. In contrast, the Reagan budget would have provided this program a full adjustment for inflation.

Energy Supply R&D—Compared to the current services baseline, appropriations for energy supply research and development, critical to the country's future economic competitiveness, would be cut by 9% under the Bush outlay freeze, 8% under sequestration, and 3% under the Reagan budget.

WIC—The Bush outlay freeze would require a cutback of 5% below the current services baseline in appropriations for the Special Supplemental Food Program for Women, Infants, and Children (WIC). By contrast, the Gramm-Rudman law protects this program from sequestration, allowing it a full inflation adjustment.

Maternal and Child Health Block Grant—Compared to the current services baseline, appropriations for the Maternal and Child Health Block Grant would be cut by 7% under the Bush outlay freeze, 8% under sequestration, and 4% under the Reagan budget.

Veterans' Medical Care—The Bush outlay freeze requires cutting appropriations for veterans' medical care by 9% below the current services baseline. In comparison, the Gramm-Rudman law limits the application of sequestration to veterans' medical care—with the result that sequestration would only result in a 3% cut in this program.

BUSH'S PROPOSALS FOR ENTITLEMENT PROGRAMS

The Bush budget plan adopts many of President Reagan's proposals for cuts in entitlement programs, including the following:

$5 billion in FY 1990 outlay savings in Medicare, through changes in formulas for paying hospitals, doctors, and other providers of services and through increasing premiums paid by beneficiaries so that they continue to cover 25% of costs.

$4.7 billion in FY 1990 outlay savings in various programs affecting federal employees and retirees, through reducing the government contribution to employee health benefit programs, cancelling the FY 1990 cost-of-living adjustment in civilian and military pensions, and eliminating the option for retirees to take their pension benefits in a lump sum.

$1.9 billion in FY 1990 outlay savings in farm price and income support programs.

The Bush plan does not adopt certain other entitlement cuts proposed by President Reagan, including cuts in Medicaid and child nutrition programs. It makes up for this, however, by requiring even larger cuts in non-entitlement programs than those recommended by President Reagan.

For entitlement programs, the Bush budget would be considerably harsher than automatic sequestration under Gramm-Rudman. Overall, sequestration in FY 1990 would impose cuts of roughly $4 billion in outlays for entitlements (based on Administration assumptions), while the Bush plan calls for cuts of about $13 billion in entitlement outlays. For Medicare, for example, sequestration would require a cut of about $1.5 billion in FY 1990 outlays, while the Bush budget proposes a cut of $5 billion.

THE BUSH DEFENSE BUDGET: CONTRIBUTES LITTLE TO DEFICIT REDUCTION AND POSTPONES TOUGH CHOICES

The zero real growth defense budget proposed by President Bush for FY 1990 would make no significant contribution to federal deficit reduction. In addition, the Bush budget projects defense growth above inflation beginning in FY 1991, which would add to future deficits. The unrealistic expectation of future defense growth permits the military services to begin production of a series of new military hardware programs. This message, "freeze now, get well later," is a dangerous illusion for defense planners. Lower defense budgets, which are likely in the future, will severely constrain future defense choices.

THE BURDEN OF DEFICIT REDUCTION

Under the Bush budget, defense would make only a small contribution to deficit reduction: $0.6 billion of the $27 billion in cuts needed to meet the FY 1990 Gramm-Rudman-Hollings target. While defense accounts for more than 25 percent of federal spending, it would contribute less than 3 percent to the required reductions. Defense might actually contribute nothing to deficit reduction, since Congressional Budget Office estimates of defense outlays are approximately $3 billion higher than the Administration's estimates. The small defense contribution leaves the bulk of reductions to be made by non-defense programs since the Administration has ruled out significant revenue increases.

Under the Bush proposal, defense budgets would make future deficit reduction efforts more difficult. Budget projections are for 1 percent growth budget authority in FY 1991 and 1992 and 2 percent growth in 1993.

PROJECTED FUTURE BUDGET GROWTH ENCOURAGES EXPENSIVE NEW WEAPONS PROGRAMS

While there are no programmatic details of Bush's defense budget proposal, the real growth projected for FY 1991-1993 in the Bush budget constitutes an illusory "freeze now, get well later" budgetary strategy with dangerous implications for defense planning. If defense planners anticipate future growth in the defense budget, they will avoid making the tough choices that are necessary this year.

The illusion of future growth permits defense planners to begin or continue new military hardware programs at low or inefficient rates of production in the expectation of receiving adequate production funding in the future. Once these "new starts" are underway, they are difficult to cancel. The fiscal demands for such programs, however, will put serious pressures on funding for military readiness, sustainability and force structure.

A "FLEXIBLE FREEZE"

The FY 1990 Bush budget proposal, called a "flexible freeze," uses the term "freeze" in different ways for different programs. For the defense budget, the freeze uses the FY 1989 appropriation level as a base, adding inflationary growth. But for a number of non-defense discretionary programs, the freeze uses FY 1989 levels outlays as a base and provides no increase for inflation. According to Center on Budget and Policy Priorities analysis, The Bush Budget: Progress Toward a Kinder, Gentler America?, holding these outlays constant could require substantial in budget authority below FY 1989 levels. There are also potential budgetary reductions in the entitlement programs. The net result of the Bush budget would permit defense spending to grow while most of the non-defense discretionary spending would be cut below current levels.

PROPOSED BUSH "SPENDING FREEZE" WOULD CUT NON-ENTITLEMENT PROGRAM APPROPRIATIONS BELOW A FREEZE LEVEL AND CUT ENTITLEMENTS $2.3 BILLION MORE THAN REAGAN'S BUDGET

The impact of the domestic spending "freeze" contained in the Bush Administration budget unveiled last week is substantially deeper than initial reports indicated.

The Bush budget proposes to lump most of the domestic programs that are not entitlements, along with a number of entitlement accounts, into one large program category. Total spending (or outlays) for this category would be held to $136 billion in FY 1990, the same level as in FY 1989 without any adjustment for inflation.

The Administration has said that freezing spending for these programs at the $136 billion level would require cutting spending for these programs by $9.6 billion below the levels needed to maintain their current services levels after taking inflation into account.

New information concerning the freeze includes the following:

While outlays for the programs in this category would be frozen at FY 1989 levels, this would require cutting total appropriations for the non-entitlement programs in the category below the FY 1989 level. OMB director Richard Darman has suggested two possible ways of looking at the freeze as it applies to non-entitlement programs: assuming that FY 1990 outlays for each program are frozen at the FY 1989 level or assuming that the Reagan budget proposals are used for these programs. If outlays are frozen for each domestic discretionary program subject to the freeze, total appropriations for these programs would have to be cut $1.9 billion below the FY 1989 level (i.e., below an "appropriations freeze" level), according to information from OMB.

If the Reagan budget proposals for these programs were adopted (an approach that produces an outlay freeze for the domestic discretionary programs subject to the freeze, although not for the entitlement programs covered by the freeze), total appropriations for these programs would have to be cut $4.6 billion below the FY 1989 appropriations level.

To freeze overall outlays for the entitlements in the freeze category would require cutting the outlays for these programs by $2.3 billion more than under the Reagan budget. This represents an 18.4 percent reduction for these programs from the Reagan budget. This $2.3 billion in additional savings does not include the effect of freezing cost-of-living adjustments in federal retirement programs or of freezing the federal share of state administrative costs in AFDC or food stamps, since those proposals were also included in the Reagan budget.

Part of the $2.3 billion (in entitlement savings below the Reagan budget) apparently comes from assuming virtually no funding at all for the employment and training programs for welfare recipients that were established by the welfare reform legislation enacted in October 1988. Since states are not yet operating under the authority of this new law (federal regulations to implement it have not yet been issued), very little if any expenditures will be incurred under the law in FY 1989. If FY 1990 spending for these programs is frozen at the FY 1989 level, hardly any money will be available to implement these programs next year.

The welfare reform law mandated that up to $800 million be made available to states for these programs in FY 1990. There are state matching requirements in the law, and the Reagan budget assumed $350 million would actually be used in FY 1990. Most or all of this $350 million disappears under the assumptions of the Bush freeze. (The Reagan budget documents project zero outlays for this account in FY 1989.) Of course, it could be provided as a result of negotiations with Congress, but then other programs would have to be cut below a spending freeze level.

The largest chunk of the $2.3 billion comes from assuming that outlays will be frozen for the Postal Service Fund. Under normal U.S. Postal Service operations, outlays from this fund are projected to rise about $2 billion in FY 1990. Freezing the outlays from this fund would likely require the Postal Service to raise the price of stamps to make up the lost revenue.

Among the program accounts that would be subject to a freeze is the account that funds the costs of running the Social Security program through Social Security district offices. As a result, total funding for Social Security is $100 million lower in the Bush budget than it was in the Reagan budget.

The Center's latest analysis also finds that the widely reported statement—that the budget uses the term "freeze"to include inflation when it is talking about defense but excludes inflation when the term "freeze" is applied to the domestic side of the budget—explains only part of the budget gimmickry being used. In the defense area, the analysis notes, the term "freeze" means an appropriation level equal to the FY 1989 level plus inflation. In the domestic area, the term "freeze" means an outlay (or spending) level equal to the FY 1989 level without any adjustment for inflation, which (as noted) requires cutting domestic program appropriations below the FY 1989 level.

The analysis also examines a number of other aspects of the Bush Administration budget.

SENATE—Wednesday, March 1, 1989

(Legislative day of Tuesday, January 3, 1989)

The Senate met at 11:30 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the President pro tempore [Mr. BYRD].

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray:

Righteousness exalteth a nation: but sin is a reproach to any people.—Proverbs 14:34.

Omnipotent God, perfect in truth and justice, to whom all are ultimately accountable, let truth and justice prevail in this place, today and in the days to come. In the name of the incarnate truth, Lord of righteousness. Amen.

RECOGNITION OF THE MAJORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the order, the majority leader is recognized.

THE JOURNAL

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Journal of the proceedings be approved to date.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SCHEDULE

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, today at 12 noon the Senate will turn to the consideration of the nomination of Dr. Louis Sullivan to be Secretary of Health and Human Services. The Senate will conduct a 15-minute rollcall vote on that nomination beginning at 1 p.m.

Upon disposition of the Sullivan nomination, it had been my intention to proceed to the Tower nomination. I have just been advised that the nomination of Admiral Watkins to be Secretary of Energy is now out of committee and available for Senate consideration, if unanimous consent can be obtained, and that it appears likely that we will be able to achieve that consent with a 20-minute consideration of the Watkins nomination, followed by a 15-minute rollcall vote.

Therefore, it is my intention, following the consideration of the Sullivan nomination, to seek unanimous consent to proceed to the Watkins nomination for 20 minutes of debate, equally divided, to be followed by a 15-minute rollcall vote.

Mr. President, once the Senate has completed its business today, it is my intention to recess the Senate over until 9:15 a.m. on Thursday, March 2.

On Thursday, a joint meeting of Congress will be held at 10 a.m. in the House Chamber to commemorate the 200th anniversary of the first meeting of Congress. At 9:45 a.m., the Senate will proceed as a body to the House Chamber for the joint meeting.

Mr. President, I inquire of the distinguished Republican leader whether he has any objection to the schedule as I have indicated and, particularly, to proceeding to consideration of the Tower nomination, which, as he knows, I announced last week following consultation with him, and have since repeatedly stated was my intention.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, as I understand, we will do the Sullivan nomination and then the Watkins nomination, and then it would be the majority leader's hope to proceed to the Tower nomination. I can indicate to the majority leader that I will be meeting with some of my colleagues, hopefully, between 1 and 2 o'clock, and I would be in a position to indicate to him at that time whether we can proceed to the Tower nomination today or tomorrow.

I think we probably can waive part of the 48-hour rule, and we may be able to waive it all, but I will be in a position to indicate that to the majority leader, I hope, by 2 or 2:30.

Mr. MITCHELL. Under the schedule outlined, we should complete action on Watkins close to 2, so it is probably best and appropriate that we defer consideration until about 2, and at that time, I hope to hear from the distinguished leader.

Mr. DOLE. I might also ask the majority leader something we may want to discuss later on, that if we proceed to the Tower nomination, either today or tomorrow, will we be in session on Friday, and could there be votes on Friday and then Monday? That is something we can discuss later.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is fine. I will look forward to that.

NOMINATION OF JOHN G. TOWER TO BE SECRETARY OF DEFENSE

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, when the Senate votes on the nomination of John Tower to be Secretary of Defense, I will cast my vote against confirmation of the nomination.

The threshold question each of us must answer is, What standard do we apply to nominations? The Constitution specifies none. No law prescribes one. In the end, each of us is left to his or her own conscience and interpretation of history.

In researching this question in connection with a prior nomination, I came across the following statement by the author G. Calvin MacKenzie in his book entitled "The Politics of Presidential Appointments." I offer it for consideration by all Senators:

> The most elementary of the purposes for which the confirmation process is used is that of examining and passing judgment on the character and competence of the President's nominees. Evaluating nominees is not, however, a simple matter. For one thing, most of the individuals nominated by the President are intelligent and accomplished members of the political, economic, or academic communities. In recent times, at least, most nominees would satisfy even the most stringent minimum qualifications for public service. And yet the question that must be asked by the Senate is not whether these are "good" men or "good" women, but whether a particular individual possesses the necessary and appropriate qualifications to serve in a particular position. The question of "fitness" thus has both a general and a specific component. Nominees are expected to be persons of high integrity and proven ability, but they are also expected to have acquired the appropriate training, insight, and sensitivity for service in a specific government office.
> The task of nominee evaluation is further complicated by the fact that there is not now, nor has there ever been, any universally accepted qualifying standard for public service, any consistent set of criteria for judging fitness. There are a few specific criteria that apply to particular positions, some statutory and some traditional. But the President is as aware of these as the members of the Senate and rarely fails to nominate someone who satisfies these well-recognized standards. The difficulty occurs in those hazy areas where the standards are not set in the concrete of tradition or law. When judgment must be passed on an individual's past performance, his personal and financial integrity, the level of his competence, and his political acumen, then Senators have to make decisions for which there are few exact precedents and even fewer useful guidelines.
> There is, therefore, much inconsistency in the manner in which Senate committees evaluate the personal qualifications of the nominees who come before them. The level of concern with a particular nomination and the criteria by which it is judged are very often affected by the mood of the moment. A criterion stringently applied one year may be all but forgotten the next. For those who like consistency and tidiness in governmental processes, there is nothing quite so dismaying as this ad hoc quality of confirmation decisions. In spite of this persistent inconsistency, however, the task of evaluating nominees is marked by several recurring themes. Most of the expressed concerns about the personal qualifications of nominees fall into three broad areas: conflict of interest, character and intergrity, and professional competence or experience.

That is the end of the quotation from Professor MacKenzie's book.

Senator Tower has had a long career in public service, as a Senator from Texas, as head of the Commission which undertook the first outside review of the Iran-Contra affair, and as one of our chief arms negotiators in Geneva. Senator Tower has an extensive knowledge of defense programs and of the operations of our Nation's military forces. He possesses the experience and many of the skills we seek in a Secretary of Defense. But credentials as a defense expert are not the sole basis on which to assess the nominee.

I have reviewed the record on this nomination carefully. I have examined the Armed Services Committee's records and reports. I have read the extensive FBI background report in its entirety. After this study, I am persuaded that John Tower should not be confirmed as Secretary of Defense.

This is not a decision I make easily or lightly. I believe that the President has broad authority to select the Cabinet members of his choice. Acting on this principle, I have supported all previous Cabinet nominations of President Bush.

Under the Constitution the President has the prerogative to nominate Cabinet members. That does not mean, however, that the Senate's role in the confirmation process is automatically to approve each Presidential nominee. The Senate must evaluate the nominee's behavior and standards as well as his ability to discharge properly the duties of the office. Only after this careful assessment can each Senator make a final evaluation on whether the nominee should serve in one of the most responsible positions of our Government.

The Committee on Armed Services has conducted an exhaustive review of this nominee's background and record. Chairman SAM NUNN and the other members of the committee studied the evidence in great detail. The committee and Chairman NUNN insisted that facts be the basis for the committee's report and actions with respect to this nomination. The results of the committee's efforts are available for all Senators to examine, and I urge them to do so. I commend Senator NUNN and Senator WARNER and other members of the committee for the responsible job they have done.

I especially commend Senator NUNN. He has handled a difficult and delicate matter with restraint and fairness. It is SAM NUNN's unique qualities of intelligence, thoroughness, and thoughtfulness that have, with good reason, made him one of the most respected Members—if not the most respected Member—of the Senate.

Now the Senate as a whole must decide this nomination.

It has been said that those who oppose the Tower nomination are unfairly imposing standards which have not been applied to Members of the Senate. But it is not moral perfection or the qualifications of Senators that are at issue here. It is the ability to serve effectively in a position of unique power and responsibility. It is, therefore, unfair to require that of someone who would be Secretary of Defense—directly in the chain of command of the most powerful military force in human history.

The Secretary of Defense will be required in the next 4 years to lead the Department through difficult changes. Public confidence in the integrity of the defense procurement and management system must be restored. Decisions must be made on programs which will involve billions of dollars and which could have profound effects on the Federal budget and on the balance sheets of many defense contractors.

Immediately after leaving the Government as chief negotiator on strategic arms, Senator Tower formed close consulting relationships with numerous defense contractors. He earned a great deal of money in less than 3 years advising these companies about the possible impact of Government decisions on their business. He received payment while it was widely assumed that he might be a nominee for Secretary of Defense.

Senator Tower's decision to embark on such a course can at best be described as one of indifference to the potential conflicts or appearance of conflicts which such relationships could engender. The willingness to enter into business relationships of this type raises profound questions about the nominee's ability to separate private and public interests, or to remain objective when future decisions must be made.

Defense News, a newspaper widely respected for its coverage of the Pentagon and defense issues, summarized these problems as follows:

After 24 years in the Senate, Mr. Tower also understands the link between the public's perception and and its support for defense. His decision to become a defense consultant was an explicit statement about the path he had chosen for himself.

Defense News further argued:

The principal task of the next defense secretary is to build public confidence that the Pentagon is being well managed and that defense dollars are being carefully spent. The defense secretary must be an independent voice of force, authority and reason.

There is ample reason to doubt whether Mr. Tower is the man for these times.

Other newspapers knowledgeable about the defense business have raised similar objections. Navy Times notes that the Secretary of Defense should be of "upstanding character," and concludes that Senator Tower does not measure up. The Air Force Times has termed John Tower "not credible." Army Times characterized as "appalling" the "speed and greed with which Tower spun through the revolving door."

That is a quotation.

Each of these publications which specialize in defense coverage has called for Senator Tower to step aside.

Public officials have a right to a private life. They do not have a right to engage publicly in behavior which could interfere with the discharge of their public duties. A single lapse in judgment—or perhaps even a few—should not disqualify an individual from public service. But when the lapses in judgment form a pattern of many incidents spanning many years, and when there is insufficient evidence to demonstrate that the pattern has been broken, then there are reasonable grounds to question whether the individual possesses the qualities necessary for the uniquely demanding job of Secretary of Defense. In my view, these questions have not been satisfactorily resolved in this case.

There is overwhelming evidence that Senator Tower at one time used alcohol to excess. Indeed, after initial denials, both the nominee and the White House have reversed their positions and now acknowledge this fact. That being the case, it is reasonable and prudent to require convincing evidence that the excessive use has stopped and that it will not recur. Such evidence must consist of more than a pledge or a promise. It must be reflected in the individual's behavior. Again, the record in Senator Tower's case is not persuasive.

Viewed in the light most favorable to Senator Tower, the evidence of his actions in recent years is conflicting. There is credible, direct, eye-witness testimony about his conduct from a wide variety of persons who have nothing in common and no apparent reason to make false statements. In most—but not all—instances, there are statements to the contrary.

This is a difficult decision which must be made after reviewing a conflicting record. Reasonable people may read the same record and reach different conclusions, but there is surely no basis for the claims by some of the nominee's supporters that there is nothing but rumor and innuendo in the record.

It is only after careful study of this record that I have concluded that John Tower is not the man to provide leadership by example to the military and civilian employees of the Department of Defense, especially in the difficult job of reforming the Pentagon's administration and procurement practices in a period of budget stringency.

It is with great sadness that I have come to this conclusion. I know and have worked with John Tower. I regret deeply the ordeal he and his family have endured.

I emphasize that this is a personal decision. I reached this decision only after thorough review and analysis of the record. I do not believe any Senator's decision should be based upon partisan considerations. This is a personal decision for each Senator to make, based solely upon what each believes to be in the best interests of the Nation.

Yesterday morning, I met with President Bush. I expressed to him the hope that the outcome of this nomination would not have an adverse impact on relations between the President and Congress. I recalled the President's statement in Japan, noting his continued commitment to bipartisanship. I assured him that it is my intention to continue to work together with the administration in addressing the critical problems which face our Nation, regardless of the outcome of the vote on the Tower nomination. I hope my colleagues, whatever their vote on this issue, will share the attitude which the President and I have expressed.

RECOGNITION OF THE MINORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the order, the Republican leader is recognized.

The majority leader's time under the order expired and his 5 minutes under morning business likewise expired.

The Senate is in morning business, but the Chair recognizes the Republican leader under the order.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, if I might yield 5 minutes of my leader's time to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ARMSTRONG] and then reserve the remainder of the time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. ARMSTRONG] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator yield for just a minute?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Yes.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I would like to say that I exceeded my leader's time and, in fairness, I ask unanimous consent that the distinguished Republican leader be given an equal amount of time if he chooses under leader time.

Mr. DOLE. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Republican leader will control 15 minutes. The time for morning business will expire at 12 noon but, under the order, the Senate will proceed in executive session at the expiration of the Republican leader's time.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, I am grateful to the Republican leader for yielding me time. Do I also have reserved to me 5 minutes of my own time under a previous order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Only by unanimous consent.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I thank the Chair. I do ask unanimous consent, since it is my desire to proceed for 10 minutes in all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will inquire then, is the Senator from Colorado asking for 10 minutes in addition to the 5 minutes yielded by the Republican leader?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Five and five, Mr. President, for a total of 10 minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Very well, then, the time for the Senate to go into executive session is thereby extended accordingly.

NOMINATION OF JOHN TOWER TO BE SECRETARY OF DEFENSE

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, I think we are about to go seriously off the rails on this Tower nomination. I am, I must say, distressed by what I have heard from the Democratic leader and even more distressed by what I have been reading in the press, the statements attributed not only to the Members of the Democratic Party but to some of my own colleagues.

It may be that I am the only one who holds the view I am about to express, but, by gosh, there comes a time when you have just got to say how you feel. I think we are making a big mistake.

I raise the question not only because of my concern and regard and affection for John Tower, but for a much larger question of what we are doing to the process by which the Senate considers and either confirms or rejects nominees.

Here is where I am coming from, Mr. President. First of all, I start out with the predisposition to vote for the nominee of the President of the United States, whether it is George Bush, or Ronald Reagan, or Jimmy Carter, or Gerald Ford, or whoever it is. If the President sends up a nominee to serve in his Cabinet, I start with the supposition that I am going to vote for that nominee because the President sent him up here. And I think that is probably the universal opinion of every Senator; that we start with a predisposition to support the nominee.

Therefore, if somebody has some reason why we should not support a nominee, why we should on only the ninth occasion in the history of this country turn down a Cabinet recommendation of the President, they better have a pretty good reason. And, in my view, it ought to be a specific reason. It ought not to be general. It ought not to be innuendo. It ought not to be aired in the press or on television. It ought to be reported in the Senate in a very direct, official, formal manner.

What I fear, as we begin the debate on this matter, whether it is this afternoon at 1 or tomorrow at 2 or next Tuesday, or whenever we get to it, is that instead of having that kind of thoughtful presentation of the issues, of the arguments against Senator Tower's confirmation, that in fact so many Senators have already prejudged the matter, have come down here and, on the basis of information which seems pretty sketchy to me, have made a decision that they are either for him or against him. And I regret it, Mr. President.

In fact, the purpose for my rising is to suggest that the Armed Services Committee needs to do its homework.

Now, the President has sent up the nominee. I am not here to tell you John Tower is the best nominee. He is the only nominee. Mr. Bush did not seek my advice as to whether or not to appoint him. If he had, I would have given my advice. But that is not the question before Senators.

The question before Senators is not whether or not he is the best available nominee or the best potential nominee. The question is whether or not he meets some kind of still to be defined minimum standard so that the President's choice can be approved. And if you start, as I do—and I bothered to do some reading into what Senators have said about this over the last couple hundred years, and I think this is the consensus position not only of sitting Senators but of the 1,800 or so who have preceded us in this Chamber—the President deserves to have his nominee confirmed unless there is a very, very strong reason to the contrary.

Now, Mr. President, the Democratic leader has referred in his remarks—and I think I am quoting accurately, because I made a note of it as he did so—to numerous lapses of judgment on behalf of the nominee. If that is true, we are entitled to know specifically what those are.

The Democratic leader has referred to "credible, direct eyewitness testimony," his words. And if that is true, we are entitled to know the names, dates, and places on which these eyewitness episodes occurred. I want to know who they are.

Mr. President, the thing that distresses me and which prompted me to come over here to speak today is the committee report. It is not, I guess, off the press, but I have what purports to be the final draft which has been sent for typesetting. Mr. President, it is very, very thin.

I said at the outset I have great respect for the President and great deference to him in the exercise of his prerogatives. But I will tell you something else. I have a lot of respect for the Senate Armed Services Committee. I am not one of the Senators who automatically said that he was going to support John Tower or anybody else. If the Armed Services Committee says that we ought to reject that nomination, I think Senators have a duty to consider the information, the opinions, the evidence that the committee wants to submit. And that is why, for the last couple of days, my staff and I have been phoning, on about an hourly basis, to get a copy of this Armed Services Committee report.

Mr. President, there is not anything in here. I am not telling you there may not be evidence, and my hope is that if such evidence exists it will be submitted to the Senate in open session. But thus far, based on the committee report, which is where that kind of information and specific allegations, let alone proof and evidence, should be submitted, it just is not there.

Now, the committee has raised three—I am referring now to page 10 of the typewritten draft—has raised three questions: excessive use of alcohol, provision of consulting services on what the committee deems to be an improper basis, and a number of incidents of indiscreet behavior toward women.

When you sift through the report, here is what it comes down to. It comes down to the fact that, according to the committee, there are not any instances that they refer to in which Senator Tower was impaired in the conduct of his duties as a Senator, as an arms negotiator, or in any official capacity that is mentioned in here so far as I can see where his performance of his duties was impaired through the use of alcohol. Indeed, while it is not contained in the committee report, I have reviewed within the last several days the statements of a dozen or more Senators that are to the contrary, those who have served with him and know him who tell about their experiences when he was the chairman of the Armed Services Committee about how long he could stay up at night to negotiate a conference report, even round-the-clock, day after day for 10 or 12 days. And he gets high marks from those who observed him.

Now somebody said back in the 1970's, he had a drinking problem. I do not know whether that is true. I never knew John Tower very well until I came to the Senate in 1979 and I will just stand up and be counted with all the other Senators who have said: I never saw him when I thought he was intoxicated. I cannot tell you he was not. I am just telling you I never saw it. And if somebody did and they think it is a serious enough issue to make the point, then they ought to come to the floor and tell us not just that it might have happened some time but when and where.

Let me just read a paragraph from page 14 of the committee report draft.

> The committee determined that Senator Tower's excessive use of alcohol would disqualify him from being assigned to many sensitive positions in the Department of Defense.

It goes on from there. If that is true and if there is, as the Democratic leader says, credible, direct, eyewitness testimony, then by gosh, Mr. President, Senators ought to have that information and it ought to be made available in public, not up in room S-407. I have heard a lot of rumors about what is up in room S-407. Up in the attic they have 70 or 800 pages of FBI reports and I suppose before this is over that I am probably going to have to go up and look through that stuff but I do not think Senators ought to have to do that as a way to form a judgment on a matter of public business which is being conducted here. And we are conducting public business.

Again, the Democratic leader has made the point that the record is there and it is a matter about which reasonable people may disagree. But reasonable people cannot form an opinion if it is a secret record.

Mr. President, it is not just John Tower who is being judged here. It is the Senate. It is every Senator. Every Senator will have to be judged by his colleagues and by his staff and by his friends and by his family and by his constituents by how he votes. How can we properly be judged, let alone how can John Tower be judged fairly, if it is all based on something that is a big secret?

The second issue which is addressed in the committee report is the question of Mr. Tower's attitude or behavior toward women. The committee report again deals with opinions. If there are facts to back up the opinions, I, for one, will take those facts seriously and consider them.

I am not one of those who thinks we ought to just dismiss such matters as being irrelevant. Nor, Mr. President, may I say, do I share the opinion of the committee minority which says that something that occurs outside the context of an official setting is not to be considered.

I want to distinguish my viewpoint from that of my fellow Republicans who serve on the committee. They, the committee minority, say that only a limited portion of the nominee's personal relationships with members of the opposite sex is properly subject to review and concern by the committee in judging a nominee's fitness.

I do not quite go along with that and I want to read another paragraph and explain how I would distinguish my own view. The committee minority writes:

> Beyond the issue of work and professional relationships which are clearly relevant to a nominee's fitness to serve as an official in the Department of Defense, we believe that a nominee's relationships with members of the opposite sex are properly treated as private and are not subject to committee's scrutiny.

I think everyone, even Cabinet officers or Senators, deserves a healthy presumption of privacy. But I really do not go along with that point of view. If there is information that in some private relationship a nominee has violated some pledge or has behaved in a way that is improper or sets a low standard of public morality, then I think when a nominee is being considered for a post like Secretary of Defense, or for that matter Senator, that that is fair game.

I want to say this just right. We had, not too long ago, a political figure from my State whose political career was abruptly ended because of an allegation of an improper relationship with a person of the opposite sex. I am not insensitive to that in the case of Senator Tower. If there is something in the record I am going to take that into account. But the difference between the case involving the Colorado figure that I referred to a moment ago and this case is striking.

Our former colleague, who was a candidate for President, was forced to withdraw or at least did withdraw following an episode in which all the facts were on the public record.

Mr. President, I see you are about to bang the gavel. May I beg the indulgence of my leader for 5 additional minutes?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHELBY). I would inform the Senator from Colorado that he has used 10 minutes. I would like to know if the Republican leader has yielded 5 minutes or 10 minutes?

Mr. DOLE. I yielded 5 minutes. I got unanimous consent for 5 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The leader has 10 minutes remaining.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. May I have 5 additional minutes?

Mr. DOLE. I will yield the remaining 10 minutes, 5 minutes to the Senator from Colorado and 5 minutes to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado is recognized for an additional 5 minutes.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I thank my leader.

The point I want to make is that whatever anybody else may think, I believe such issues are fair game; that they are factors for consideration. That is not to say that one lapse or two lapses, human nature being what it is, is disqualifying. But it is a fair standard on which judgments may be made.

But the distinction I want to draw is, in the case I have just cited, we are talking about a specific instance which occurred on a date which was specified at a time which was specified in front of witnesses who came forward and whose names were known and who published stories. In fact, there was a picture that was published.

In the Tower case we are talking about allegations which are hinted at but never even made. It is not that the allegations are unproven. In the committee's report they are not even really made. There is not anything specific that Senator Tower is said to have done.

I believe, and I really plead with my colleagues on the Armed Services Committee, it is your duty if you have that kind of information to bring it forward. If you do not, then, by gosh, I think it is your duty to back off.

What about the notion which appears, by the way, in both the majority and minority reports, that we ought to keep this FBI report secret? I am not saying publish the FBI report. That is just a lot of raw investigatory material. I am saying, whatever the committee took into account in reaching its extraordinary recommendation ought to be specified. Lay it out.

If there is something that he did specifically, what is it? So that we can make a judgment and so the nominee can be judged and so that the country can hold us accountable for the stewardship of our task.

That applies to drinking. It applies to behavior toward women. And it applies to the question of improper relationships with defense contractors. What is it, specifically, that is objected to?

I am prepared to look at that. If there is something there, I will make a judgment on it and stand up to be counted.

What about the notion that somehow classified information like this has to be kept secret? Is it not just like defense secrets that we keep classified? Well, of course not. We keep information about the national defense classified to protect intelligence operatives and national technical means of gathering intelligence data, as well as to keep exactly what we know from the scrutiny of other nations. Nothing like that is involved here.

This is a case of a person's character and background and behavior. He is entitled to a fair and open trial in the court of public opinion, and he cannot get it if all this stuff is up there and there is a bunch of guys going up to room S-407 and reading it. They are, I am told, denied the opportunity to even make notes and then they go out and leak it to the press.

That brings me to one more thing that is sticking in my craw and this is addressed to my Republican colleagues in the committee. There is not, in the minority report, any specific reference to why the rumors which have appeared should not be believed. Maybe it is asking too much that the committee report ought to address rumors, but in fact there are a number of things that leaked, appeared in the popular press, and have even been referred to here on the floor.

One involves some guy who held himself out to be a doctor and said he has some information relevant to the case and then it turned out he had five aliases. I want those facts in the committee report or a part of the official proceedings of this body.

Another episode, I am told, we have all heard this—I guess this has been published, too—that somebody came forward and said: We saw Senator Tower intoxicated on such and such occasion in such and such place and there were three such episodes. In each of those cases he was either out of the country, in Pakistan or Seattle or something.

Mr. President, I guess I have had my say. I did not really expect to speak of this. Maybe there is one more point I should make.

Some people have whispered in my ear that we all ought to get behind John Tower because there is a lot of hypocrisy on the committee. I do not think that is a reason to be for John Tower. We can all make our own judgments of whether or not Senators are hypocritical. I guess some of us are sometime. I, probably, might have been once or twice. Maybe every one of us have been on some occasion. That is not the issue. The rumors are not the issue. The innuendos are not the issue.

In my opinion the only proper basis for making this judgment is facts specifically and openly presented and that has not happened yet. When it does I am ready to listen, but if it does not, I think the Armed Services Committee ought to back off.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I support John Tower for Secretary of Defense because I know he is honest and able, based upon my personal experience with him in the U.S. Senate and on this floor.

Had the FBI investigation or the Armed Services Committee hearings established disqualifying evidence, I would not have hesitated to do my constitutional duty not to consent to his nomination. I, personally, strongly object to the current myth that perceptions become the facts. We in the Senate have a duty to analyze allegation and to find the facts.

The Senate is being asked to evaluate a man reasonably well known to most Senators. I have seen John Tower on this floor in all-night sessions under difficult, trying circumstances, demonstrating the capacity for serious, sober work.

While none of us can personally vouch for all his personal activities 24 hours a day over many years, I believe I know him well enough to conclude that he would not allow prior relationships with contractors to affect his honest judgment and that he would maintain himself in the sober condition to make the important decisions required of the Secretary of Defense.

For myself, John Tower did not need to make an additional pledge because a warrant of sobriety is implicit in his oath of office. I know more about John Tower to express a positive evaluation of his capacity and competency to be Secretary of Defense than I know about almost all other nominees up for confirmation.

This nomination has an especially strong Presidential Imprimatur because President Bush himself knows John Tower so well from decades of personal association. The President has a unique basis to evaluate John Tower's integrity and sobriety which should accord even greater weight to the customary presumption in favor of the President's Cabinet choices. Given the President's responsibility as Commander in Chief and his election mandate, his choice should be rejected only in the face of unambiguous evidence. This is not a lifetime court appointment, but an executive subordinate whom the President can fire at any time he decides his appointee is unfit to discharge his duties.

Were John Tower to drink in excess, given the facts of this matter it would be known wherever it happened worldwide virtually instantaneously.

John Tower has a special quality of toughness that may not have enhanced his popularity with fellow Senators. I personnally observed that when he tenaciously, if not acerbically during the course of floor debate, fought my 1982 summit resolution. His toughness or strength, though, is an admirable quality in the individual whose Department must be prepared to square off with our Nation's enemies.

An impartial observer, Mr. President, would be skeptical, if not suspect, that his former Democratic colleagues, who were so lavish in their praise of Senator Tower, now find him unacceptable when a new administration seeks to establish his authority and power. Perhaps it is a backhanded compliment to his strength that as Secretary of Defense no one but John Tower, subject only to the President, would be running that Department. At a time when the Defense budget may have to be cut, no one would give greater credibility or confidence than John Tower to any such cuts, much like President Nixon's unique stature in "Going to China."

Mr. President, today, I repeat a concern which I have expressed on other nominations urging to refrain from making judgments before all the evidence has been presented. I believe it is prejudicial and unwarranted and really inappropriate for Senators to say how they would vote if the vote were held "today" or at any particular time before all the evidence has been submitted. The nominee is entitled to have all the evidence considered before a judgment, however tentatively articulated, is expressed.

Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Republican leader for yielding this time. I yield the floor.

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT

ADM. JAMES WATKINS NOMINATION

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I am about to propound a unanimous-consent request with respect to the consideration of the nomination of Admiral Watkins, which I believe has been cleared by the distinguished Republican leader.

Mr. President, as in executive session, I ask unanimous consent that today, Wednesday, March 1, following the vote on the nomination of Louis Sullivan, the Senate proceed to the nomination of Adm. James Watkins to be Secretary of Energy, under a time agreement of 20 minutes equally divided between the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. JOHNSTON] and the Senator from Idaho [Mr. MCCLURE] or their designees.

Provided that no motions be in order and that following the yielding back of time, the Senate proceed without any intervening business to a 15-minute vote on the nomination.

Provided further, that upon the disposition of the nomination, the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table and the President be immediately notified of the confirmation of the nomination.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MITCHELL. I ask unanimous consent that it be in order to request for the yeas and nays on the Watkins nomination.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MITCHELL. I ask for the yeas and nays on the Watkins nomination.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

TRIBUTE TO OLIVER C. DAWSON

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, on Thursday, February 9, 1989, the State of South Carolina lost a champion among men with the death of Oliver C. Dawson. A man who was well known in our State, Oliver Dawson served with dedication and integrity for more than 40 years and a professor, athletic director, coach, and administrator at South Carolina State College.

Coach Dawson was born in Thomaston, GA, and attended John Carroll University in Cleveland, OH, where he excelled in sports. He was the school's No. 1 singles player in tennis, an all-star guard in basketball, a fullback on the football team, a recordbreaking track star and the State of Ohio's heavyweight boxing champion. He later earned his undergraduate degree from South Carolina State College in 1936, and went on to receive a master's degree from New York University in 1947.

While at South Carolina State College, Coach Dawson coached five sports and won championships in four of them. Under his leadership as head basketball coach, in 1943, the South Carolina State Bulldogs won their first Southern Intercollegiate Athletic Conference [SIAC] title. Four additional [SIAC] titles were added to the college's expanding trophy case by the college golf team, which was founded by Coach Dawson. As the school's head football coach in 1947, Coach Dawson led the team to an undefeated season which propelled them into the national championship for black colleges and universities.

Coach Dawson's contributions to the State of South Carolina and to South Carolina State College were not limited to the field of athletics. In fact, Coach Dawson may have left his greatest legacy to the State in the many lives he touched and influenced throughout his long career as a coach and teacher. It was not uncommon for Coach Dawson to end his busy day visiting sick students in their dormitories, or tutoring young athletes when they were having difficulties with their studies. Many of our State's finest citizens were once the benefactors of this man's untiring faith in the boundless potential of our youth.

Throughout his life, Coach Dawson was justly recognized for his contributions. In 1974, he became the first black inducted into the South Carolina Athletic Hall of Fame, and in 1983 he became a charter member of the South Carolina State College Athletic Hall of Fame. In 1984, he was further recognized as the first black inducted into the John Carroll University Athletic Hall of Fame, and in that same year, South Carolina State College's 15,000 seat football stadium was renamed in his honor.

A man of unlimited energy who was blessed with vision and a genuine love for his fellow man, Oliver Dawson will be greatly missed and long remembered by the people of South Carolina and the many graduates of South Carolina State College.

I extend my deepest sympathy to Coach Dawson's beloved wife, Mrs. Garcia Waterman Dawson, his daughter, Mrs. Maria D. James of Wayne, PA, and his sister, Mrs. Eddie Bell White of Cleveland.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that certain newspaper articles concerning Coach Dawson be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Orangeburg (SC) Times and Democrat, Feb. 11, 1989]

COACH OLIVER DAWSON—WITH HIS DEATH AT AGE 78, SOUTH CAROLINA SAYS GOODBYE TO SPORTS LEGEND

February is Black History Month, an observance dedicated to widening knowledge of and deepening understanding of the roles African-Americans have played in American history. It is the life story of people such as Oliver C. Dawson, a South Carolina coaching legend, that should be brought to the fore during the observance, for Dawson inspired thousands of young people.

Sadly, it is during this special month that Orangeburg and South Carolina must say goodbye to Oliver Cromwell Dawson, better known to many by his nickname "Bull" Dawson. The longtime South Carolina State College coach died Thursday at the age of 78.

Coach Dawson's is a story of hard work, individual athletic success and coaching success—the goals so many strive for in the sports world. But he was more. In fact, his work with the athletes, students and the community earned him the honor, in 1974, of being the first black man to be inducted into the South Carolina Athletic Hall of Fame.

As a young man in Ohio, Dawson was a star athlete, with noteworthy successes in football, basketball, track, boxing and tennis. His achievements at John Carroll University earned him a spot in that school's athletic hall of fame.

But it was at South Carolina State where Coach Dawson made his most lasting mark. In the words of retired S.C. State President M. Maceo Nance, "He was Mr. Athletics at South Carolina State College."

Dawson came to S.C. State in 1935. Until his retirement in 1976, he coached five major sports: football, basketball, tennis, track and golf. He won championships in four, with his 1947 football team going undefeated and winning a national title among predominantly black colleges. He was athletic director for 16 years. The college honored his achievements by naming the football stadium "Oliver C. Dawson Bulldog Stadium" in his honor in 1984, and he is a member of the S.C. State Athletic Hall of Fame.

At S.C. State, though, Dawson was more than a coach and athletic leader. He taught as a professor of health and physical education, initiating the professional program in health and physical ed in 1947 and serving as department chairman for 30 years.

Dr. Nance, who was a student in one of Dawson's history classes at S.C. State in 1942-43, says it was in his athletic and teaching duties that Coach Dawson came to be known as "Bull." It was an appropriate nickname for a man who was a strong disciplinarian. But Nance says Dawson "was not as tough as the image he projected." He cared deeply about those he coached and taught, and those he worked with. He spent a lot of time with the students and athletes, and didn't stop at retirement in 1976. Even after that, he coached the S.C. State golf team.

Dr. Nance knew Coach Dawson well. The former school president was on the S.C. Athletic Hall of Fame committee when Dawson was selected for induction, an honor Dr. Nance says was a source of particular pride for "Bull" Dawson. But really, it is South Carolina that can take pride in having had the services of Coach Dawson for much of his lifetime.

During this Black History Month and afterward, the accomplishments of men such as Oliver C. Dawson should be remembered and honored. "Bull" Dawson will be missed.

FUNERAL TO BE MONDAY FOR S.C. STATE COACHING LEGEND OLIVER DAWSON

The funeral for Oliver Cromwell "Ollie" Dawson, legendary South Carolina State College coach and athletic director, is scheduled for 2:30 p.m. Monday at St. Luke Presbyterian Church.

The Rev. David Blackshear will officiate. Entombment will be at Mausoleum of the Good Shepherd at Belleville Memorial Gardens. The casket will be placed in the church at noon.

Mr. Dawson, of Belleville Road, Orangeburg, died Thursday at The Regional Medical Center after an extended illness. He was 78.

He was born in Thomaston, Ga., and grew up in Cleveland. He had a long and unparalleled career as a professor, coach, athletic director and administrator at S.C. State.

Affectionately known as "Ollie, the Man for All Seasons," Mr. Dawson came to S.C. State in 1935 and attained legendary status at the Orangeburg institution before retiring in 1976.

During his 41-year tenure, he coached five sports, winning championships in four of them: football, basketball, tennis and golf. He also coached track and field for the Bulldogs.

Mr. Dawson served as a Bulldog assistant football coach in 1936 and was named head coach the following year. He held the position until 1950, with his teams consistently finishing in the upper division of the Southern Intercollegiate Athletic Conference (SIAC). In 1947, his squad was undefeated and played for the national championships for black colleges and universities.

He coached basketball for 11 seasons and brought the school its first SIAC crown in 1943. Mr. Dawson also coached tennis for seven seasons and track and field for four. He initiated the S.C. State golf program and served as head coach for six seasons, winning four SIAC titles.

Mr. Dawson also started the professional program in health and physical education at the college and served as department chairman for 30 years. In addition, he was Bulldog athletic director for 16 seasons, overseeing some of the most productive years in the school's athletic program.

Mr. Dawson's career was highlighted by his induction into the South Carolina Athletic Hall of Fame in 1974, becoming the first black to be so honored.

In 1983, he became a charter member of the S.C. State College Athletic Hall of Fame and, a year later, he became the first black to be inducted into the John Carroll University Athletic Hall of Fame.

In 1984, S.C. State renamed its 15,000-seat football stadium in honor of Mr. Dawson.

Mr. Dawson attended John Carroll University in Cleveland and graduated from S.C. State in 1936. He earned a master's at New York University in 1947 and did further study at Denver University and West Virginia University.

Mr. Dawson was an elder at St. Luke Presbyterian Church and a member of the Presbyterian Men's Council. He was also a member of the Alpha Phi Alpha Fraternity and numerous sports and professional organizations.

He served on several state and governmental commissions, including the Hillcrest Recreational Facility Commission from 1972 until his death. His civic involvement afforded him many meritorious citations and awards.

Survivors include his widow, Mrs. Gracia Watermann Dawson of the home; a daughter, Mrs. Maria D. James of Wayne, Pa.; and a sister, Mrs. Eddie Bell White of Cleveland; and two grandsons.

The family will receive friends from 6 to 7 p.m. Sunday at Simmons Funeral Home. Friends may call at the residence and at the funeral home.

Pallbearers will be Luther J. Battiste Jr., Dr. Oscar P. Butler, Lamar Dawkins, Robert E. Howard, Lewie C. Roache, William Johnson, Frank Staley and D.W. Walker.

Honorary pallbearers will be Alpha Phi Alpha Fraternity; elders of St. Luke Presbyterian Church, William C. Brown, Victor Kerr and Paul R. Webber.

The family suggests memorials may be made to the Capital Fund of St. Luke Presbyterian Church or to the Oliver D. Dawson Scholarship Fund for health and physical education majors at S.C. State.

HIRING DAWSON GOOD MOVE BY STATE

(By Herman Helms)

On an historic day in 1935, President Franklin Delano Roosevelt signed the Social Security Act into law. Leroy "Satchel" Paige, barnstorming with Babe Ruth, threw strikes past the famous slugger, and South Carolina's Normal Agricultural and Mechanical College employed Oliver C. Dawson—one of the smartest moves any institution of higher learning ever made.

He came from Cleveland and John Carroll University with a stunning background of accomplishments in sports: record-setter in track, No. 1 singles player in tennis, all-star guard in basketball, powerful fullback in football and heavyweight boxing champion of Ohio.

He rode into Orangeburg in a brand, spanking new automobile and assumed the duties of head coach of everything at the school, later to be renamed South Carolina State College, at a small salary.

The car was a gift from an admirer in Cleveland named Sonny DeMoribus, president of the City Council and owner of a brewery. Thrilled over seeing Dawson direct the high school basketball team to 63 straight victories, DeMoribus showed his appreciation by buying the coach the new wheels that got him to Orangeburg where he would become a legend in his own time.

ONE-MAN COACHING STAFF

Dawson found a bride early on, the daughter of an instructor in the tailor shop at the school. They were married on the campus where Gracia Maria Watermann was born. Later their home was blessed with the arrival of a baby girl, now the mother of two and wife of a law professor at the University of Kentucky. Once on campus, Dawson never left. He coached five sports and won championships in four of them. His 1947 football team was undefeated and won the national championship for predominantly black colleges and universities. He worked in State's athletic program for 41 years, retiring in 1976.

The early days were tough, but one thing he never had trouble with was coaching subordinates. There weren't any. He was the head coach, the only coach of all sports, the man for all seasons.

He would get through football practice late in the afternoon, rush home for a bite to eat and return for basketball practice at night. In a particular hurry one night, he rushed in one door and out the other, snatching a sandwich off the table. "Who was that man, Mama?" their small daughter asked. "That was your father, child," her mother responded.

She fixed meals he never touched and slept in chairs waiting for him to come home at night. She watched him walk away from the big football game of the year with his arms around the depressed young quarterback who threw the intercepted pass that loss it. She knew, without being told, where he was going on nights when he went to the dorm to look in on players who weren't feeling well. She listened silently in another room when he brought athletes to their home and scolded them for not doing their schoolwork.

HE LOVED ALL HIS ATHLETES

She shared his joy after victories and shall never forget how ecstatic he was in the spring at graduation exercises. He caused people to turn and stare at him by clapping so hard for his players with hamlike hands that used to knock out boxing opponents. He coached them and counseled them and loved every one as if they were his own.

He worked so hard and made so little money, and she sacrificed so much as a coaching widow. All of his players weren't winners after they left school, but the percentage was high. The coach felt fulfilled and so did his lady. They couldn't have been happier if he had been king and they lived in a castle.

State College has beautiful facilities today and a very successful athletic program. The man who helped make it possible died early Thursday morning at age 78.

Ollie Dawson would be quick to say he couldn't have gotten to first base without the help of his lady. Together they lived a life that is better story than any fiction writer could ever write.

GEORGE WASHINGTON HAD IT RIGHT WHEN HE ADVOCATED "FIRST IN THE U.S.A."

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, most historians, both present and past, give George Washington high marks in every possible way—and I hope they never stop. As for the dyspeptic few who have attempted to debunk our first President and other patriots, a pox upon their houses.

All my life I have admired George Washington. I believe the entire plethora of good things recorded about his life. The cherry tree? Of course he cut it down, and he told the truth about it. The tossing of the silver dollar across the river? Shame on any disbeliever who even raises a question about it.

Shortly after the inaugural parade on January 20, I found something else that I like about George Washington. Don Hughes of Burlington Industries stopped by on another matter, and he casually mentioned one of the colorful and interesting floats in the inaugural parade.

On the float was George Washington himself, or it certainly looked so. Actually it was a stand-in—Ronald Trowbridge, one of the directors of the Commission on the Bicentennial of the U.S. Constitution—but Mr. Trowbridge did a credible job in representing our first President and our all-time hero.

Mr. President, the suit worn by Mr. Trowbridge was an almost identical copy of the suit worn by George Washington on his inauguration day a couple of centuries ago. Not only that, the suit bore the label, "Made in the U.S.A."—and that was quite appropriate because George Washington can logically be designate as the first advocate of the "Made in the U.S.A." campaign now being conducted throughout the United States.

Where did I get all this information? Well, Mr. President, I'm sort of like the very young George Washington when that hacked-down cherry tree was discovered. I've got to tell the truth. Don Hughes of Burlington Industries told me.

There's a fine publication produced regularly by the public relations department of Burlington Industries. It's called the Burlington Look. It contained a brief article relating to George Bush's inauguration which told about Mr. Trowbridge, the parade float, the duplicate George Washington's inaugural suit—the whole bit.

It turns out that President Washington insisted a couple of centuries ago that his inaugural suit would be "unfashionable" if it were made of fabric not produced in this country. So he asked Gen. Henry Knox to procure "some superfine American broadcloths" for the purpose. General Knox came up with dark brown fabric made by a textile mill in Hartford, CT.

So far, so good, Mr. President. Upon inquiry of my friend, Don Hughes, I learned that the suit worn last month by Mr. Trowbridge in the Bush-Quayle inaugural parade was made of 100 percent worsted wool manufactured in Raeford, NC, at a Burlington Industries plant. Don Hughes is proud of that, and so am I.

One final point, Mr. President, and I shall conclude: The "Made in the U.S.A." float on January 20 provided a useful reminder of the importance of the textile industry throughout the history of America, from George Washington's time to George Bush's time. The first George to serve as our President had it right. When textiles are made in the U.S.A., they're first rate. President George Washington realized that, and so does President George Bush today. It's essential that the textile industry in America remain strong and productive. A lot of things are riding on it—including our national security.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the article from the Burlington Look, to which I alluded earlier, be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HE CANNOT TELL A LIE . . . GEORGE WASHINGTON'S OUTFIT WAS MADE IN THE U.S.A. BY BURLINGTON MENSWEAR

The first president of the United States not only was "first in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen." George Washington also was the first advocate of the U.S. textile and apparel industry, insisting that the suit he wore for his inauguration be tailored from American-made cloth.

To honor the 200th anniversary of Washington's inauguration, "George Washington" rode again in the inaugural parade for George Bush on January 20.

The father of our country—portrayed by Ronald Trowbridge of the Commission on the Bicentennial of the U.S. Constitution—rode atop a float sponsored by the commission and the Crafted With Pride in U.S.A. Council. The council is the leading trade group championing the sale of "Made in U.S.A." textiles, apparel and home fashions.

Trowbridge wore a replica of Washington's U.S.-made inaugural suit on the 45-foot-long float depicting the Constitution scroll. The suit was constructed of 100 percent worsted wool fabirc manufactured at Burlington Industries' Raeford, N.C. plant, and tailored by the costume department at Colonial Williamsburg.

Raeford is a unit of Burlington Menswear, the country's leading manufacturer of fine worsted wool and worsted blend fabrics for suits and uniforms. The division also operates plants in Oxford and Forest City, N.C., in Clarksville and Halifax, Va., and in Bishopville, S.C.

In his day, George Washington was of the opinion that it would be "unfashionable" for a gentleman to appear in anything that wasn't made in the U.S.A. So prior to his inauguration in 1789 at Federal Hall in New York City, he asked General Henry Knox to procure "some superfine American broadcloths." The dark brown woolen fabric was made by a Hartford, Conn. Textile mill.

A journalist of the time, commenting on the look of Washington's swearing-in suit, wrote: "The cloth is of so fine a fabric, and so handsomely finished, that it was universally mistaken for a foreign manufactured, superfine cloth."

"Washington's insistence on 'buying American' is as valid today as it was 200 years ago," said Robert Swift, executive director of the Crafted With Pride in U.S.A. Council. "It's a very fitting reminder that promoting and buying U.S.-made apparel and home fashions was as important to our founding fathers then as it is to us now."

George Washington's original inaugural suit is on permanent display at Federal Hall, where he took his oath of office.

MORE COMMUNIST PLANS FOR EL SALVADOR

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, the Communist rebels in El Salvador must be overjoyed today. Once again, violence and terrorism are yielding dividends for the Communists who, with the acquiescence of our State Department, have won a key concession from the ailing Duarte government.

To the apparent satisfaction of the State Department, President Duarte has proposed to postpone elections and begin direct talks with the Marxist FMLN terrorists. So once again, the bait has worked and in this case the victim may be the Salvadoran Constitution and democratic future of that country.

Last night the Salvadoran military unilaterally implemented a cease-fire around the country. Meanwhile the Salvadoran Marxist guerrillas continued their attacks on military targets, killing and wounding dozens of soldiers, and depriving more than half of the country of electricity.

Mr. President, according to media accounts and other reliable sources, the U.S. Department of State and the U.S. Embassy in San Salvador are once again involved in intervening in the Salvadoran election process—just as happened in 1984. The Army reportedly received pressure from the United States to enter into a suicidal unilateral cease-fire. And political parties of the opposition are being pressured to accept an unconstitutional delay of the elections.

President Duarte is proposing to delay the elections now scheduled for March 19, until April 30, 1989. It is clear that this is a violation of the 1983 Salvadoran Constitution. Article 154 of the Salvadoran Constitution clearly states: "The presidential term will last 5 years and will begin and end on the first of June." And article 79 states that the election process must begin no later than 2 months before June 1. This means that March 31 is the latest date elections could be legally held.

However, in January, the FMLN guerrillas submitted an unconstitutional and unacceptable plan to postpone free elections in El Salvador for 6 months. The guerrillas have had 5 years to participate in the electoral process, but they are coming forward now for the sole purpose of killing the electoral process, just as they have been killing and threatening hundreds of duly elected mayors, and other officials and political leaders. In other words, the guerrillas talk about peace, but continue to wage war.

In exchange for the delay, the FMLN promised a 5-day cease-fire and an agreement to stop murdering those mayors who fail to disassociate themselves from the government. This is merely a plan to salvage the ailing leftist parties, such as the Christian Democrats who have been outclassed by the center-right Arena party in the polls.

Imagine, Mr. President, how happy some candidates from both parties here in the United States would have been if some foreign country had insisted that last November's elections be postponed by a few months.

This assault on orderly constitutional procedure in El Salvador should have been rejected out of hand. Yet, there were those in the State Department who felt that the proposal should be "carefully and seriously" considered. The administration's tepid reaction was not lost on the Communist guerrillas.

Several weeks later, a new Marxist-Leninist proposal arrived—equally preposterous, equally one-sided. That proposal called for the establishment of three joint commissions to discuss the cessation of hostilities and withdrawal of military forces, to revise the electoral code, and to organize international oversight in implementing the provisions.

On Monday, President Duarte made a counterproposal to postpone elections for 6 weeks and the bells started ringing at the State Department. The State Department spokesman, Charles Redman, praised the proposal as "potentially the most significant opportunity ever for peace in El Salvador." He also added that if the FMLN is "serious in seeking a peaceful democratic outcome to the conflict, it will follow the government's example."

So, once again Mr. President, we give the Communists the benefit of the doubt, and the constitutional process is thrown in the garbage can. Once again, we hold out the vain illusion that perhaps the Communists are in fact seeking a "peaceful democratic outcome"—never mind the ongoing acts of terrorism such as the murder of FMLN defector Miguel Castellanos, who was assassinated on February 17, 2 days after he publicly denounced the Communist plan as ruse.

The Salvadoran people have long stressed the importance of an orderly democratic process in El Salvador. President Duarte has said that his ambition is to turn over the Presidency to a duly elected successor. We should never urge another nation to stray one bit from its Constitution.

Mr. President, on Monday, Ambassador Jeane Kirkpatrick laid out the tragic consequences to the democratic process in El Salvador. I ask unanimous consent that her column entitled "Setting a Trap in El Salvador" be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the column was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Feb. 27, 1989]

SETTING A TRAP IN EL SALVADOR

(By Jeane Kirkpatrick)

It would appear that the Bush administration, including Secretary of State James Baker, has been lured into a trap regarding El Salvador—a trap that has been baited as usual with what some mistake as a proposal to bring peace to the deeply troubled region.

El Salvador's FMLN guerrillas have presented two new "peace" proposals in the past two weeks. The first was an offer to participate in elections—for a price. The second, which followed a week later, is a broader proposal that offers to "definitively" end El Salvador's war.

El Salvador's government and all its major political parties promptly rejected the FMLN's initial offer to participate in the presidential election, and for good reason. It called for postponing the election for six months (in clear violation of El Salvador's constitution), required that government forces cease actions against guerrillas, and provided for an FMLN veto on electoral arrangements. In return, the FMLN offered a five-day cease-fire and promised to stop assassinating mayors if mayors ceased cooperating with the government.

It was an offer no government could accept. But the Bush administration has let it be known that it acted—through the person of Vice President Dan Quayle—to encourage reconsideration, thus justifying the FMLN expectation that the "new team" might prove more flexible than Ronald Reagan, George Shultz and Elliot Abrams.

"We wanted to wait until the end of the Reagan administration" to present the new plan, one guerrilla commander commented. Like Yasser Arafat and Daniel Ortega, FMLN leaders expected that the new administration will be more "open" and less informed about what has gone before and will therefore perhaps be more accommodating.

Although some in the media describe the FMLN's second proposal as a "new" and "important" departure from its longstanding position, in fact all that is new is the packaging. El Salvador's Communist Party leaders, Shafik Jorge Handal, was more accurate when he said: "This is not a new proposal," it is a "further development" of the FMLN's previous offer.

Following the traditional FMLN position, the new proposal still calls for "dissolution of the current security force"; the national police, the national guard and the treasury police, and for reducing El Salvador's army from 55,000 to 12,000.

There is, however, some new language. In the past, the FMLN explicitly insisted on integration of the guerrilla forces into El Salvador's army. Now it is willing "to recognize the existence of a single army" (which means a single, much smaller army into which FMLN forces would be integrated).

Where previously it demanded a share of power in a reconstituted interim government, now it demands the establishment of three joint commissions; one on cessation of hostilities and withdrawal of military forces, one on revision of the electoral code and a third to organize international oversight of implementation. In these commissions, power would be shared and decisions would be made by consensus.

El Salvador's political parties responded to this latest offer by agreeing to meet with FMLN leaders on "neutral" ground in Mexico last week. After the meeting, the political parties concluded that the government should respond to the repackaged FMLN demands.

There is no question how Salvadoran President Napoleon Duarte will respond. His whole life has been a struggle to give his country constitutional government. He will not in his final days dismantle the legacy he has worked so painstakingly to construct.

He understands—if the Bush administration does not—that it is not possible to "suspend" El Salvador's constitution and still preserve democratic government. He understands that for a decade the prime target of the FMLN has been to dismantle and take control of El Salvador's armed forces and that for a decade those sympathetic with the guerrillas have sought to paralyze El Salvador's army under the guise of its "permanent reorganzation."

And he knows that for a decade the FMLN has sought by all means and ruses to prevent the development and implementation of a democratic constitution, not only by denying the legitimacy of elections and refusing to participate, but by attacking polling places and voters as well.

Duarte understands that El Salvador's armed forces, which have so painstakingly learned restraint of power, would not be restrained if the constitution were violated. Said Defense Minister Gen. Eugenio Vides: "Falling into the trap would mean anyone could have the opportunity for disrupting the democratic process simply for the sake of staying in the presidency longer."

Duarte will know how to deal with the FMLN proposal. Meanwhile, someone at the responsible level in the Bush administration with an interest in preserving democracy and serving U.S. foreign policy interests should do some cramming on the recent history of Central America.

And it wouldn't hurt American journalists covering the region to consult original documents rather than relying on government and guerrilla public-relations handouts.

RESPONDING TO TERRORIST THREATS

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, John Chancellor has raised a most important issue regarding the terrorist threats against Salman Rushdie, his publisher and book distributors. Mr. Chancellor stated on February 28, 1989 that:

> One of the goals of terrorism is to force people to modify their behavior . . . and our behavior, as Americans, has been modified by the Ayatollah. Mr. Rushdie was scheduled to come here to go on an American book tour. Now he can't. That's an abridgement of our freedom to listen, whether we think his book is good, bad or boring. Terrorism is working in this case.

Other terrorists have sought victory by forcing a change in our behavior. On November 8, 1983, terrorists bombed the Capitol itself, sparking debate in the Senate as to whether we should surround the building with defensive barriers. But such barriers would undermine our democratic institutions by diminishing the access of Americans to their own government. At the City College of New York on December 14, 1983, I said that "we decided almost unanimously against it. You have to be very careful not to let your institutions be affected by terrorism."

The Ayatollah Khomeini hopes to change our behavior with his threats. John Chancellor suggests that we deny him that victory, and invite Rushdie to make a book tour in the United States under all necessary protection by our Government. I agree; regardless of whether we like Mr. Rushdie's book, the right to publish, sell, and read it cannot be held hostage by the Ayatollah. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Chancellor's commentary of February 28, 1989, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the commentary was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LET'S INVITE RUSHDIE

One of the goals of terrorism is to force people to modify their behavior. When the Ayatollah Khomeini put Salmon Rushdie on a hit list, Rushdie modified his behavior. He's in hiding in England. And our behavior, as Americans, has been modified by the Ayatollah. Mr. Rushdie was scheduled to come here to go on an American book tour. Now he can't. That's an abridgement of our freedom to listen, whether we think his book is good, bad or boring. Terrorism is working in this case.

So why don't we invite Salmon Rushdie to come to the United States for a week or so to talk about his book? If we can protect Yasir Arafat we can protect Rushdie. American authorities provide security all the time to controversial visitors to the United Nations. Television studios can be secured, hotels can be guarded, lecture halls can be protected.

Instead, something curious and scary is going on. Everybody's acting as though the Ayatollah's killers are supermen who will strike once Rushdie makes a move. That's wrong. They're not, but it's precisely what the Ayatollah wants us to think. Why can't the President or the Attorney General say—if Americans want to listen to him, let Rushdie come here and we'll protect him. We'll let him speak, and we'll guarantee the right of Americans to listen to whomever and whatever they please. That's our right, and terrorists shouldn't be allowed to take it away from us.

Would it be complicated and expensive to protect Rushdie? Sure. So is protecting freedom.

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Morning business is closed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the order of 12 noon having already arrived, the Senate will now go into executive session to consider the nomination of Louis W. Sullivan to be Secretary of Health and Human Services.

DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH AND HUMAN SERVICES

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the nomination.

The assistant legislative clerk read the nomination of Louis W. Sullivan, of Georgia, to be Secretary of Health and Human Services.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time for debate on the nomination between now and 1 p.m. is to be equally divided and controlled between the Senator from Texas [Mr. BENTSEN] and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. PACKWOOD] or their designees.

The Senator from Texas.

Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, I am delighted to be here to support the nomination of Dr. Louis Sullivan to be Secretary of the Department of Health and Human Services. I might state we were ready to proceed on this matter yesterday, but the other side of the aisle had requested that we defer until today, and we were pleased to cooperate in that regard.

Dr. Sullivan's nomination was reported out of the Finance Committee by a vote of 19 to 0. One member of the committee voted present. I am anxious to allow Dr. Sullivan to get on with the job, and to devote his full attention to the formidable task of managing the Nation's largest Cabinet department.

In his capacity as Secretary of Health and Human Services, Dr. Sullivan's decisions are going to affect the lives of millions of Americans. For example, over 50 million Americans receive help from Medicare or Medicaid, important programs that make health care available to people who are aged, poor, or disabled. Mothers and families who are caught up in the cycle of poverty around this country have new reason to hope for a meaningful future as HHS begins to implement last year's new welfare reform law. Mr. President, I am confident that Dr. Louis Sullivan is going to be a caring advocate for these and other vulnerable Americans.

The challenges that are facing Dr. Sullivan as HHS cannot be overestimated. The programs of this over $400 billion agency will be at center stage as we grapple with the deficit and with the budget that has been proposed by the President. When President Bush talks about a kinder and gentler America, decisions about Health and Human Services programs are central to achieving the objectives he has in mind. During the Committee on Finance's hearings on Dr. Sullivan's confirmation, I was struck by how strongly many of my colleagues reacted to the President's proposals to cut Medicare spending by over $5 billion next year. Within the committee, strong support was also shown for improving the health of our Nation's children, and for addressing the looming crisis in rural health care, a crisis reflected in the fact that we have had so many rural hospitals across this country close over the last 5 years.

These are just a few of the formidable challenges that are going to be faced by Dr. Sullivan. I think he is well-equipped to meet these challenges. As the president and dean of the Morehouse School of Medicine, he used his talents as a physician and an administrator to endow an institution and its students with a deep commitment to health care for society's most vulnerable citizens.

Mr. President, I should note that there was some delay on the part of the White House in scheduling confirmation hearings on Dr. Sullivan. We were prepared in the Finance Committee to move on the nomination much sooner, but we were asked by the White House for some additional time so that some paperwork could be completed. This paperwork in part involved Dr. Sullivan's arrangements upon leaving Morehouse, and was required to ensure that there was not created any ongoing financial conflict of interest with his position as Secretary of HHS. I am confident that Dr. Sullivan has severed any connection between himself and Morehouse that could pose a problem. In fact, he did so at considerable sacrifice for himself and for his family.

In looking at the arrangements made for Dr. Sullivan's departure from Morehouse, I and several of my colleagues are concerned that he may have been called on to do more with regard to foregoing severance pay than demanded by even the strictest rules and principles of equity and ethics. This issue deserves further exploration, so I have asked the committee staff to look into the severance pay issue with the staff from the Office of the Counsel to the President and the Office of Government Ethics. Dr. Sullivan is not a wealthy man, and the amount of money that we are talking about is substantial for him. I do not want to needlessly discourage good and able men and women from seeking positions in Government service.

I might say also that I am delighted that President Bush has made a renewed commitment to improving access to affordable health care, to the implementation of welfare reform and to investing in the future of our Nation's children. His nomination of Louis Sullivan as Secretary of HHS is a good first step in the right direction. These areas of child health, rural health care, and welfare reform, are going to be among the top priorities of the Committee on Finance in the coming 2 years, and I look forward to working with Dr. Sullivan on them. I urge the Senate to act promptly and favorably on his nomination. I defer to the ranking member on the committee, the Senator from Oregon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon is recognized.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I thank the Chair.

I, too, support Dr. Sullivan and support him quite strongly. Let me make a couple things clear for the record, if I might, because there has been a big issue about the subject of abortion. Dr. Sullivan has made his position very clear. He supports President Bush's position. He is opposed to Federal funding of abortion. He wants to overturn Roe versus Wade and will support that position. That is clearly not my position. I do support Federal funding of abortion, and I hope that Roe versus Wade is not overturned. But if I were to vote against Dr. Sullivan, I would have to vote against him on that issue alone, no other issue, because in every other respect from my standpoint he is eminently qualified. If I were to vote against him on that issue, in my judgment, it makes me as bad as the other side, which does not agree with me on this issue, that says that is the one issue I am going to vote on. I hope we have passed the eye-for-an-eye philosophy. I am willing to say, "Doctor, your department has lots of other things to do." As a matter of fact, the entire Department of Health and Human Services funded only 322 abortions last year, almost all of them to save the life of the woman. Twelve or thirteen years ago the then Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, the predecessor to this Department, was funding almost a quarter of a million. So those opposed to funding won the battle. We voted on the Senate floor. The battle is lost from my standpoint, won from theirs. He fully realizes that the major things his Department has to do relate to Medicare, Medicaid, Social Security, and tremendous budget restraints. I do not want to say budget cuts because President Bush has asked that Medicare go up next year by $8 billion. If we do not change the law, it is going to go up $13 billion, but it is not a cut from where we are this year.

Those are the problems on which Dr. Sullivan has to work. Indeed, if we should be asking the question about abortion, we really ought to be asking it more of judicial appointments, especially Federal court appointments, rather than the particular position he is going to hold.

With that background, let me go on to the money and the allegation of the conflict. Dr. Sullivan was entitled at Morehouse to two different benefits. One was straight out severance pay, about $300,000, that he is entitled to when he leaves that job as dean. If he retires, if he comes to work for the Government, if he moves to Indonesia, he is entitled to that money. He has voluntarily agreed to give that money up. I think that is a mistake because I think it sets a bad precedent for others who might follow. There is nothing that says there is any conflict in his taking money he has earned in the past and that has nothing to do with if he ever was connected with Morehouse again. That he would be entitled to. I wish, frankly, he would reverse his personal decision and say, "That part I will take," because he is not a wealthy man.

The second issue involves a sabbatical. A sabbatical is when in normal academic life you take a year off every 7 years and you receive a full stipend or some part stipend from the college and you go back. The question is whether or not there could be a possible conflict of interest in his receiving some pay from Morehouse while he is Secretary of Health and Human Services in a department that has to pass on grants to medical schools, some of which go to Morehouse. There the Office of Government Ethics has ruled that he would have a conflict of interest. He is going to forgo that also. He is not taking, either one. But that probably is legitimate to forgo. I think the other one is voluntary and he really should not lose it because he is not wealthy. I admire him for doing it, but I would not want the record to indicate that every employee would have to do that because it was an earned entitlement that you have no matter what.

With that behind us, I do not know where the President was going to find a better man with background qualifications better than Dr. Sullivan, a physician of repute, an educator without peer. Anybody who can found a medical school, found it in the mid-seventies, raise the money for it and make it go, deserves a place in this Cabinet—as far as I am concerned, in any position, but to found one that is primarily black, to train doctors to serve in urban areas and rural areas where we are, very frankly, having a hard time getting graduates of normal medical schools, deserves a double accolade and he has made it go.

The recommendations of the Georgia congressional delegations, House and Senate, were above reproach. The letters that we had from citizens who knew him in Atlanta, those who knew him in Boston when he was in Boston, are without compare. In every sense this man is qualified to do a first-rate job. The issue of abortion ought to be irrelevant, or at a maximum de minimis for this position at this time. Therefore, I entirely support his confirmation and hope that the Senate will give him a 100-to-0 vote this afternoon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas controls the time.

Mr. BENTSEN. I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. KENNEDY. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, I urge the Senate to confirm the nomination of Dr. Louis W. Sullivan, M.D., to become the next Secretary of Health and Human Services. As the chairman of the Senate Committee on Labor and Human Resources, the committee that shares jurisdiction with the Committee on Finance over DHHS, I look forward to working with Dr. Sullivan in the years to come to address serious challenges which fall in the area of public health.

Dr. Sullivan appeared before the Labor Committee yesterday to discuss his views on a number of important health and child care issues. I was impressed with his insights into complex problems, his commitment to the concerns we share, and his sensitivity to the problems of the uninsured, the elderly, people infected with the AIDS virus, and those in urban and rural areas who lack access to basic medical care.

The problems the Secretary of HHS will confront over the next few years go to the very heart of the many different challenges facing the Nation.

Thirty-seven million citizens have no health insurance coverage, either public or private. As a result, they are denied access to essential health care that should be a fundamental human right.

Thirty million senior citizens and their families are at risk for the devastating cost of long-term care, either in a nursing home or in their own homes.

The AIDS epidemic continues to threaten our society with the most devastating plague of the 20th century. Forty-nine thousand Americans have already died from this disease; over a million and half are infected with the deadly virus, and care needs could well bankrupt our health care system in the decade ahead.

The National Institutes of Health are the envy of the world for their record of achievement in biomedical research, but the United States lags behind 18 other countries in protecting children against infant mortality.

Minority citizens die at rates that shame us all; unnecessary deaths among blacks and other minorities from preventable and treatable illnesses number almost 60,000 a year;

Hospitals are reeling under the pressures of soaring costs. An economical and effective prospective payment system is an essential element in the struggle against excessive inflation in these costs, but health care must never be held hostage to attempts to balance the budget on the backs of our hospitals.

Efforts to contain health care costs must not compromise the high quality of care that all Americans have come to expect. In searching for cuts, we must take the careful approach of the skilled surgeon, seeking to remove the excess without harming essential functions.

I commend President Bush for nominating Dr. Sullivan to lead us in meeting these and other challenges. He is a distinguished physician, medical researcher, and medical administrator. And I am also pleased to note that he has served or studied at a number of Massachusetts institutions—including Boston University, Harvard Medical School, Boston City Hospital, and the Boston Sickle Cell Center.

One of the most impressive achievements in his distinguished career involves the Morehouse School of Medicine. As the school's first dean and president, Dr. Sullivan created the medical school and built it into one of the Nation's most respected institutions for the training of physicians. He is widely recognized by his peers for his leadership, energy, commitment and contributions to academic medicine.

Dr. Sullivan is also well known for his honesty and integrity. In accepting the call to public service, his efforts to avoid any hint or question of conflict of interest have been above and beyond those ordinarily demanded of the Nation's high officials. Dr. Sullivan has voluntarily chosen to forgo a large amount of severance pay rightfully owed to him from his service at the Morehouse School of Medicine.

In summary, I am proud to support the nomination Dr. Sullivan to become the next Secretary of Health and Human Services. His new Department has the widest array of Federal programs and the largest budget. He is well-qualified for the position of Secretary of HHS and I urge the Senate to confirm his nomination.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I yield 3 minutes to the Senator from Utah.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah is recognized for 3 minutes.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, today we will be voting on the nomination of Dr. Louis Sullivan, President Bush's nomination as Secretary of the Department of Health and Human Services. Dr. Sullivan has my full support and I hope that all of my colleagues will likewise support this nomination.

The Department of Health and Human Services has the third largest budget in the world. Only the United States and Soviet Governments have budgets that are bigger. HHS administers and reviews countless domestic programs in America which touch every American every day. The thankless task of administering this mammoth agency must fall on the shoulders of a compassionate professional.

If I were to characterize Dr. Sullivan in just two words, I would call him a "compassionate professional." I believe he is just exactly that type of a person. First of all, he is a respected health care professional. He has worked on a great number of the problems that the Secretary of Health and Human Services would have to deal with. He has firsthand knowledge of the health care needs of Americans. He has worked to help low-income mothers and their children receive needed services while working against poverty in America. He has cared for the elderly and understands their needs. He will now head an agency that provides health care services to over 31 million elderly Americans; health care services for nearly 26 million low-income families; social services and cash benefits to over 40 million Americans; and health and social care to over 33 million Americans with disabilities.

Dr. Sullivan's credentials to lead our Nation's health and human services program are impeccable. He is well-educated. He is articulate. He will be a great spokesman for all of these areas, and he is a respected author. His résumé reads like that of one of the great people of this world, which he is. He is a noted hemotologist and has trained amd taught at laudable medical institutions including Harvard Medical School, New Jersey College of Medicine, Boston University, and since 1975 has been the dean, president, and director of the School of Medicine at Morehouse College.

I will not go into all the numerous awards and other matters that have made his life so important. But his record and experiences embodies what, I believe, is characteristic of what we need in a Secretary of Health and Human Services.

So I am delighted that Dr. Sullivan, a progressive, compassionate, conservative with proven abilities as an administrator, will accept the challenge of administering this essential Federal agency. His responsibilities will be large and diverse, and I admire his willingness to join the ranks of the dedicated public servants now serving HHS and other areas in the President's Cabinet.

Again, I call Dr. Sullivan a "compassionate professional," one who really will make a difference in this country. I urge my colleagues to support his nomination.

Thank you, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yield time?

Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished Senator from New York.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I rise to join the other Members of the Senate who speak of their admiration for Dr. Sullivan. He has impressed us all. We are looking forward to his tenure as Secretary of the Department of Health and Human Services. He confronts a formidable task—the proposition that this is, indeed, as the Senator from Utah said, a country with the third largest budget in the world—is a measure of the undertaking.

I might say, since so much of our talk these days is of difficulty, that last evening I met with Dorcas Hardy, Commissioner of the Social Security Administration, who reports that the Social Security retirement and disability funds are rising at $89,000 a minute. Not all the news is of difficulty and strain.

Nevertheless, I would like to address succinctly a matter which our distinguished Chairman, LLOYD BENTSEN, raised in Dr. Sullivan's hearing before the Committee on Finance. The Chairman and, I might add, the majority leader, questioned Dr. Sullivan about the JOBS Program—that is the training program provided for in the Family Support Act which we adopted last year and which was enacted last year. This act is the first overhaul of the welfare system in half a century, from the time that it was first created. The chairman stated as to "whether or not [the JOBS] Program is a discretionary program or an entitlement, * * * this was passed as an entitlement provision. And in less than 3 months after—enactment—the administration's budget was presented to us undermining that entitlement feature and * * * in effect * * * making it a discretionary program. I am deeply concerned * * *," said the chairman of our committee, Senator BENTSEN, and this Senator who is chairman of the Subcommittee on Social Security would like to echo those views.

Mr. President, in the 100th Congress, this body passed the Family Security Act, the first overhaul of our Family Welfare Program, Aid to Families With Dependent Children [AFDC], in half a century. After months of negotiations, the House and Senate produced a conference report that was swiftly adopted by both bodies. My colleagues in the Senate voted 96 to 1 in favor. President Reagan signed the Family Support Act into law, Public Law 100-485, on October 13, 1988.

One of the most important features of our welfare legislation was the creation of a new entitlement program, the JOBS Program, to provide education, training, and work experience to AFDC parents. Indeed, the bipartisan consensus that secured passage and enactment of our legislation was largely founded on the simple premise that welfare mothers and fathers must strive to support their children through work. It is the further obligation of Government to do all in its power to help these poor parents make ready to enter the labor force.

Toward this end, we created the JOBS Program. Upon introduction, the JOBS Program was to be an open-ended entitlement. Subsequently, in the Finance Committee's markup of our bill, concerns were raised about creating a new, open-ended entitlement program at a time of growing budget deficits. We argued, with the support of the Nation's Governors, that open-ended financing was the only sure way of providing the States with the fiscal assistance they needed to make the new work-training programs a success.

Still, we compromised. Working with the Governors, we agreed to make the JOBS Program a capped entitlement, but—and let there be no doubt about this—an entitlement nonetheless.

The capped entitlement remained intact throughout Senate deliberations and the House-Senate conference. Indeed, during the conference, again at the request of the Governors, we raised the caps to guarantee States solid Federal financial support in future fiscal years. As signed by President Reagan, our new public law entitles States to 600 million Federal dollars in the current fiscal year, $800 million in fiscal year 1990, $1 billion in fiscal year 1991-93, $1.1 billion in fiscal year 1994, $1.3 billion in fiscal year 1995, and $1 billion in fiscal year 1996, and future fiscal years.

This is the lynchpin to our JOBS Program, the point upon which Congress and the Governors and the President agreed: States must be entitled to sufficient Federal resources so that they may, in accordance with statute, create new education, training, and work programs, target long-term welfare recipients to participate in these programs, and substantially increase rates of participation in these programs. At the same time, States must act responsibly and take advantage of the Federal entitlement. A State that does not use these Federal funds will have only itself to blame.

Mr. President, I review this legislative history only to make the point that the entitlement status of the JOBS Program was neither an accident nor an afterthought. The decision to make the JOBS Program an entitlement, a radical departure from current law, was carefully considered, seriously debated, and deliberately adopted by this body, by the House, and signed by the President.

Imagine our consternation, therefore, when President Reagan, not 3 months after signing this landmark legislation into law, sent us, on January 9, 1989, a fiscal year 1990 budget that proposes to completely undo the JOBS entitlement. The outgoing Reagan budget proposes that the JOBS Program be a discretionary program, subject to annual appropriations, and that the maximum appropriation in fiscal year 1990 be cut to $350 million. In short, our capped entitlement of up to $800 million would be reduced by more than half to a discretionary sum of only $350 million.

Mr. President, this was appalling. This proposal, should it be permitted to stand, would clearly violate the law. The statute says it is an entitlement as much as any of the other entitlement provisions of the Social Security Act. And it is not within the preview of the President to say "I have changed my mind," and, therefore change the law. Yet, no particular protests were made because the budget of the outgoing President was soon to be revised by the incoming President. One month later to the day, on February 9, 1989, President Bush's budget revisions arrived, in a document entitled, "Building A Better America." It arrived, Mr. President, but it shed little light. No mention was made of the JOBS Program; indeed, no mention was made of the Family Support Act at all. Still, we hoped. Silence could, perhaps, be interpreted to mean that President Bush would support the new statute, rather than his predecessor's budget.

I spoke with Dr. Sullivan about this very point when he visited me in my office, on January 23, 1989, prior to his confirmation hearing before the Finance Committee. A number of us questioned Dr. Sullivan on this point again when he appeared before the Committee on Finance last week. Indeed, my distinguished colleagues, the majority leader and the chairman of the Finance Committee emphatically made the point during the hearing: The JOBS Program must remain an entitlement.

In the last 2 days, I have met with Governors Carroll Campbell of South Carolina and Bill Clinton of Arkansas. Both expressed the concern of their fellow Governors that the JOBS Program maintain the entitlement status guaranteed in the new statute.

On Monday, February 27, following my meeting with Governor Campbell, I spoke with Mr. Darman and raised this specific question. I can report to the Senate that Mr. Darman agreed with me that the moneys for the JOBS Program were in fact to be, by law, a capped entitlement. He indicated that the exact amount made available in the first budget round might not be that provided in the Family Support Act—$800 million in fiscal year 1990—but that this could be dealt with in a supplemental, should it become necessary.

I hasten to state that this was a telephone conversation and cannot be considered a formal undertaking by the distinguished Director of the Office of Management and Budget. But if it is an indication of his present thoughts, it is indeed reassuring. However, something much more formal must come from the executive branch.

Mr. President, I know Dr. Sullivan will want to address that matter.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I yield 3 minutes to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania is recognized for 3 minutes.

Mr. SPECTER. I thank the distinguished ranking member for yielding me the time.

Mr. President, I congratulate President Bush on his selection of Dr. Louis W. Sullivan as Secretary of the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, and I am pleased to express my support and vote for his confirmation today.

Dr. Sullivan is well-qualified for the position of Secretary of Health and Human Services, as reflected in his impressive list of accomplishments and experiences. In July 1975, the 41-year-old physician became the founding dean and director of the Medical Education Program at Morehouse College in Atlanta, GA. He was named the first president and dean of the Morehouse School of Medicine when it became independent from the college in 1981.

Before joining the Morehouse College faculty, he held diverse teaching and administrative positions. Dr. Sullivan began his academic career as an instructor of medicine at the Harvard Medical School from 1963 until 1964. He later served at the National Institutes of Health and as an attending physician in Jersey City, NJ. From 1966 through 1975, Dr. Sullivan held various positions at Boston University School of Medicine and Hospital including those of professor of medicine and physiology and professor of nutrition. Certainly this wide range of experience will serve him well as Secretary for Health and Human Services.

In addition, Dr. Sullivan belongs to a number of medical and scientific societies, including the American College of Physicians, where he is a member of the Health Care Financing Subcommittee. He also holds many advisory and consulting positions, including membership on the Robert Wood Johnson Health Policy Fellowship Board of the National Academy of Sciences and membership on the Advisory Committee to the Harvard-Massachusetts Institute of Technology Division of Health and Technology. Dr. Sullivan has conducted numerous research projects that include studies on vitamins and the effects of alcohol on certain health conditions.

I am confident that Dr. Sullivan will be an effective leader on the many important issues addressed by the Department of Health and Human Services.

I support the nomination of Dr. Sullivan to this post. If confirmed by the Senate, as I am sure he will be, I have every confidence that he will perform the new duties with exceptional skill, as he has in the other positions he has held in the past.

I have had the opportunity to become personally acquainted with Dr. Sullivan and believe him to be a man of outstanding qualifications to take on this very important position.

His professional career has already been outlined. Beyond what appears on paper, he is a man who presents himself extremely well. He is articulate, he is personable, and I think he has the qualities to be an outstanding Secretary of Health and Human Services.

Mr. President, beyond those comments about Dr. Sullivan personally, I compliment President Bush and the administration in the support of Dr. Sullivan through a difficult confirmation proceeding. Some questions arose early on, I think, as a result of Dr. Sullivan's not being totally experienced in the fast currents of the Washington political scene, and the administration, I think, gave the kind of support which was warranted and which has worked out.

I also compliment my colleague, Senator PACKWOOD, for his participation in this confirmation proceeding. There had been some publicity given to an early meeting between Senator PACKWOOD and Dr. Sullivan, where Dr. Sullivan testified at the hearings that he had misspoken, and that, too, was clarified.

I particularly appreciated Senator PACKWOOD's comment in voting in support of Dr. Sullivan, that notwithstanding a disagreement on a single issue, a single issue ought not to make the determination as to qualification of a Cabinet choice, and I heartily agree with that kind of conclusion, that there are an enormous number of issues which face all of us in the discharge of our public duties.

While there may be disagreements, even heated and vociferous disagreements, on a single issue, that ought not to be the determinant. So as these proceedings draw to a close, Mr. President, I think it is going to be a good day for the United States with a man of this distinguished position, and I look forward to supporting Dr. Sullivan both in the vote today and in the administration of his office. I urge my colleagues to give Dr. Sullivan their support.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, the Senator from North Carolina spoke with me and indicates he does not want to go past 1 o'clock. I have no other speaker. I know of Senator THURMOND, who is not here, and Senator CHAFEE, also. I wonder if the Senator from North Carolina is ready to proceed now and take 5 or 6 minutes and stop and see where we are.

Mr. HELMS. Very well.

Mr. PACKWOOD. I yield 5 minutes to the Senator from North Carolina.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, let me defer to the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. CHAFEE. I thank my distinguished colleague from North Carolina.

Mr. President, I rise to state that I support Dr. Sullivan's nomination for Secretary of HHS with enthusiasm, and I am pleased that our distinguished chairman of our committee, Senator BENTSEN and Senator PACKWOOD, the ranking member, have been able to work out with the administration the fact that Dr. Sullivan will be able to retain the severance pay that he was originally apparently forced to give up.

That struck me, as it did other members of the committee, when Dr. Sullivan came before us, as an extremely onerous requirement upon Dr. Sullivan. Certainly, none of us expects somebody to come into the administration as a pauper and go out a wealthy person. Likewise, we do not expect somebody to come in with moderate wealth and go out of the administration a pauper. That was a requirement that was about to be levied upon Dr. Sullivan.

It appears that this matter will be worked out, and should Dr. Sullivan choose to retain that severance pay or that particular fund that we previously have discussed, it would be possible, and I certainly hope that he will do it, because there is no possible conflict of interest in that.

Dr. Sullivan appeared before our committee, as previously stated, and greatly impressed all of us. In addition, he made personal calls on us. We had a chance to interview him and go over his record, and the administration and the Nation are lucky to have obtained the services of a man such as Dr. Sullivan, so we look forward to a happy administration, a successful one.

He confronts all kinds of challenges. I stand exactly in the same position as Senator PACKWOOD does as regards Roe versus Wade and the abortion issue. Nonetheless, Dr. Sullivan is the man for the job, and despite all these differences, I believe his nomination should be confirmed.

I was extremely impressed with Dr. Sullivan's concern for and emphasis on the issues of access and prevention. To me, this suggests that he has, not just the background, but also the vision required to do the job.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Does the Senator from North Carolina want to proceed next or want to let Mr. THURMOND proceed?

I yield 3 minutes to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I rise in support of the nomination of Dr. Louis Wade Sullivan to be Secretary of Health and Human Services. The Department of Health and Human Services has a budget which is second only to that of the Pentagon. It is charged with the responsibility of administering programs which provide vital services to our Nation. I am confident that President Bush has made a wise selection in his choice of Dr. Sullivan to head this important Department.

Mr. President, Dr. Louis Sullivan is well qualified to hold the demanding position of Secretary of Health and Human Services. A native of Atlanta, GA, he graduated magna cum laude from Morehouse College and received his M.D. degree cum laude from Boston University. He then completed an intership and a medical residency at New York Hospital, Cornell Medical Center. Dr. Sullivan also served a residency in general pathology at Massachusetts General Hospital, after which, he became a research fellow in hematology at the Thorndike Research Laboratories of the Harvard Medical School at the Boston City Hospital.

Dr. Louis Sullivan has been an assistant professor of medicine at the New Jersey College of Medicine; and successively, an assistant professor, and full professor of medicine, at the Boston University School of Medicine. While in Boston, Dr. Sullivan became codirector of hematology at the Boston University Medical Center, where he continued his research in that area.

In 1975, Dr. Sullivan became the founding dean and director of the Medical Education Program at Morehouse College. When the Morehouse School of Medicine became independent of Morehouse College in 1981, Dr. Sullivan was named its president. Since 1985, he has served with distinction as president of that institution of medical learning.

Dr. Sullivan's academic achievements have been recognized through his induction into the Alpha Omega Alpha Medical Honor Society, and Phi Beta Kappa. He has also served as a member of the Institute of Medicine of the National Academy of Sciences; the Cancer Institute's National Cancer Advisory Board; and as vice chairman of the Commission on Health and Human Services of the Southern Regional Education Board. Dr. Sullivan has been honored by numerous other professional and civic organizations.

Mr. President, Dr. Louis Sullivan has demonstrated his effectiveness as an outstanding physican, teacher, and administrator. He is sensitive to the needs of the underprivileged and elderly of our country. He is a dedicated leader, who possesses the expertise necessary to carry out President Bush's policies at the Department of Health and Human Services. Accordingly, I urge my colleagues to support Dr. Sullivan's nomination.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I yield the remainder of the time I have to the Senator from North Carolina.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. HELMS. I thank the distinguished Senator from Oregon.

Mr. BENTSEN. Would the Senator like additional time? I have another 3 minutes, if he wants it.

Mr. HELMS. I will try not to use it.

Mr. BENTSEN. I yield an additional 3 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. HELMS. I thank the distinguished Senator from Texas.

Mr. President, at the outset let me emphasize as strongly as I know how that I respect Dr. Sullivan for his many academic accomplishments and contributions to medicine. Nonetheless, I am obliged to vote against his confirmation as Secretary of Health and Human Services. He is a civil man, a pleasant man, and I enjoyed the one conference I had with him. Obviously, he is a man of high ability and intelligence, but, nevertheless, having studied the matter, some of the answers to questions and nonanswers to questions—to be honest about it—that Dr. Sullivan has provided, I feel obliged as a matter of conscience to vote against his confirmation as Secretary of Health and Human Services.

After reading and rereading his responses to questions that I had submitted for the record and after reviewing his responses to questions asked by other Senators at his confirmation hearing, I have concluded that one of two things is obvious: Either Dr. Sullivan has no opinion on a number of issues or he is reluctant to voice his opinion, one or the other. If Dr. Sullivan has no opinion on those issues which are of utmost importance to me and to a great many citizens I am privileged to represent, I find myself troubled, that he may find himself vulnerable to manipulation by bureaucrats and powerful outside interests groups whose views are antithetical to those of the President of the United States, not to mention many of the rest of us. On the other hand, if he refuses to voice his position, he is doing a disservice to the U.S. Senate and the American public. So, in short, this is one of those rare instances where I will be casting my vote hoping that I will be proved wrong on both counts, and I fervently hope that I will be because I like the man and I wish that I could support his nomination.

But let me offer a few examples: Senator ARMSTRONG, for example, asked Dr. Sullivan at his February 23 hearing before the Senate Finance Committee whether he would recommend that the President sign an Executive order banning fetal experimentation on preborn children who have been aborted. Dr. Sullivan declined to give a definitive answer.

On February 23 I asked him, through a question submitted for the record, whether he favored fetal experimentation as reported in a December 21 Atlanta Journal article. Dr. Sullivan again refused to give a definitive answer.

I believe the pro-life community as it is called, is unanimously opposed to fetal experimentation on an unborn alive child if it imposes more than minimal risk to the child.

I cannot turn my back on that opinion. Furthermore, organ harvesting or tissue harvesting from dead babies who are the products of induced abortion is just as abhorent and just as egregious. We have condemned over and over again thousands of times the harvesting of tissues and organs of Jews murdered at the hand of Adolf Hitler. We should take care that we provide the same protection to the most innocent and helpless of human life, that is to say, unborn children. Dr. Sullivan has been unwilling to give that commitment, for whatever reasons satisfactory to himself.

On February 23 I also asked in writing whether Dr. Sullivan supported the Civil Rights Commission's recommendation to "resume investigation of allegations that children with disabilities are discriminatorily denied medical treatment based on handicap." Dr. Sullivan refused to answer the question and merely stated that he would "explore * * * the extent to which we are meeting our responsibilities."

Mr. President, that will not do. That is not enough. I like the man. But he owes us more of an answer than that.

On February 27, Senator HATCH asked Dr. Sullivan in the Senate Labor Committee hearing whether he supported notifying spouses if their partner is infected with the AIDS virus. Dr. Sullivan said he could not take a position on whether health authorities should notify spouses because it is a State issue. I am sure Dr. Sullivan knows that for years the Federal Government has made recommendations to the States on treating and controlling contagious diseases, including AIDS, and it continues to make recommendations on testing and contact tracing, so I find Dr. Sullivan's comments puzzling.

On February 27, Senator COATS submitted a host of questions and unfortunately, again, Dr. Sullivan would not take a position.

Asked whether he would begin a study on the detrimental effects of abortion, Dr. Sullivan refused to commit to doing the study and simply said he would "work with the Director of CDC to explore the practicality of undertaking such a study."

Asked whether he would support a widespread epidemiological study on the prevalence of AIDS infection, Dr. Sullivan said that "if the results of the feasibility study show it is possible to obtain accurate information at acceptable cost from household survey of HIV seroprevalence, CDC will recommend that the full national survey be conducted. * * *"

Mr. President, that is a nonanswer. Dr. Sullivan would not take a position whether he would even approve CDC's recommendation.

Senator COATS also asked Dr. Sullivan whether he would support a Federal confidentiality law which would repeal State confidentiality and right-to-know laws concerning AIDS. Dr. Sullivan said that he wanted to see the results of a study. He would not take a position.

Asked whether he believed that living embryos, fetuses and newborns should be protected from research which poses greater than mimimal risk of suffering, Dr. Sullivan cited the Department's "commitment to the protection of all human subjects in research" and a law which prevents the use of living fetuses in research. Dr. Sullivan did not state whether he supported this policy or this law.

Asked whether he supported research using the organs or tissues of children who are the products of an induced abortion, Dr. Sullivan refused to take a position.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has used his 7 minutes.

Mr. BENTSEN. I have 3 minutes I had been holding for the junior Senator from Georgia, but I do not believe he is going to appear. So I yield that to the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. HELMS. The Senator is most generous, and I thank him.

On questions relating to the starvation of newly born handicapped infants, Dr. Sullivan refused to commit to taking steps to enforce the law. I found that puzzling. Asked whether he would enforce the congressionally defined standard of care for severely handicapped infants, Dr. Sullivan merely said that he wanted to be updated on the progress and recommendations of a study being conducted on the subject by the Office of Human Development Services. That was a nonanswer.

Dr. Sullivan has also taken positions with which I disagree respectfully. He supports the reauthorization of title X—the so-called family planning bill provided that the title X program is not involved with abortions. I do not. The title X program is no more and no less than a safe sex program for teenagers. The title X program is funding and will continue to fund school-based birth control clinics. It is the leading Federal funder of Planned Parenthood, an organization bound and determined to destroy the ethical fiber of this country.

Dr. Sullivan supports abortion in cases of rape and incest. I do not. In my opinion, if one really believes that that baby in the mother's womb is a real, live person, than I cannot understand how he can support imposing a death sentence on the child because the child was conceived by force.

Mr. President, I will not further consume the Senate's time except to reiterate what I said at the outset. I respect Dr. Sullivan for his intelligence and demonstrable academic accomplishments. However, his failure or refusal, one or the other, to take positions on a number of extremely important issues, at least important to me, leaves me with no alternative but regretfully to cast my vote against his nomination.

I do it with no animus toward him and I wish him well, and I hope he will prove me wrong in his service as Secretary of HHS.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the following items, be printed in the RECORD: First, my questions and Dr. Sullivan's responses; and second, Senator COATS' questions and Dr. Sullivan's responses to those questions.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FEBRUARY 27, 1989.

Hon. JESSE HELMS,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR HELMS: Enclosed please find my answers to your questions presented by Senator Symms in conjunction with my confirmation hearings before the Senate Finance Committee. I have also sent a copy of my responses to the Committee for inclusion in the hearing record.

Sincerely yours,

LOUIS W. SULLIVAN, M.D.,
Secretary-designate,
Department of Health and Human Services.

RESPONSE TO QUESTIONS SUBMITTED FOR THE RECORD BY SENATOR JESSE HELMS

Question 1: What is an abortion?

Answer: An abortion is the premature expulsion of a fetus from the womb, which may be either spontaneous or induced.

Question 2: As a doctor, when do you believe life begins?

Answer: I believe that life begins at conception.

Questions 3 and 4: On December 18 you reportedly stated to the Atlanta Journal that you support a woman's right to an abortion. On December 21 you are quoted as saying, ". . . my private situation . . . is that there should be that right [to an abortion]." On January 23 Evans and Novak reported that you have told Senator Packwood you favor abortion. On January 24, the New York Times reported that you have told other legislators that you support legalized abortion.

How does your current position differ from all these accounts?

In the December 21 Atlanta Journal article you stated that you do not believe the Federal government should be involved in funding abortion "because it's such a divisive, emotional issue with such polarization on both sides."

How does your current position differ from the position you took on December 21?

Answer: I am in full accord with President Bush's views on abortion. I oppose abortion except to save the life of the mother and in cases of rape and incest. I am in favor of a pro-life amendment to the Constitution and I am in favor of overturning Roe v. Wade.

Consistent with these views, I wholeheartedly support the Hyde Amendment. The Federal Government should not be funding abortions, except when the life of the mother is in danger.

Question 5: Do you believe that tissues and organs should be removed from an aborted child while that child is still alive?

Answer: No. Tissues and organs must not be removed from a living fetus, infant or child, nor an adult without his or her consent.

Questions 6 and 7: Do you believe that tissues and organs should be removed from a dead aborted child?

On December 21 the Atlanta Journal reported that you favor fetal experimentation. How does your current position differ from that reported in the December 21 article?

Answer: I have a strong conviction that no action should be taken that would encourage or promote abortion.

The Department of Health and Human Services has a longstanding commitment to the protection of all human subjects in research. In addition to the Department's broad regulations protecting research subjects, there are special regulations to guard against exploitation of vulnerable research subjects—especially pregnant women, fetuses and children.

Our regulations prevent the use of living fetuses in research unless there is a therapeutic benefit to the fetus or unless the research poses essentially no risk to the fetus (n.b. the test for this latter exception is that the research is conducted on fetuses in utero without reference to whether the fetus is to be carried to term or not). Congress has codified these strong protections into section 498 of the Public Health Service Act.

Question 8: Should the lives of the handicapped be protected from the time of birth?

Answer: Yes, the lives of the handicapped should be protected.

Question 9: Do you oppose the actions of some doctors who deny lifesaving medical treatment or food and fluids to newly born handicapped infants?

Answer: It follows from my previous answer that I would of course oppose actions that would deny lifesaving medical treatment or food and fluids to newly born handicapped infants. I believe medical care should always be provided when beneficial. In addition, nourishment should always be provided.

Question 10: According to a press release of the Civil Rights Commission dated January 12, next month the Commission will release a report which recommends that the Executive Branch "resume investigation of allegations that children with disabilities are discriminatorily denied medical treatment based on handicap." Will you support the Commission's recommendations?

Answer: I intend to explore with the Justice Department and HHS Department personnel what our authorities are in this area and the extent to which we are meeting our responsibilities. If there are deficiencies, I will make recommendations to correct them.

DR. SULLIVAN'S RESPONSES TO QUESTIONS SUBMITTED FOR THE RECORD DURING CONFIRMATION HEARINGS

Question 1: I would like to ask you a series of questions related to abortion activities in Title X projects.

(a) Do you believe for purposes of Title X that abortion is a method of family planning?

(b) Do you agree with the statement made by President Reagan on July 30, 1987 that "At present, the coexistence of abortion with federally-supported family planning services fosters the view that abortion is an acceptable and government-sanctioned method of family planning"?

(c) In your opinion, should Title X clinics which refuse to separate their abortion activities from legitimate forms of family planning be eligible to receive Title X funds?

(d) What steps will you take to implement proposed regulations creating a wall of separation between abortion and legitimate family planning? Will you direct the Department to appeal—if necessary to the Supreme Court—all court rulings which would overrule, in whole or in part, those regulations.

(e) What further steps will you take to assure that the original legislative intent of Congress with respect to Title X is carried out?

Answer: (a) I agree with the view embodied in Title X that abortion is an unacceptable method of family planning and that, as such, Title X family planning should not include abortion-related services. I support the concept that proper family planning should reduce the incidence of abortion.

(b) Abortion is antithetical to the purposes of Federal family planning programs. It is important that the integrity of the Title X program be established as a program which in no way promotes or facilitates access to abortion. The message of the Title X regulations issued on February 2, 1988 is that the Federal government does not sanction abortion as a method of family planning and that it will not provide funding for actions that assist a woman with an unintended pregnancy to obtain an abortion.

(c) Clinics which refuse to separate their abortion activities from legitimate Title X family planning services should not be eligible to receive Title X funds. I support the rules issued on February 2, 1988 which require that a Title X project be organized so that it is physically and financially separated from prohibited abortion-related activities.

(d) I support the implementation of these important regulations and will ask the Justice Department to appeal any court order barring implementation. I will also ensure that the Department continues to implement the regulations, to the extent practical, where not enjoined.

(e) To the extent practical, I intend to implement the new rules where not enjoined by court order from doing so.

Question 2: President Bush has said that the Federal Government must establish policies to encourage women with unplanned pregnancies to consider adoption as a life-giving, positive option for their babies. Pregnant adolescents especially need help in sorting through the long-term implications of their choices. Since the Title X family planning program is the largest Federal program specifically targeted at adolescents, this would be an important place to reach adolescents with information about adoption. Do you support allowing Title X projects to provide, at their discretion, adoption services?

Answer: Title X projects are intended to provide services to help individuals determine the number and spacing of their children. This includes a broad range of acceptable and effective methods to limit or enhance fertility, including contraceptive methods amd the management of infertility (adoption may be considered as one method of infertility management). Although Title X does not fund pregnancy care services after pregnancy has been diagnosed, Title X projects are required to facilitate access to prenatal care and social services, including adoption services, that might be needed by a pregnant client to promote her well-being and that of her child.

Question 3: The Adolescent Family Life Demonstration Program is the only Federal program that targets adolescents with a message of abstinence and provides real alternatives to abortion (including the option of adoption). Can we count on your support for full funding of this demonstration program?

Answer: I support continued full funding of the Adolescent Family Life Program. As you may know, President Bush's budget provides for full funding of the program at $10 million. As I stated before the Senate Finance Committee last week, I intend to actively encourage adoption and other alternatives to abortion.

Question 4: Each year, over 1.5 million women undergo abortions. Since the legalization of abortion in 1973, 20 million abortions have been performed in the United States.

On January 9, the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service reported to the President his conclusions on the health effects (both physical and psychological) of abortion for women.

The Surgeon General found documentation that after abortion there can be infertility, a damaged cervix, miscarriage, premature birth, low birth weight babies, etc. But he further noted that conclusive data did not exist due to poorly kept records.

With regard to psychological damage, he concluded that "at this time, the available scientific evidence about the psychological sequelae of abortion simply cannot support either the preconceived beliefs of those pro-life or of those pro-choice." The Surgeon General then recommended to the President that consideration be given to going forward with an appropriate prospective study on women who have undergone abortions.

Given the apparent lack of information and data on the health risks associated with abortion will you direct the Centers for Disease Control to begin to conduct a prospective study on women who have undergone abortions?

Answer: The Centers for Disease Control has looked into the feasibility of a study of the physiological and psychological consequences of childbearing.

At the request of the Surgeon General, CDC convened a meeting of invited consultants on February 29, 1988 to discuss the feasibility of conducting a prospective study.

Although the group members seemed to agree that a prospective study of abortion/childbirth morbidity would be valuable, they also agreed that there are significant problems designing and implementing such a study. The best study design would be methodologically difficult, including enrollment of large numbers of women prior to pregnancy, with frequent follow up until pregnancy, and then post-pregnancy follow up for at least 5 years. New psychological instruments would need to be developed and standardized. I will work with the Director of CDC to explore the practicality of undertaking such a study.

Question 5: This past year, the Senate entertained floor debate on the issue of whether a spouse should have the right to know that his or her spouse has been infected with the AIDS virus. In light of the deadly nature of this disease, do you believe that a spouse should be notified.

Answer: The Department of Health and Human Services has a stated policy to strongly encourage notification of sexual and needle-sharing partners of HIV positive persons as part of the nation's HIV prevention strategy.

This policy was published in CDC's Morbidity and Mortality Weekly Report in August 1987 and was expanded and emphasized in a special report on partner notification published in July 1988.

CDC has notified States that they must have a plan for partner notification as a condition of funding for AIDS prevention programs. As of July 1988, all 50 States, the District of Columbia, Puerto Rico, and the Virgin Islands had a policy of urging HIV positive patients during their counseling sessions to notify their own sex and needle-sharing partners. In addition, 48 States plus the District of Columbia and the Territories provide health department assistance to infected persons in notifying at least some partners if requested.

One of the most important reasons that State and local health departments have not provided more widely available assistance in partner notification is that the necessary resources—both financial and trained personnel—are not available to them.

The Department will work to enhance the effectiveness of programs for notifying the spouse of a person who is infected with HIV. On an ethical basis, there is a compelling argument for such a policy.

The primary purpose of spouse or other partner notification programs is to reduce transmission of HIV in our population. The way in which such programs are structured has a major impact on their effectiveness.

The most desirable way to effect spousal notification is by supporting the infected person in the process of notifying his or her own spouse. Programs, such as those operated by blood banks to counsel seropositive donors, have demonstrated that with sufficient support, most married HIV infected persons are able to and will notify their own spouses. Some may require assistance.

Adoption of such a program at the Federal level still will require implementation and enforcement at the State and local level. We have already demonstrated, however, that with proper support and encouragement, the States and local areas will implement such programs in the absence of Federal legislation, and will expand these programs as resources become available.

Many professional societies, including the American Medical Association and the American Academy of Pediatrics, are considering positions strongly encouraging spouse and sex partner notification. These positions should be encouraged, and the Department should work with these organizations as well as with State Medical Societies and other organizations to develop educational programs for physicians to help them deal with this important issue.

A major concern of all groups is that coercive spousal or partner notification programs not discourage individuals at high risk of HIV infection from participating in counseling and testing or drive them towards participation only in anonymous testing programs in which sex partner identification would not be possible.

Were Congress to pass legislation mandating notification of spouses of HIV infected persons, I would do my best to see that such requirements are complied with. It will be important to consider, in developing any such requirements, the issue of physician liability.

Question 6: There are large discrepancies in the estimates about the actual number of persons who have been infected with the AIDS virus. Some federal health officials estimate the number to be up to 1.5 million. Others place the number closer to 10 million. In June of 1986, President Reagan ordered the Centers for Disease Control to conduct a wide-spread epidemiological study to determine the rate and prevalence of the virus. That study was never begun. Will you direct the CDC to conduct a wide-spread study?

Answer: CDC estimates that the number of persons in the United States infected with HIV is between 1.0 and 1.5 million. This estimate is compatible with data obtained from CDC's "family of HIV seroprevalence surveys," testing of military recruits, results from HIV surveillance in sentinel hospitals, and serosurveys of childbearing women.

In response to President Reagan's directive, CDC has awarded a contract to conduct a national household survey to determine the prevalence of HIV in the general population of the United States. The contract requires the work to be completed in two phases. Phase I is a feasibility study, and Phase II is the national survey. Phase I is currently underway.

If the results of the feasibility study show that it is possible to obtain accurate information at acceptable cost from a household survey of HIV seroprevalence, CDC will recommend that the full national survey be conducted, and CDC will request the funds necessary to conduct that survey. If pilot and pretest results indicate that accurate data cannot be obtained from such a survey, CDC would not recommend proceeding. Accurate information is critical, but a survey which either underestimated or overestimated HIV seroprevalence could impede efforts to plan appropriately for AIDS/HIV control and prevention efforts and necessary services.

Question 7: During the 100th Congress, there was an effort here in the Senate to enact a Federal confidentiality law. That law would have repealed State laws that allow certain individuals to be notified if they will handle or have handled body fluids of an AIDS patient. Do you support enactment of a Federal confidentiality law which does not take into account individuals who come into contact with the AIDS virus?

Answer: I believe that strong confidentiality protections for information about AIDS patients or persons infected with HIV are necessary, and I also believe that any such protections must include provisions for revealing information, under carefully controlled and limited circumstances, when it is necessary to protect the health of others.

I understand that the Department is now studying, at the request of Congress, the State laws that protect the confidentiality of information about AIDS patients and persons with HIV-infection. When that study is completed, and we have a sense of the extent and nature of the protection under State law, I will consider whether Federal legislation is necessary or desirable, or whether this is best left to the States.

Question 8: Do you believe that living embryos, fetuses, and newborns should be protected from biomedical and behavioral research activities that involve greater than minimal risk of suffering, injury, or death unless the activities are designed to benefit the fetus or newborn?

Answer: The Department of Health and Human Services has a longstanding commitment to the protection of all human subjects in research. In addition to the Department's broad regulations protecting research subjects, there are special regulations to guard against exploitation of vulnerable research subjects—especially pregnant women, fetuses and children.

Our regulations prevent the use of living fetuses in research unless there is a therapeutic benefit to the fetus or unless the research poses essentially no risk to the fetus (the test for this latter exception is that the research is conducted on fetuses in utero without reference to whether the fetus is to be carried to term or not). Congress has codified these strong protections into section 489 of the Public Health Service Act.

Question 9: Fetal tissue implants may offer the promise of improving the treatment of a number of intractable afflictions ranging from Parkinson's disease to diabetes. I say may because scientists are still debating the effectiveness of such procedures. While the goal is certainly admirable, the means used to achieve the goal, namely harvesting aborted children, raises numerable ethical and moral questions. Do you believe that an unborn or newborn child who has died as a result of an induced abortion should be used for purposes of research or transplantation?

Answer: Generally, fetal, child, and adult cadavers are now treated largely alike under Federal and most State laws. However, we need to recognize that fetal cadavers, unlike adult and child cadavers, often become available as a result of a volitional act, namely, an induced abortion.

In March 1988, the Assistant Secretary for Health imposed a moratorium on NIH-funded research involving the transplantation of human fetal tissue from induced abortions. This moratorium was put in place in order to give the NIH the opportunity to examine the ethical, legal and scientific ramifications through an independent advisory committee.

I anticipate that it may be a month or so before I formally receive the complete package. At that time, I would expect to review the entire file and consult thoroughly with members of Congress and various participants of the ad hoc panel, among others.

I can assure you that guiding my decision is a strong conviction that no action should be taken that would encourage or promote abortion. It would not be appropriate to encourage women to have an induced abortion for the purpose of obtaining tissue for research.

Question 10: Dr. Sullivan, I have been troubled by reports that the Child Abuse Amendments of 1984, which prohibit discriminatory denial of medical treatment to children born with disabilities, have been inadequately enforced. In particular, I am told that quite a number of the state agencies that get federal funds to enforce that law have policies that on their face are out of compliance with it. Would you commit the Department, under your leadership, to require the state agencies to submit their policies and procedures to HHS? And would you commit the Department to conduct a thorough review of those policies to ensure that any state agency that is found to be out of compliance revises its policies as a condition of receiving federal funding under this program?

Answer: I plan to look into this matter and to explore with the Justice Department and HHS Department personnel what our authorities are with respect to the Child Abuse Amendments of 1984 and the extent to which we are meeting our responsibilities. If there are deficiencies, I will take steps to correct them.

Question 11: I have one further question about the enforcement of this law. The law includes a very detailed standard for what medical treatment must be provided children born with disabilities. It is equally precise about the exceptions—what treatment may legally be withheld. But I am told that there are some who argue that states do not have to enforce this federally defined standard of care to get funding. They say that denials of treatment in violation of this standard of care must be reported to a state agency, but that the agency and the state courts don't actually have to require that treatment be provided in accordance with it—that each state can set its own rules on who will live and who will die. My question is whether it will be the intention of HHS under your leadership to enforce the congressionally defined standard of care, or whether you will fund states whose agencies or courts apply a different standard of care?

Answer: Although I have not personally reviewed the child-abuse legislation and its implementing regulations, I understand they do contain detailed requirements States must follow in dealing with reports of withholding of medically indicated treatment to infants.

I further understand that an Office of Human Development Services task force is looking into (1) whether States have the necessary processes in place to comply with these requirements and (2) what further steps the Department should take to encourage and promote enhanced compliance in this area. After I am confirmed, I will ask HDS to update me on the task force's progress.

Question 12: The absence of reliable data on the number of children in foster care makes it difficult to analyze and monitor the movement of children in and out of substitute care. Will you work with the Office of Management and Budget to put in place a system to enable us to gather foster care data?

Answer: I understand that the Office of Human Development Services is already working with OMB to develop an extensive plan for collection of data covering children in foster care.

Mr. HELMS. I thank all Senators.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, I congratulate President Bush on his selection of Dr. Louis Sullivan to be the new Secretary of Health and Human Services.

Dr. Sullivan is widely respected among faculty members and administration officials in the Nation's colleges and universities. I have heard many complimentary remarks from friends in the higher education community about Dr. Sullivan's intelligence, his capacity for hard work and his pleasant personality.

I enjoyed a recent meeting with Dr. Sullivan in my office and was very favorably impressed with him and his commitment to use his abilities to the fullest in administering the programs of the Department of Health and Human Services.

As a southerner I am proud that our region will be represented in the President's Cabinet by a man who is so highly regarded and so obviously well qualified for the challenge of this important undertaking.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, I rise today to express my support for President Bush's nominee for Secretary of the Department of Health and Human Services. The importance of this position cannot be underestimated. The next Secretary will preside over a department that affects the lives of almost every American. He will be responsible for a department with a budget of more than $400 billion and will be handling some of the most complex issues facing our country today. Dr. Louis Sullivan is an accomplished and thoughtful health care professional who promises to meet successfully the enormous challenges of this position.

The most difficult problems he will face will be in the field of health care. Dr. Sullivan's strong background in this area will prove invaluable at a time when health care costs are soaring and increasing numbers of people are left without insurance to cover the costs of even the most basic care. Dr. Sullivan's experience as a practicing physician and as a medical school administrator give him a depth of understanding of the ethical choices that we as a country will have to make in the future. In his testimony at the Finance Committee hearing, he very thoughtfully discussed the serious dilemma that our country must begin to face—as a result of our advanced medical technology, we are now able to perform more services than we can reasonably afford. His understanding of cost containment issues and the ethical questions involved is strengthened by his insights into the problems of the uninsured. Because of his efforts to improve medical care in underserved areas, he has a deep understanding of the great inequities in our existing system and the importance of addressing these issues within the broader context of the health care system. I have great confidence that Dr. Sullivan will do more than react to the problems before us. As a result of his background and unusual sensitivities, I believe that Dr. Sullivan will be a leader in developing a national policy for our country's health care system. I look forward to working with him on this very important effort.

My brother Dr. William H. Danforth, who is the chancellor of Washington University in St. Louis and a physician himself has known Dr. Sullivan for many years. His comments about the nominee very effectively summarize my own feelings:

Dr. Louis Sullivan's background of accomplishment in medicine, science and education demonstrates that he has the ability to be a strong Secretary of Health and Human Services. Perhaps even more important, he is a man of integrity and conscience who understands and has wrestled with the great questions of justice and of equity. I am certain he will be more than strong; he will be outstanding.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I rise to support the confirmation of Dr. Louis Sullivan as Secretary of the Department of Health and Human Services. While Dr. Sullivan has been nominated for one of the most difficult jobs in Washington, he has assured me and my colleagues on the Senate Finance Committee that he looks forward to the task with commitment and enthusiasm.

As a member of the committee, and as the former chairman of the Health Subcommittee, I am painfully aware of the tremendous challenge we face in providing health and human services to the most deserving of our citizens in a time of severe fiscal constraints upon the Federal budget.

The citizens most dependent upon the programs within the jurisdiction of the Department of Health and Human Services are often the most frail in our society—children, the elderly, and the disabled. As our population ages we face an enormous burden of assuring the soundness of the Social Security system, the fiscal solvency of the Medicare Program, and the safety net of Medicaid coverage for poor elderly.

At the same time we are aware of the serious problems facing children in America today. As our colleage Senator MOYNIHAN often reminds us, one in five American children lives in poverty. Often these children do not have access to basic health care services. We must find viable ways to invest in the health and welfare of the Nation's children or we will pay a tremendous price for our failure to do so—both in fiscal costs and in human costs.

I commend Dr. Sullivan for his willingness to take on this great task and pledge my support to work with him to protect the important programs of the Department of Health and Human Services. We will be called upon to make difficult choices. We may have disagreements about those choices. But we must keep in mind that we share a common goal—to provide access to health care and other critical human services for all of our citizens.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, there is no department of Government that has the capacity of impacting on as many lives as does the Department of Health and Human Services. From the conduct of basic biomedical research to the financing of disability benefits, the Department deals with those in the dawn of life and those nearing the sunset of their days.

Lou Sullivan is uniquely qualified to lead this vast agency and represent its many constituencies.

Mr. Chairman, there are huge problems facing America today; AIDS; the skyrocketing cost of medical care; the steadily disappearing rural hospital; an unacceptable level of infant mortality; the need for long-term care; the need to break the welfare cycle; the need to reassure our elderly of our support; and the continuing need to break down physical and attitudinal barriers that keep America's disabled out of the mainstream.

Lou Sullivan is a proven administrator who has dedicated his career to excellence—not only in the development of a high quality school of medicine, but also in his teaching, research, and in outreach to every segment of society.

He is a man of strong intellect who can master both the issues and the bureaucracy.

He is a man of strong conviction who can take the lead in achieving the kinder, gentler Nation President Bush envisions.

He is also a man who can lead others and provide the direction and support needed to energize the human resources available at HHS.

He brings the sensitivity of one who has cared for patients and the hardheadedness of a CEO who has built a medical school.

President Bush has made a quality pick for HHS, he deserves our support.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I support the nomination of Dr. Louis Wade Sullivan to be Secretary of Health and Human Services.

The Department of Health and Human Services, perhaps more than any other Federal agency, touches the lives of each and every one of our citizens. Aside from administering the Social Security, Medicare, and Medicaid Programs, the Department also is responsible for administering many of the programs that provide support services to families. Administering these programs is a huge job, but a job that is vital if we are to address the issues of drug abuse, adoption assistance, foster care, child abuse prevention, day care, and many other of the problems facing us as a society today.

Of equal importance, are the health programs administered by the Department through the Public Health Service, the National Institutes of Health, and the Centers for Disease Control. Good health care and prevention of disease are vital to the well-being of our people. Cardiovascular diseases, such as stroke and heart attack, are the leading causes of death in this country, followed by cancer. Today, although we have conquered many of the diseases of the past that so ravaged our country—such as polio and smallpox—too much still remains to be done. A great deal is yet to be learned about occupational diseases, and everyone is concerned about the growing number of AIDS cases, and diseases associated with the elderly, such as Alzheimer's disease.

Access to quality health care is also an issue that must be addressed. Unfortunately, there is a shortage of medical doctors in many areas of our country, and rural hospitals in many States are closing. West Virginia is not unaffected by these problems.

A chain is only as strong as its weakest link. So is our Nation strong, as long as our people flourish. It is essential that we maintain our Federal commitment to bettering the lives of those suffering from disease, and in finding solutions to those unique problems that confront our families today.

Dr. Sullivan has stated his strong interest in biomedical research, and in programs, to assist the disadvantaged, our children and the elderly.

I, too, have a strong interest in seeing that the Federal commitment remains strong, and I hope that Dr. Sullivan will work with the Congress. Dr. Sullivan is well-respected, and I believe that his background in the field of health, education, and public service will be an asset in meeting the demands that will be placed on him as Secretary of Health and Human Services. As previously indicated, I support Dr. Sullivan's nomination.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I strongly support the nomination of Dr. Louis W. Sullivan to become Secretary of Health and Human Services.

Dr. Sullivan's credentials have already become familiar to us all. As the president and former dean of Morehouse School of Medicine in Atlanta, GA, as a former professor of medicine at Morehouse and at Boston University, and in his numerous other professional positions, Dr. Sullivan has a clear record of accomplishment and achievement.

What is less well known is the breadth and depth of Dr. Sullivan's experiences. Dr. Sullivan has served on numerous occasions as a consultant to the National Institutes of Health, including the National Cancer Institute, and has served both the Veterans' Administration and the Food and Drug Administration in an advisory capacity. Dr. Sullivan has also been involved with such organizations as the National Leukemia Society, the Association for Academic Minority Physicians, and the National Academy of Sciences, to name only a few.

In short, Dr. Sullivan has had a career filled with knowledge and experience in many of the areas of medicine and health policy which he will face as Secretary of Health and Human Services. But the greatest knowledge, and the most impressive credentials would mean little without the vision which Dr. Sullivan has shown throughout his career. As a leader in establishing Morehouse School of Medicine, Dr. Sullivan has shown a commitment to and understanding of the needs of minority students, and has found a way, at Morehouse, to turn an important idea into a successful reality.

It is my hope that Dr. Sullivan will, as Secretary, turn that same creative energy toward a new and massive problem: the health care and human services needs of the American people. More than ever, vision is needed. And more than ever, fiscal and attitudinal barriers exist which hinder change. Dr. Sullivan is given today the challenge of doing better than the best that can be done, because the American people have great needs, and those needs can wait no longer.

While the scope of the issues facing Dr. Sullivan is staggering, including Medicare, Medicaid, Social Security, programs affecting children, the elderly, and the disabled, and the health and human service needs of a nation, I share Dr. Sullivan's view that health promotion and disease prevention programs should receive a high priority in the years to come. As a cost-efficient means of improving both the quality of life and the health of the American people, we could not do better than to give people access to health information, health care, and a chance at a better life.

I look forward to working with Dr. Sullivan and my colleagues on the committee in achieving compassionate and fiscally responsible solutions to the complicated and important problem of how best to deliver health care and human services now, and in the years to come.

Mr. HARKIN. Mr. President, I rise today in strong support of the confirmation of Dr. Louis Sullivan for Secretary of Health and Human Services.

I have been impressed with his understanding of the critical issues in health care today, particularly the need to control escalating costs while ensuring both access and quality in health care services for all Americans, especially those who are poor, elderly, disabled, or disadvantaged.

I was also heartened to hear from Dr. Sullivan that he shares the President's commitment to ensuring that Americans with disabilities take their rightful place in the economic mainstream of society. In that context, I look forward to working with him on the Americans With Disabilities Act, so that together we can bring down the barrier of discrimination that denies too many of our disabled citizens the opportunities that should be theirs as a matter of law.

He has also expressed both publicly and privately his sensitivity to the health care needs of rural America. We must work cooperatively to address these critical health care needs—because not to address them will result in severe economic consequences for all America. I hope to see the Department of Health and Human Services, under Dr. Sullivan's direction, take a leadership role in this effort.

Finally, the issues of prevention of disease and morbidity must continue to occupy a preeminent place in our battle to improve the health of our citizens. We must be aggressive in pursuing our commitment to biomedical research, reducing infant mortality, preventing the ingestion of pesticides, and improving the health and safety of the workplace.

In my capacity as chairman of the Labor, Health and Human Services, and Education Appropriations Subcommittee, I look forward to exploring these issues in depth with Dr. Sullivan at his April 10 hearing regarding the HHS budget.

In closing, I would like to express my confidence that with Dr. Sullivan as the Secretary of Health and Human Services, the challenges that confront us today will be dealt with in a compassionate, thoughtful and responsible way. I am pleased to vote for his confirmation today.

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak in support of President Bush's selection to be Secretary of the Department of Health and Human Services.

The Department of Health and Human Services faces some of the most significant challenges of our society and holds within it the promise of creating for all Americans a better more fulfilling life.

It is in the programs of this Department that President Bush, Dr. Sullivan, and Congress will be called upon to make the tough choices and decisions that will make this Nation kinder and gentler.

As Secretary of HHS, Dr. Sullivan will be called upon to advise the President on health, welfare, and income security policies and programs.

Through its five program divisions including the Social Security Administration, Health Care Financing Agency, Office of Human Development, Public Health Service, and the Family Support Administration the programs and policies of HHS manage to touch just about every American during their lifetime.

With an annual budget of approximately $400 billion, HHS administers the third largest budget in the world, behind only the budgets of the United States and the Soviet Union.

Dr. Sullivan has an impressive résumé and brings considerable qualifications to the job. Dr. Sullivan is a graduate of Moorhouse College in Atlanta. He received his medical degree, cum laude, from Boston University. From there he became an instructor in medicine at the Harvard Medical School and an assistant professor of medicine at the New Jersey College of Medicine.

More than any of the other remarkable achievements of Dr. Sullivan's life—and there are many—I believe the founding of the medical education program at Moorhouse College in 1975 is his finest. Its development into an independent program in 1981 shows not only the deep commitment to a better life for all Americans that Dr. Sullivan holds but also his ability to make that commitment become a reality.

Mr. President, I come before you today with a spirit of great optimism for this Department. We are of course faced with some formidable problems in the health care field that in many ways are the results of our many successes. People are living longer than ever before and are enjoying levels of health far beyond those dreamed possible only a decade ago.

We have the most technologically advanced health care system in the world and exellent, well-trained physicians, nurses, and other health professionals.

Yet the benefits of this system are unevenly distributed and some lack access to even basic services. Moreover this is true even though we are spending more than any other nation on health services.

Why then am I optimistic? Because the convergence of leadership in Congress and in the Bush administration, coupled with recognition among health care providers that change is essential and eminent, provides an unparalleled opportunity for us to shape the health care system of the future.

We need a system that is kinder and gentler and provides access to cost effective services for all of our citizens, young and old, urban and rural, rich and poor.

I do not wish to underplay the difficulties which we will encounter or the obstacles we must overcome because they are formidable.

But with the leadership of Dr. Sullivan, together we can deal with these issues and craft a more responsive yet more cost effective health care system for the future.

Because of the preeminence of the issues facing this Department, there were many of us who wanted to see a Secretary with "inside the beltway" Washington experience, who already had one foot in the door ready to tackle the challenges before us.

However, I believe Dr. Sullivan has proven to me, to other Members of the Senate, and to the country that he has sound understanding of the issues and of the awesome challenges before him and that he is committed to working with the President, the Congress, and the people to see that the responsibilities are carried out.

I look forward to the fresh ideas, the new energy, and insight Dr. Sullivan will bring to this position.

If I could heed one note of caution it would be to point out the importance for him as he carries out the vast duties of Secretary of HHS to not lose sight of the overall picture.

He should have a full understanding of the issues facing the Department and work with Members of Congress and others in accomplishing this goal. I believe he will do this without losing sight of the traditional, basic values that have driven him to accomplish the things he has.

I was pleased to hear Dr. Sullivan state before the Finance Committee that he has "developed the habit of consultation—of seeking the wisdom and experience of others, exploring many alternatives, and sometimes playing devils advocate in order to understand all sides of an issue." This will be an important part of his job as Secretary of HHS. If we are to meet the formidable tasks ahead we must work together in developing sound policies to the problems facing this Nation.

I think it is interesting to note, that it is the nomination of the so-called Washington outsider that is moving smoothly through the Senate and it is the nomination of the Washington insider that is facing difficulties.

This Nation faces many serious challenges ahead. There are no more easy solutions. Options will be limited and decisions will be tough.

But again, I do not look upon this as a burden, but as new challenges and opportunities. It is when this country is in crisis, that it proves itself worthy of being the superpower that it is.

As we move forward, we must continue to change our attitude about how we measure a great society—to measure a country's greatness not by the amount of money we spend on various programs, but by the amount of opportunity we provide every member of society.

This is the type of thinking that was reflected in the passage of the welfare reform legislation lead by the distinguished Senator from New York and the type of thinking that will allow us to move forward in other areas including, coverage for the uninsured, greater employment opportunities for the disabled, and strengthening family life and family values.

Mr. President, I believe we have a candidate that is deeply committed to improving the quality of life for all Americans, who will provide fresh insight to the challenges before us, and has the ability to work with others to accomplish common objectives.

I commend President Bush on his selection, and I hope all of you will join with me in support of his nomination.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I rise with pride today to support President Bush's nomination of Dr. Louis Sullivan to be this Nation's new Secretary of Health and Human Services.

The Department of Health and Human Services [HHS] is responsible for the largest component of the Federal budget, including such important programs as Social Security, Medicare, and Medicaid.

As my colleagues are aware, Federal spending on human resources has exceeded national defense every year since 1971. HHS controls most of that allocation.

In fact, the budget that Dr. Sullivan will oversee, a budget of around $400 billion, is larger than the budgets of all of the world's independent nations except perhaps the Soviet Union. The "World Fact Book" (CIA) for 1987, for example, lists the total government expenditures for the United Kingdom at $314.5 billion; France at $217.5 billion; and Germany at $121.3 billion.

In his new position, Dr. Sullivan will have a critical responsibility for helping to shape much of this Nation's human resource spending, spending that touches the lives of nearly every American.

As Dr. Sullivan told the Committee on Labor and Human Resources: "The commitment to serve is the unifying force at HHS" and its 114,000 employees nationwide.

HHS policy and spending have a direct impact on such important issues as the homeless, rural hospitals, AIDS victims, Indian health, medical research, mental health research, and health care for the poor and elderly. Key block grants from the Department of Health and Human Services also will have a direct bearing on the success or failure of our new war on drugs.

Many of the scientific breakthroughs that we hope will come soon in the study of the human genome, schizophrenia, and the AIDS virus will occur in HHS laboratories and through HHS grants.

Better biomedical research and treatments for mental illness will have impact in every nation looking for better ways to treat its victims of AIDS, mental illness, and even heart disease.

The President's nominee for Secretary of HHS reminded the Senate Committee on Labor and Human Resources that his notion of service will not forget "our continued assault against cancer, heart disease, diabetes, arthritis, and the other disorders afflicting our citizens."

There is no Federal department where this commitment to service can have greater potential for affecting the lives of millions of citizens directly.

I am optimistic that Dr. Sullivan will be confirmed by the full Senate. I therefore take this opportunity to emphasize a very important and fairly new initiative in the National Institute of Mental Health [NIMH]. Under the leadership of Dr. Lewis Judd, the National Advisory Mental Health Council has produced a national plan for schizophrenia research.

I commend this excellent plan to Dr. Sullivan for his early review and support. I believe firmly that this blueprint for the future of mental health deserves the Secretary's full support. I also believe that such support will produce many rewards for the Department. More importantly, it offers hope for the millions who suffer from this dreaded disease.

Dr. Sullivan has also stressed his commitment to fighting drugs in our society. He has reminded us that he understands how the problem of drugs "gnaws at the fiber of our families and the stability of our social structure." He has promised to "work long and hard * * * in doing all I can to halt this terrible epidemic."

I will support his every effort to stop this terrible epidemic on every possible front.

Regarding the Nation's health, Dr. Sullivan is committed to rural and inner city health needs. He has called for proper and dignified treatment to improve "the relatively poor health status of our minority citizens: Black, Hispanic, Native American and those others who have yet to fully realize the American dream." They will, he said, "be of special concern to me."

Mr. President, President Bush is to be commended for nominating Dr. Sullivan to take on the challenges that will make us a "kinder and gentler nation."

Dr. Sullivan is a graduate of Morehouse College (B.S.) and Boston University (M.D.). He was an instructor in medicine at Harvard Medical School, professor of medicine and physiology at Boston University School of Medicine, and the founder and first dean and president of the Morehouse School of Medicine. His commitment, energy, and contributions to academic medicine are well known among his peers.

Mr. President, Dr. Louis Sullivan will bring that same energy and commitment to the leadership post of the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services.

He will make a great Secretary of HHS, and I am proud to cast my vote for his confirmation.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I would like to lend my strong support to the confirmation of Dr. Louis Sullivan as Secretary of the Department of Health and Human Services.

We have plenty of difficult problems for Dr. Sullivan to deal with here in Washington. I would like to highlight one area that needs a strong advocate at the Department of Health and Human Services.

The delivery of health care in rural America has reached a crisis stage. One-fourth of all Americans live in rural areas. But they're older and have less resources than those in urban areas. Thirty percent of the Nation's seniors who are eligible for Social Security and Medicare, and 38 percent of those living below the poverty line, live outside of cities.

Often Government programs, particularly those designed to bring efficiency to public policy, are created without an understanding of their impact on rural America. Dr. Sullivan's own area of expertise, health care, offers good examples.

Rural hospitals are in trouble. Medicare prospective payment may be efficient when a 17-bed hospital in the middle of New York City or Chicago is forced to close. But close a hospital of that size in Roundup, MT, and you have eliminated reasonable access to health care for thousands of Americans and disrupted an important foundation of the local economy.

It is not just hospitals. It is also doctors. I am told by many of my colleagues who live in cities that they have a glut of physicians, too many of them. In Montana, over half of the counties are having a hard time trying to recruit a single primary care doctor. No wonder, when a doctor takes call 24 hours a day, and then discovers that Medicare pays him or her 30 percent less than a colleague living in a city. This just isn't right.

Dr. Sullivan will be assuming tremendous responsibility for the health and well-being of our Nation's citizens. I am impressed that he has expressed a willingness to learn more about those areas of this country that he has not visited, and that he has agreed to come to Montana. I look forward to showing him firsthand the problems that frontier hospitals and doctors have in providing health care to rural America.

I have asked Dr. Sullivan that he remember that in rural America, doctors anchor hospitals, hospitals anchor local economies, and economies anchor people. Any break in the chain can destroy lives—destroy whole communities.

I look forward to working with Dr. Sullivan to solve some of these very difficult problems.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Mr. President, I rise today in support of the nomination of Louis W. Sullivan, M.D., for the office of Secretary of Health and Human Services. As Dr. Sullivan emphasized in his statement before the Finance Committee last week, this Department "touches the lives of Americans wherever they are most vulnerable—from the beginning of life, through health and sickness, from the foods we eat to the medicines we take, to the care of the elderly and disabled." I hope and trust that Dr. Sullivan will hold firm in his commitment to ensuring the health and welfare of all people in our country with the resolve he has demonstrated throughout his distinguished career.

Formerly the president of the Morehouse School of Medicine in Atlanta, GA, which he helped found and had headed since 1975, Dr. Sullivan is viewed as an accomplished physician, a committed academic, and a successful administrator. He has been particularly active in championing research on health problems facing minorities and takes pride in the record of Morehouse School of Medicine for sending scores of young minority physicians into medically underserved rural areas and inner cities.

Mr. President, the challenges facing the Secretary of Health and Human Services today are gargantuan, especially in light of the budget deficit. The Department has a $400 billion budget, which is larger than that of but a few major nations. Dr. Sullivan has acknowledged the immensity of this role and has stated his intention to bring a new spirit of kindness and compassion to the Department.

I heartily concur with Dr. Sullivan's priorities: containing escalating medical costs without sacrificing quality care for all, emphasizing health promotion, sustaining and improving programs like Head Start and Aid to Families with Dependent Children, addressing children's health issues, bolstering biomedical research, and focusing our resources on the poor, the disadvantaged, and the neglected in our society. As a member of the Finance and Labor and Human Resources Committees, I look forward to working with Dr. Sullivan in these endeavors.

Mr. President, I urge that my colleagues do confirm the nomination of Dr. Sullivan.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time has expired. Under the previous order, the hour of 1 p.m. having arrived, the Senate will now proceed to vote on the nomination. DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

NOMINATION OF ADM. JAMES D. WATKINS, OF CALIFORNIA, TO BE SECRETARY OF ENERGY

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the clerk will report the nomination.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Adm. James D. Watkins, of California, to be Secretary of Energy.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum without the time being charged to either side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Debate on the nomination is limited to 20 minutes to be equally divided and controlled by Senators JOHNSTON and MCCLURE.

The Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, I am pleased to bring before the Senate President Bush's nomination for Adm. James D. Watkins to be Secretary of Energy. The Commission on Energy and Natural Resources, just this morning, cleared this nomination by a vote of 19 to nothing. And I would like the RECORD to show, as I have just indicated, that we are, first of all, bipartisan; second, unanimous; and, third, very expeditious in the way that we are dealing with this nomination.

Perhaps the reason for that is that James D. Watkins, former Chief of Naval Operations, distinguished American, deserves that kind of treatment. He has that kind of record. He is a man of that substance and that reputation.

Mr. President, the most important message of this nomination is that we as a government are going to treat energy with the importance it deserves.

After 8 years of neglect, perhaps we can begin to put our energy house in order.

After 8 years, perhaps we can acknowledge that there is a Federal role and responsibility for energy.

Perhaps we can admit that accomplishments in energy are not automatically suspect because the Federal Government is involved.

The President has sent us a highly qualified, committed nominee for Secretary of Energy. He has announced his intention to nominate Henson Moore, widely respected in the field of energy policy, to be Deputy Secretary. These nominations must be followed by the naming of qualified, committed people for the important subordinate positions in the Department—Director of the Nuclear Waste Program, Assistant Secretary for Defense Programs, Assistant Secretary for Environment Safety and Health, the head of the Uranium Enrichment Program, to name only a few.

The quality of the people in these positions is very, very important for Admiral Watkins' success as Secretary.

He will need people he can rely on in these positions. The Energy Department faces an array of problems of unprecedented magnitude. Solution of these problems will call for strong, active, professional leadership and a substantial commitment of resources, things often missing in the last administration.

DOE WEAPONS COMPLEX

Admiral Watkins' first priority at DOE is restoring the creditability of the Department's nuclear weapons complex.

This is a very tricky job. On one hand, he must be an advocate of safety and cleaning up the environment. He must tell people what he plans to do. He must let them comment on his plans, and he must respond to their comments. He must be open, candid, and above suspicion. He must have credibility with the public.

On the other hand, he should remember that there are some people he is never going to satisfy. We have spent hundreds of millions of dollars on civilian nuclear reactors in a futile attempt to satisfy professional nuclear critics. They aren't satisfied. They never will be.

He must make safety his priority. He must be sensitive to safety, he must manage with safety in mind, he must go the extra mile for safety. But he does not have a charter to throw away hundreds of millions of taxpayers' dollars just because of a minority that does not understand or care about real safety.

The proper course is to bring the best scientific and engineering minds available to analyze what has to be done, assure that the plan will pass review by those who know the most about the science involved, establish a scientific consensus that the plan is responsible and adequate to protect the public health and safety, and then stick to it.

The Committee on Energy and Natural Resources will do what it can to help build support for a responsible plan that is based on sound scientific analysis and engineering judgment.

ATTENTION NEEDED TO OTHER ISSUES

The problems of the defense complex will get the media attention. However, Admiral Watkins must not let this distract him from several very important nondefense issues that require urgent action by the Department.

OIL

By far the most serious nondefense issue is the state of our oil supplies. Oil is the most important energy source in any national energy policy.

Half our energy consumption is oil. In some important cases, such as transportation, it is impossible or too expensive to use fuels other than oil.

Way too much oil is imported from the Middle East. One look at what is going on there today should be sufficient to see the folly of over dependence on this source of oil.

In 1988 we imported 42 percent of our oil. Three years ago we imported 31 percent. The bulk of that growth has come from OPEC.

Our domestic production of oil is falling at the fastest rate in modern times. We lost a million barrels per day of production between 1986 and 1988. Lower 48 oil production today is the lowest it has been since 1950.

The President has proposed some tax incentives for oil production. That is all right as far as it goes. But it does not go far, and it costs the Treasury money. Senator BENTSEN and I intend to reintroduce our oil import fee legislation. An import fee not only boosts domestic production, it also reduces the deficit.

We need to get Henson Moore confirmed. I cannot think of a better person to help create an oil policy that matches the dangers we face from our growing oil dependence. We need to act now.

NUCLEAR WASTE

The nuclear waste program has not had a director since 1987. The Department needs a top-quality person in this job now.

There is tremendous exposure in this program—politically and financially. Moreover, having an effective civilian radioactive waste program is essential to the success of efforts to clean up defense radioactive wastes. The defense high-level radioactive wastes will be placed in these facilities.

URANIUM ENRICHMENT

We urgently need to reform the DOE Uranium Enrichment Program, or DOE will lose many of its domestic utility customers. We have already lost most of the world market.

Reform requires legislation. Last Congress we passed legislation in the Senate to deal with this problem. We will need the administration's help in this Congress, especially in the House.

ADVANCED REACTORS

The DOE program to develop the next generation of nuclear reactors needs attention. The current program lacks focus and is facing rising facility costs.

We need to demonstrate to the public that modular reactors with passive safety features can be designed, financed, constructed, and licensed in a reasonable fashion. DOE's program is supposed to do this, but it is not.

We simply cannot do without nuclear power if we hope to deal with electricity demand growth and the challenge of global warming.

SCIENCE FACILITIES

The previous administration proposed many more scientific facilities than could possibly be funded in the current budget climate. The superconducting super collider is only the most visible part of the problem.

Priorities must be established. The science community seems to recognize this. DOE's leadership in matching what we want with what we can afford is essential.

ACID RAIN

President Bush has declared that the administration will support legislation dealing with acid rain. Clean coal technology should be part of this effort.

GLOBAL CLIMATE CHANGE

The growing concern over the possibilities of global climate change has important implications for energy policy and energy use. DOE should be a significant participant in all research and development programs and policy studies dealing with this issue.

Mr. President, I am very pleased that Admiral Watkins is going to be in this position of Secretary of Energy which is, perhaps, the most daunting challenge that we have ever given to anybody in the Cabinet, in terms of building and refurbishing plant and equipment and cleanup of toxic waste, outside of wartime, at any time in the history of this country. He is, indeed, deserving of all the tremendous accolades he has received.

I reserve the remainder of my time and yield to Senator ADAMS such time as he may require.

Mr. ADAMS. I thank the chairman of the committee. I rise in support of this nomination.

We are very pleased to have a person in this admiral who is not only experienced but is a person dedicated to moving forward with many of the waste problems, as the chairman has said. We look forward to working with him.

Mr. President, I rise today to speak in support of the confirmation of Adm. James Watkins as Secretary of Energy. I have reviewed the admiral's record. I have met with him and with Deputy Secretary-designate W. Henson Moore to discuss the major problem areas within the Department as they effect the State of Washington and national security policies. I am impressed with what I have found.

I want to report to my colleagues and the citizens of my State that I found Admiral Watkins most candid and forthright about the difficult challenges he faces in his newest service to the Nation at the Department of Energy. First and foremost, the admiral recognizes that in addition to the myriad of physical and budget problems facing the Department—especially in terms of environmental, safety, and modernization requirements at its nuclear weapons production complex—the management structure and philosophy of the Department needs some major renovation. This reform is long overdue and as a former Cabinet Secretary who has struggled through a reorganization of a major Federal agency, the need for internal reform may well be the most daunting task the new Secretary will face.

Second, Mr. President, the State of Washington has recently completed a long and difficult set of negotiations with the Department of Energy, the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency, and the Justice Department to develop a comprehensive cleanup plan for the Department of Energy's Hanford Reservation. The resulting agreement, which is expected to become effective within the next 2 months, will provide a detailed blueprint for cleaning up more than 1,000 waste sites at Hanford.

This agreement is an historic turning point in the relationship between the State of Washington and the Department of Energy. Without litigation, in a spirit of good faith, the Department of Energy and the State, under Gov. Booth Gardner's leadership, have worked out a new program for cleanup. In the process, the negotiations have ushered in what many of us hope is a new era of cooperation between our State and the Department of Energy and the Federal Government. Senator MARK HATFIELD and I both discussed the importance of this agreement with Admiral Watkins including the need to provide additional funding in the current fiscal year to support this agreement. I am pleased that this additional funding has been made available and that the Hanford agreement has been reached.

I want to commend the admiral for his understanding and support for environmental restoration as a Department priority. I look forward to working with him on this endeavor and on the many other problems facing both the State of Washington and the Department as a whole. These include issues as diverse as the Bonneville Power Administration, energy conservation, basic science research, and new missions for the fast flux test facility. All are vital to the Nation and to my State. All will require a new openness, a new level of cooperation with affected States and interests, and a new relationship with the Congress that has not been in evidence in past practices at the Department of Energy.

Admiral Watkins faces a daunting task, but his tenure comes at a point in time when the Department of Energy is truly at a crossroads. I wish him well and urge my colleagues to support his confirmation.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. President, on March 1, 1989, the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources favorably reported the nomination of Adm. James D. Watkins to be Secretary of Energy by a unanimous vote. I look forward to working with Admiral Watkins toward what I believe to be our common goal—the development and implementation of a comprehensive national energy policy to insure an energy-independent, healthy, and safe future for America.

Mr. President, I am greatly concerned with a general lack of national energy awareness and the absence of a true comprehensive national energy policy. Today, the United States is more dependent on foreign oil than it was prior to the 1973 Arab oil embargo. Domestic oil production has fallen and consumption has increased. If the current trend continues, we could be dependent on imports for two-thirds of our oil by as early as 1995. I am deeply concerned by this prospect, for what is at stake is our economic security, our foreign policy flexibility, and our defense preparedness. Such vulnerability must not be allowed to occur. The cornerstone of our present strategy for dealing with energy emergencies is the strategic petroleum reserve. However, even though the reserve is growing in absolute terms, due to budget constraints and rising consumption, we are down to 90 days of protection from a peak of 115 days in 1985. If the current trend continues, by 1995 the SPR will provide only 60 days equivalent of net imports.

Upon confirmation, Admiral Watkins will be faced with a wide spectrum of problems to solve and challenges to meet at the Department of Energy. The development and pursuit of a long-term, comprehensive, and consensus-based strategy to foster the efficient use of energy and energy production consistent with the protection of national environmental values should be a priority. The Department of Energy also is facing a great many problems and difficulties relating to the current capability for meeting the Department of Defense's strategic materials requirements; the construction of the two new production reactors should be undertaken as soon as possible. In addition, there is growing concern about the adequacy of our Nation's overall nuclear waste disposal efforts. This concern includes both the disposal of civilian nuclear waste and the adequacy of environmental restoration efforts at the various natural laboratory sites.

I raised certain concerns of particular importance to me with the Secretary-designate; and from his responses I am satisfied he will attempt to address these concerns to the best of his ability. I look forward to working with him in solving these very real and very serious problems that are facing the Department of Energy.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting Admiral Watkins' confirmation as Secretary of Energy.

Mr. President, the most obvious question that the Secretary of the Department of Energy must confront is the widely publicized problems with respect to environmental conditions at the various defense production complexes that are operated by the Department of Energy.

While that is and must be very much on our minds, there may be an even more important question that this country must deal with, and that is the question of our growing dependence upon imported oil for the essential needs of our country and the associated long-range problems of how we deal with the combustion of fossil fuels to produce energy.

Those are less in the headlines today, but not less important questions. I am certain the President would want it known something that is relatively obvious in his nomination; that having selected a man with the background of administrative skills that Admiral Watkins has already demonstrated in more than one area of his career, it should be obvious that the President is very much concerned about the public perceptions of problems at defense production facilities and wants the public to understand that they are going to be dealt with. He selected a very strong and very knowledgeable man to deal with those problems.

The only reason I take any time at all today is to underscore that point, but also to make the other point that while that perhaps preoccupies us because of the seriousness of the problem and its presence in the headlines, it is not the only problem with which this country must deal in the Department of Energy.

Mr. President, I yield to the distinguished Senator from South Carolina 2 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina is recognized.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I rise today in support of the nomination of retired Adm. James D. Watkins to be the new Secretary of Energy. Admiral Watkins is well-qualified for this position, and I am confident that he will fulfill his duties with the same ability and integrity he displayed throughout his military career.

Born on March 7, 1927, in Alhambra, CA, Admiral Watkins graduated from the U.S. Naval Academy in 1949, the Naval Submarine School in 1951, and the Naval Postgraduate School in 1958.

This fine nominee's record in the Navy is long and distinguished. From 1967-69, he served as executive officer on the U.S.C. Long Beach, the Navy's first nuclear-powered surface ship. Later, Admiral Watkins became Chief of Naval Personnel from 1975-78. In 1978, he was named Commander of the Mediterranean 6th Fleet, and subsequently became Commander in Chief of the Pacific Fleet, a position he held until 1982. At that time, Admiral Watkins became Chief of Naval Operations and served in that position until his retirement in 1986.

After his retirement, Admiral Watkins played a key role as Chairman of the President's Commission on AIDS in 1987. Admiral Watkins was widely acclaimed for his leadership as Chairman of the Commission.

As a representative of the State which is home to the Savannah River Plant, I have a particularly keen interest in the policies of the Department of Energy and the new Secretary-designate.

His solid background in the field of nuclear energy will serve Admiral Watkins well as the chief spokesman for the Department of Energy. In 1958, he studied at the Oak Ridge School of Reactor Technology and in 1966-67, he studied at the Atomic Energy Commission's Division of Naval Reactors. In addition, he previously served as an administrative assistant at the Atomic Energy Commission. His experience and working knowledge of nuclear energy matters are irrefutable and will provide a sound foundation for him as Secretary of Energy.

I strongly support the nomination of Admiral Watkins and I urge my colleagues to move swiftly to approve this very able and dedicated nominee.

In closing, I want to say he has a reputation of being a man of character, a man of courage, a man of capacity, and a man of compassion. He has all the good qualities. He is a very able man. I feel he will make an outstanding Secretary of Energy.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator from Louisiana yield me 2 minutes?

Mr. JOHNSTON. I yield the Senator 2 minutes.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the Senator.

Mr. PRESIDENT, I am pleased to have the opportunity to support the nomination of retired Adm. James D. Watkins to be the Secretary of Energy.

Admiral Watkins has had a distinguished career. He rose through the ranks of the U.S. Navy to serve as chief of naval operations for 4 years, prior to his retirement in 1986. He has won acclaim for his leadership in the difficult position of Chairman of the Presidential Commission on AIDS.

Admiral Watkins is committed to forging an "integrated energy strategy." We have lacked a national energy policy for the last 8 years, and we need to establish a policy that will work. I believe that, as the Secretary of Energy, he will work to ensure that our environmental policies are not put on a collision course with our economic policies.

In his confirmation hearing, as well as in a meeting with me, Admiral Watkins stated that he intends to play a major role in the administration's development of clean air and acid rain policies. I am pleased that he will do so. An engineer by training, Admiral Watkins understands the importance of not allowing policy to get ahead of technology. He understands that coal is our most abundant domestic energy resource, and he has stated that the deployment of clean coal technologies is one of his greatest personal interests.

The issues that the Department of Energy must address in the coming years are complex and diverse. I support the nomination of Adm. James D. Watkins to be Secretary of Energy, and I believe that he will bring the skills, the enthusiasm, and the dedication needed to set and implement policies to address these issues.

I yield the floor.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, today the Senate is considering the nomination of one of the most important Cabinet positions in the Bush administration, the Secretary of Energy.

Three unique crises face the Department today—an alarming and potentially devastating level of imports of foreign oil, unprecedented levels of ozone resulting from the emissions from fossil fuel burning and the attendant need to research new technologies, and the Nation's crippled nuclear weapons programs.

OIL IMPORTS

Mr. President, it has been nearly a decade since Americans have focused attention on the source of our oil. Like so many problems we experience, it appears that calamity must be thrust upon us before actions are taken to keep our economy strong and our Nation secure.

But we are once again being lured into a false sense that gasoline comes from pumps in an endless supply. This past January the United States imported over 50 percent of the crude oil which we consumed. Those who were here in 1979, during the Iranian oil crisis, might recall that Iran supplied only 5 percent of our supply at the time and that our overall imports were much less.

Yet today, with imports up and domestic production declining, there seems to be little concern.

Without a doubt, a national energy policy, one based on increasing domestic production, must be formulated and implemented. Our domestic oil and gas industry has been devastated, along with support industries and communities in the oil patch.

Today's policy of blindly relying on others to supply our energy is dangerous, unacceptable and damaging to the U.S. economy.

EMISSIONS, NEW TECHNOLOGY

A second problem facing the Department is twofold. An increase in the level of ozone produced from the burning of fossil fuels, combined with the need to develop new methods of using these fuels more cleanly and technology for switching to alternate sources of energy.

Just yesterday, an official with the Environmental Protection Agency testified before a congressional committee that, in 1988, ozone levels—the chief culprit in the so-called greenhouse effect—were the worst in a decade. Advances in clean coal technology as well as in using such alternate sources such as ethanol, nuclear, nitrogen, solar, and geothermal must be made to continue fueling our country into the future, while protecting our environment.

NUCLEAR WEAPONS PROGRAMS

The issue before the Department of Energy which has received the most attention is probably the Nuclear Weapons Program. Here, three areas must be addressed on an urgent basis. First, at this time the United States has no operating facility which produces radioactive tritium gas which is a vital component in the vast majority of our nuclear arsenal.

Second, a comprehensive indexing and disposal method must be undertaken to clean up the waste from DOE facilities around the country. And third, research on new warheads must continue to keep pace with the rapidly changing makeup of this ultimate deterrent.

ADMIRAL WATKINS

Fortunately, Mr. President, the nominee before us today has the ability to lead in all of these areas. Adm. James D. Watkins has a distinguished and decorated career in nuclear reactors and scientific research. Additionally, his service on several boards and commissions attest to his ability to quickly master the details of issues in which it might appear he has had little experience.

For example, little more than 1 year ago, Admiral Watkins was appointed Chairman of the Presidential Commission on the Human Immunodeficiency Virus [AIDS]. In just months, Admiral Watkins was able to direct the committee through the many divisive issues surrounding the subject and present a ground-breaking blueprint for action.

Admiral Watkins has served as Chief of Naval Operations, Chief of Naval Personnel, Director of Nuclear Power Distribution in the Office of the Chief of Naval Operations as well as engineering officer of the Navy's land-based nuclear reactor, as well as a host of other naval positions.

I can think of no one who will be more able to tackle the diverse and important issues before the Department of Energy, and look forward to working with him in his new mission.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I congratulate President Bush on his selection of Adm. James D. Watkins as Secretary of the U.S. Department of Energy, and I am pleased to express my support and vote for his confirmation today.

Admiral Watkins is well qualified for the position of Secretary of Energy, as reflected in his impressive list of accomplishments and experiences. On June 30, 1982, Admiral Watkins was selected by President Reagan to become the 22d Chief of Naval Operations. He retired from that post on June 30, 1986, and entered civilian life after 41 years of service to the U.S. Navy.

While serving in the Navy, Admiral Watkins held a number of assignments at sea aboard nuclear powered vessels, in addition to shore assignments associated with the selection, education, and training of personnel. He also supervised the maintenance and operations of naval nuclear propulsion plants.

After receiving his master's degree in mechanical engineering, Admiral Watkins was selected by Adm. Hyman G. Rickover to enter the Navy's nuclear-powered submarine program in 1959. In the early 1960's, Admiral Watkins went on to serve as an assistant to Admiral Rickover for 3½ years at his headquarters in Washington, DC. He then served as Director of the Office of Chief Naval Personnel's Nuclear Power Distribution Branch. Subsequently, as Chief of Naval Personnel and Vice Chief of Naval Operations, Admiral Watkins continued his leadership role as principle adviser to the Chief of Naval Operations and Secretary of the Navy on safe and efficient operations of the Navy's nuclear-powered fleet.

In addition, Admiral Watkins' military decorations include several Distinguished Service and Legion of Merit medals, the Bronze Star with combat "V" and other medals, and campaign and service ribbons.

In October 1987, Admiral Watkins was appointed Chairman of the Presidential Commission on the Human Immunodeficiency Virus [AIDS] Epidemic, and submitted the Commission's final report to President Reagan on June 24, 1988. For his work on this Commission, he was awarded an honorary doctor of humane letters from the New York Medical College in June 1988.

Certainly his wide range of experiences will serve him well as Secretary of Energy.

I am confident that Admiral Watkins will be an effective leader on the many important issues addressed by the Department of Energy.

I support the nomination of Admiral Watkins to this post. If confirmed by the Senate, as I am sure he will be, I have every confidence that he will perform the new duties with exceptional skill, as he has other positions in the past.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I am very proud to speak on behalf of Mr. Watkins this afternoon as we vote on his confirmation as Secretary of Energy. He is an extremely fine man. One that I have visited with, and shared many goals and ideas with, and I greatly look forward to working with him.

Jim Watkins brings great capabilities in management and leadership. He demonstrated these skills magnificently as he worked for our country on the Presidential Commission on AIDS. And now he comes to us to be at the helm of an agency that will make so many crucial decisions and policies for our Nation in the years to come. He must help us develop an energy policy that cleans up the problems of the past, and yet continues to give incentives for America to build a future that is energy independent, healthy, and safe.

Jim Watkins brings great experience and expertise to the arena of nuclear energy. He has pledged to focus on the very serious problems with regard to cleanup of commercial and nuclear waste and putting our nuclear defense operations back on track. That is very important for our country and I am confident that he is the best man for the job.

But our Nation's energy mix is multifaceted and I have great confidence that he will address the other energy sources and programs with equal vigor and capability. A strong fossil fuel program is so important to this country—one that is environmentally sound, but also dedicated to building a strong future for our domestic coal and oil and gas industries. Energy research, and an effective clean coal program are also very important programs that Jim Watkins will be providing the leadership for.

I am most pleased to be able to lend my support to President Bush's fine nominee for Secretary of Energy and I look forward to working with him. Welcome to Washington—to Jim and his gracious wife, Shiela.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I rise today to express my strong support for the confirmation of the nomination of Adm. James D. Watkins to be Secretary of Energy.

I have met with Admiral Watkins and, as a member of the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources, I participated in his confirmation hearing. Let me say to my colleagues in the Senate that Admiral Watkins is impressively qualified to be Secretary of Energy.

I was impressed because, for the first time in my tenure in the U.S. Senate, a nominee for Secretary of Energy came before the committee and demonstrated an understanding of the extreme importance of the Department's national laboratories to the National Government.

Mr. President, the Department of Energy is not just a Department of Energy. In reality it is a hodge-podge of many functions. In addition to overseeing the Federal Government's basic energy policy, it also has the responsibility for our Nation's national laboratories, basic science research and development, the nuclear weapons program, and radioactive waste disposal.

It is interesting to note that, as Secretary of Energy, Admiral Watkins will be the manager of more scientists, engineers, physicists, and mathematicians than anyone else in the free world. Many of these individuals work for our National Laboratories, such as Los Alamos and Sandia National Laboratories in New Mexico.

These individuals and the National Laboratories are tremendous national resources. We must find a way to use these resources that are at our disposal.

As we move away from an era of nuclear confrontation, our National Laboratories will be changing. While we must maintain the essential national defense mission of the National Laboratories, we must diversify the mission of the National Laboratories so that we fully utilize the tremendous energy and knowledge of our scientists.

I am encouraged by Admiral Watkins' willingness to examine what the Department can do to utilize fully the resources of the National Laboratories. For example, the National Laboratories can share the wealth of their knowledge with the private sector through technology transfer. They can help us promote excellence in science, engineering, and mathematics among America's youth. They can also explore ways to protect our environment from the greenhouse effect. The National Laboratories also can assist in advancing the level of medical knowledge in our Nation through the mapping of the human genome.

On this last point, let me say that I believe research on the human genome will be of great importance to our Nation's health and economy. The National Laboratories are very important to this research and the Department should take a leadership role in this area along with the National Institutes of Health.

Admiral Watkins will bring a new perspective, new energy, and a new management style to the Department of Energy. The most significant asset that Admiral Watkins brings to the job, however, is credibility.

The Department of Energy especially needs credibility in its Nuclear Waste Program.

The citizens of the United States, and in particular those in my State of New Mexico, are extremely concerned when you mention anything to do with nuclear waste.

Therefore, I was heartened when Admiral Watkins testified that nuclear waste "will be handled, processed, and finally stored in compliance with those safety standards to which the Federal, State and responsible local authorities are full partners."

This is a welcome statement that was well-received in my State of New Mexico, which is the site of the Waste Isolation Pilot plant—WIPP—the Nation's proposed first geologic repository for nuclear waste.

So far, the Department of Energy has not done a good job managing the WIPP project and has yet to fulfill all of its commitments to the State of New Mexico regarding the project. Thus, the Department has a very poor image in New Mexico.

Therefore, I am opposed to opening WIPP until the Department of Energy provides certain protections to safeguard the health and safety of New Mexicans. In addition, I will oppose making WIPP the permanent disposal site for transuranic waste unless and until the Department demonstrates that WIPP complies with EPA regulations governing such sites.

I cannot support the administrative withdrawal of the WIPP site proposed by the Department because it does not provide adequate protection for the health and safety of the citizens of New Mexico.

Rather, in order to adequately protect the health and safety of New Mexicans, I believe Congress must pass a land withdrawal bill that:

First, prevents any radioactive waste being stored at WIPP until EPA standards for the temporary storage of radioactive waste have been complied with;

Second, mandates that the Department comply with EPA standards for the permanent disposal of radioactive wastes—and that EPA certify such compliance—prior to the permanent disposal of any radioactive waste at WIPP;

Third, directs the Department to remove all radioactive waste from WIPP if it fails to comply with the EPA permanent disposal standards;

Fourth, limits the amount of waste for health and safety experiments at WIPP to only as much waste as independent scientists agree is needed for the experiments;

Fifth, prohibits high-level waste experiments at WIPP;

Sixth, provides an independent oversight role for the New Mexico Environmental Evaluation Group;

Seventh, mandates that waste bound for WIPP must be transported in canisters approved by the Nuclear Regulatory Commission and that the State of New Mexico and local governments shall be notified in advance of any waste shipments;

Eighth, provides compensation to the State of New Mexico to offset the expense of having WIPP located in the State; and Ninth, authorizes funding for the completion of the WIPP road system, including the Santa Fe, Roswell, Carlsbad, and Artesia by-passes and the Los Alamos-Santa Fe alternate route.

I was very pleased at Admiral Watkins' statement that he agreed on the need for a land withdrawal bill and his willingness to listen to the scientific community's comments on what that bill should contain. This is a solid step toward establishing the Department's credibility on WIPP.

Mr. President, Adm. James Watkins has served our Nation with great distinction, first in the Navy and subsequently as Chairman of the Presidential Commission on the Human Immunodeficiency Virus Epidemic—commonly called the AIDS Commission. He met those challenges well. He is now faced with the new, and possible greater, challenge of managing the Department of Energy. I believe that he is well-suited for the task. I encourage all of my colleagues to lend him their enthusiastic support.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Mr. President, I rise in strong support of the nomination of Adm. James D. Watkins to be Secretary of Energy.

Much has been said of Admiral Watkins' credentials for the critical assignment of launching a cleanup of the Department of Energy's nuclear weapons plants and surely this is the Department's immediate priority at this time. Not only does he have the technical experience for this assignment but Admiral Watkins has managerial skills of a high order, which he demonstrated in numerous Navy billets, including his tour as Chief of Naval Operations. His most notable demonstration of these skills, however, was as Chairman of the Presidential Commission on AIDS, which issued its report last year.

For my part, I am especially gratified by his testimony to the Energy and Natural Resources Committee last week at his confirmation hearing that he intends to be an advocate for solar energy and energy efficiency research and will work for improved technology transfer from the Department's national laboratories to the private sector. In his testimony the admiral stressed that the reduction of the Nation's dependency on foreign oil will be a primary focus of his work at the Department, quite aside from his attention to the plant cleanup issue. He made it very clear that he takes energy conservation most seriously indeed. I am confident he will do a commendable job in this extremely difficult Cabinet post and for this reason I will be voting for confirmation of his nomination and urge my colleagues to do likewise.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, I am wondering if there are other Senators on our side of the aisle who wish to be heard? If not, Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time is yielded back. The question is, Will the Senate advise and consent to the nomination of Adm. James D. Watkins, of California, to be Secretary of the Department of Energy?

On this question, the yeas and nays have been ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Maryland [Ms. MIKULSKI] is absent because of illness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there any other Senators in the Chamber who desire to vote?

So the nomination was confirmed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the motions to reconsider the forgoing nominations are laid on the table, and the President is notified of the confirmations of these nominations.

Mr. MITCHELL addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader.

Mr. MITCHELL. I ask unanimous consent that the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire be permitted to address the Senate for a period not to exceed 10 minutes on a subject of a tribute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr RUDMAN. I thank my friend, the distinguished majority leader.

THE DEATH OF FORMER NEW HAMPSHIRE SENATOR NORRIS H. COTTON

Mr. RUDMAN. Mr. President, I rise today to pay tribute to and mourn the passage one of the greatest and most beloved statesman in the history of the State of New Hampshire:

A man who devoted almost his entire adult life to public service, including two decades in the U.S. Senate and four terms in the House of Representatives;

A man whose career of public service stretched from the silent film era to the Moon landings.

He served under seven Presidents, was a pillar of the Senate and secured the respect and admiration of his colleagues and his constituents. But he always referred to himself as "just a country lawyer."

My friends, flags across New Hampshire snap in the wind at half-staff today in honor of the memory of Norris Cotton. For 20 years Norris Cotton held the Senate seat I now hold—and acted with a degree of integrity, civility, humor, and old-fashioned Yankee common sense that, I believe, will not be repeated.

Laconic, upright, fiercely independent and appropriately suspicious of ideas that did not take root in our rocky New Hampshire soil, he embodied the substance and character of the State and people he served for so many years.

Born on a farm in Warren, NH, at the start of this century, Norris Cotton in his later years would reminisce about the time the first automobile rumbled into town, or when he strained to hear a voice over the first scratchy rural phone line strung to his parents' farmhouse.

He worked and saved to pay for his education.

And in 1923, at the age of 22, he was elected to the New Hampshire Legislature at a time, he later recalled, when "any fool could go to the legislature * * * and did."

The next year he was elected president of the New Hampshire Republican State Convention and was then brought to Washington to serve as a clerk to Senator George Moses.

Observing the conduct of the Senate by day, he studied law at night and then went back to New Hampshire—to work as a county attorney and district court judge.

He returned to the New Hampshire House in 1943 and was elected its speaker.

In 1946 he was elected to the House of Representatives, where he would serve the residents of New Hampshire's Second District for four terms.

In 1954 he came to the Senate—elected to fill the unexpired term of the late Senator Charles Toby. He was reelected in 1956, 1962, and 1968.

He loved the Senate—one time leaving his hospital bed to cast a vote. Describing himself as "a stand pat, conservative, hide-bound, moss-back Republican," Norris Cotton devoted his time and energy to the issues of health and transportation.

His proudest achievement was the establishment of the cancer research and treatment center in Hanover, NH, that now bears his name.

When he retired from the Senate in 1974, in part to care for his ailing wife, he was the third-ranking Republican and eighth, overall, in seniority in this body.

What can I say about a man held in such high regard, who possessed such good humor and deep wisdom?

His wit was sharp and tart. His first vote in the Senate was to censure Joseph McCarthy. His second was on defending Formosa. And the third was on Senate salaries. Later he would say,

I was beginning to think that serving in the Senate was like working in a steel mill—and it would be prudent to spit on anything you were about to sit down on—it might be hot.

His independence was undeniable. A loyal Republican, he nevertheless opposed increased military spending when be was convinced the war in Vietnam could not be won. And when he was criticized for not voting with the State's senior Senator, Styles Bridges, Cotton replied, "When two Senators vote the same way all the time, one of them ain't thinking."

His character was unique. The Robert Frost Award he received in 1972 recognized his "tradition of individuality, hard work, and devotion to the country north of Boston."

The White Mountains of New Hampshire are home to a natural rock formation that forms "The old Man of the Mountains,"—the symbol of our State. And in describing that symbol, Daniel Webster once said, "Up in the Mountains of New Hampshire, God Almighty has hung out a sign to show that there, He makes men."

If there was ever a public man who personified that spirit, that landscape—it was Senator Norris Cotton.

In New Hampshire Norris Cotton was, quite simply, a giant political figure of the modern era.

Tomorrow, in Lebanon, NH, we will gather to say goodbye to this great Granite Stater, and he will be honored by an old friend who he came to Congress with in the 1940's, who will deliver the eulogy tomorrow, former President Richard Nixon.

I yield the floor.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the distinguished Senator from New York be permitted to address the Senate, not to exceed 10 minutes, in connection with a tribute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

DEA AGENT KILLED IN NEW YORK

Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished majority leader for giving me this opportunity to make a rather sad report to the Senate of the United States, and in a way, to our people.

Mr. President, it is a bit ironic that almost 1 year ago to the day, a savage event took place in the city of New York at 2 a.m. There was a young police officer who sat in a patrol car for the purpose of protecting a witness, a witness who was giving testimony against drug dealers. That police officer, Edward Byrne, was assassinated—three bullets to the head—as he sat behind the steering wheel of his vehicle.

I think the savagery of that event brought about a cry from the people of our State and throughout this country that we had not been doing nearly enough in our battle against the scourge of drug addiction, certainly not when organized crime and drug dealers had no hesitancy in ordering the assassination of police officers to demonstrate their strength, that of the drug dealers and their cartel. That was February 26, 1988. Last evening at 10 p.m., February 28, 1989, another officer of the law sacrificed his life in the battle against this scourge of the drug traffickers. Everett Hatcher was murdered in New York City, Staten Island. He was the father of two children, ages 9 and 3.

Everett Hatcher was a drug-enforcement agent, a special agent. He joined DEA in the early 1970's. He was known as a special person. He was a man of great dedication, fearless in his job in pursuit of those who brought about this scourge, not only in our city of New York but also throughout many of the urban centers of America.

DEA Agent Hatcher was working on a joint DEA-FBI investigation with the organized crime drug-enforcement task force. The suspect, Gus Farace, was a convicted murderer who was released 10 months ago from prison. Farace has organized crime connections. Agent Hatcher was going to meet him to discuss a cocaine deal.

There was a surveilliance team with Hatcher, who was also wired, but around 9 p.m. the people who had Hatcher under surveilliance lost him. Agent Hatcher became the first law-enforcement officer killed in the line of duty of New York City this year. In 1988, seven law-enforcement officers were killed on duty in the city.

Mr. President, I rise to pay tribute to the dedicated law-enforcement officers who place their lives on the line, and particularly those agents and those officers who undertake this special detail and obligation, in attempting to curb this epidemic, and who in many cases are undertaking a battle against superior, organized forces, better funded than they are, and our law-enforcement officers are outgunned in many cases.

Today, in sadness, I say that we have a special obligation to rededicate ourselves and to be more purposeful, not only in law enforcement but also in education and prevention, in bringing the totality of our resources of this Nation against that dreaded scourge.

As Edward Byrne a year ago served as a catalyst to help pass and galvanize support for the comprehensive drug bill, I would hope that this body, our Nation, and our leaders would come together as a tribute to Everett Hatcher and to his family and to his wife, and to say we will not allow his death to go in vain, that we will fund the drug bill and find the resources, even during these times of budget restraint, to make it a meaningful endeavor on our part. I hope we will do this so that his life will have real purpose and meaning in this great sacrifice that he has made on behalf of our children and our grandchildren, and the strength and vitality of our Nation, which we see being dissipated in every way, every walk of life, and particularly, with our young, particularly with the ferocity of the devastation which the crack epidemic has brought. It is a sad thing, Mr. President, when we stop to think, and we do not like to acknowledge it, that once a crack addict, for all times a crack addict. According to uncontroverted medical testimony, there have been no cases where a crack addict has been rehabilitated, none. What a tragedy. What do we do? What have our efforts been to win this war, which is ravaging America and society?

Mr. President, our prayers and our hearts are with the Hatcher family; but, more important, I would hope that we would see to it that we do something tangible so that we can one day come to the floor and say we are winning this war, and it is not just a war of words, so that Everett Hatcher's devotion to duty, his sacrifice, will not have been in vain.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GRAHAM). The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MITCHELL). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. President, as in morning business, I ask unanimous consent to make a statement for not to exceed 10 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

HUMANITARIAN AID FOR THE CONTRAS

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. President, we will have an opportunity within the next several weeks to make a choice which should help to bring us together as a Senate and as an American people. That decision will be the decision to approve additional humanitarian aid to the Nicaraguan resistance which is one which will affect the progress of democratization in this hemisphere, as well as help engender a spirit of bipartisanship within the United States.

I urge the administration to move quickly to send a request for humanitarian aid to the Nicaraguan resistance to the Congress so that we can act before the current aid expires at the end of this month.

I also urge the administration to place this aid request into a larger policy context. Such a context must clearly link our continuing humanitarian aid for the Contras to the actual fulfillment by the Sandinistas of their many broken promises to democratize Nicaraguan society.

This broader context is vitally important that we work closely with other Latin American countries in an attempt to keep collective attention focused on democratization in Nicaragua.

This larger context of democratization and human rights is one that the Central American nations themselves defined when they agreed to the Esquipulas II accords. Esquipulas II is an unequivocal statement of their belief that strengthening democracy is the surest path to peace and development in the region.

Two weeks ago, the five Central American Presidents agreed in a meeting at Tesoro Beach in El Salvador to spell out the linkage between the reintegration of the resistance forces—the Contras—into Nicaraguan political life and the democratization that the Sandinistas must initiate to make that possible.

Nicaraguan President Daniel Ortega made specific commitments to undertake the process of democratization within the framework of Esquipulas II.

He agreed to several key points: moving up Presidential elections from November 1991 to February of next year; electoral and media law reform; and the release of political prisoners.

I can assure the Sandinista government officials that we will be watching them closely to ensure that they abide by their pledges.

After all, these are basically restatements of pledges they made—and have not kept—when they signed the Esquipulas accords in 1987. Specifically, we will be watching to see if they allow the media—all the media, including Radio Catolica, which remains closed—to operate freely.

We will be watching to see if they allow the establishment of independent television stations.

We will be watching to see if they continue to administer a Somoza-era law that allows them to sentence political opponents to 6 months in jail—an obviously useful tool to use to suppress the political opposition.

We will be watching to see if they allow independent trade unions to organize, to strike, and to operate freely.

These are some of objective measures we will use to determine whether or not the Sandinistas live up to their obligations. The ball, Mr. President, is in their court.

As part of the El Salvador agreement, the governments consented to develop a plan over the next 90 days that will tie reintegration of resistance forces into Nicaragan society with the new commitments by the Sandinistas to democratize.

Esquipulas II and the Tesoro Beach Declaration address democratization and regional security and should serve as the operational framework for a peace. They have the authority of the Central American nations who created them as their support.

Neither agreement, however, addresses the question of continued Soviet support for the Sandinista regime. The Soviet Union gave $2.5 billion in military aid to the Sandinistas between 1979 and 1988. Last year alone, the Sandinistas received $515 million in Soviet military support.

I encourage the administration to make clear to the Soviets in the strongest possible terms that this remains an outstanding and grave concern of the United States. This continuing military support calls into serious question the Soviets' professed sincerity in solving regional conflicts.

There is another more severe weakness in both Esquipulas II and the Tesoro Beach Declaration, however—one which we can help remedy by our decision on humanitarian aid.

The weakness is the absence of a system of verification and compelling incentives to comply with democratization. Those incentives, which could take the form of sanctions or other enforcements, are a powerful weapon of persuasion we should not be naive enough to discount.

The existence of the Contras has sent a clear message to the Sandinista leadership from the beginning that the end result of their people's revolution must not be the descent from a hated dictatorship into an even more repressive totalitarian state.

If the Contras are forced to disarm and disband before the Sandinistas have demonstrated a willingness to welcome them into the political dialog, then they have lost their country.

Central America and this hemisphere will have lost the military lariat which has helped to rein in the Sandinista's headlong flight toward absolute tryanny.

We would be irresponsible in this Senate were we to reduce the issue to one of partisan concerns. Oliver Wendell Holmes once said: "The great thing in this world is not so much where we stand, as in what direction we are moving."

Not one of my distinguished colleagues would deny that we all desire to move in the direction of a democratic peace for Nicaragua.

To ensure that takes place, I think we must hold the Sandinistas to a timetable for democratization.

The viability of the Contra forces has helped pressure the Sandinista regime to be open to the Central American peace process, and it may well be the most potent incentive for compliance which we have. To abandon that incentive now is to exhibit a disregard for the chance to see peace and basic human freedoms return to Nicaragua.

By approving, on a bipartisan basis a humanitarian aid package for the Contras, we send a clear message of support for Nicaraguan democratization. By so doing, we make it very clear that we will not allow the Contras to be dismantled until the Sandinistas follow through on their commitments.

That is our commitment—to encourage the movement toward democracy in our hemisphere so that it may reach its full realization.

RECESS UNTIL 3:30 P.M.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate stand in recess until the hour of 3:30 p.m. this afternoon.

There being no objection, the Senate, at 3 o'clock p.m., recessed until 3:29 p.m.; whereupon, the Senate reassembled when called to order by the Presiding Officer [Mr. KERREY].

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, for the benefit of the many Senators who have called inquiring as to the Senate's schedule for the remainder of today and this week, let me explain what is occurring.

Last week I announced my intention to proceed to the Tower nomination on today and reaffirmed my intention to do so this morning. During the course of the day, the distinguished Republican leader asked that I postpone seeking to do so until he had an opportunity to consult with his colleagues and indicated that he would shortly thereafter provide me with his recommendations on how best to proceed.

We are now waiting for the results of that consultation which has been occurring for the past approximately 2 hours. I am advised that the Republican leader has nearly completed those consultations and will soon be in a position to indicate to me what his desires are with respect to the Tower nomination. It remains my intention, as it has been throughout this recent several weeks, to proceed to the nomination as promptly as possible, and I look foward to that in consultation with the distinguished Republican leader.

Since I understand that there are some Senators who have requested the opportunity to speak as if in morning business, it is now my intention to merely place a quorum call, awaiting those Senators and awaiting the distinguished Republican leader.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

HOLY COW! A HALL OF FAMER!

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I want to take this opportunity to pay tribute to a man near and dear to the hearts of sports fans in my own State of Illinois and throughout the United States.

On January 27 of this year, my good friend Harry Caray, the voice of the Chicago Cubs, was named the 1989 recipient of the Ford C. Frick Award, the highest honor baseball can bestow on a member of the broadcast profession.

Harry will take his rightful place among such broadcasting legends as Mel Allen, Jack Brickhouse, Jack Buck, Bob Elson, Ernie Harwell, Bob Prince, and Vin Scully on July 23, when he is inducted into the broadcasters' wing of the National Baseball Hall of Fame in Cooperstown, NY.

Mr. President, Harry Caray has been a warm personal friend of mine for many years now. I have many wonderful recollections of that beautiful and continuing friendship.

I recall sitting next to him in the broadcast booth while he sings "Take Me Out to the Ball Game" and looking out at the response of the fans and enjoying the excitement. Why, Mr. President, Harry and I have even sipped a beer together to toast our friends and this great Nation of ours.

For the past 44 seasons, fans of the St. Louis Cardinals, Oakland Athletics, Chicago White Sox, and Chicago Cubs have been treated to Harry's colorful style. His descriptions of thousands of games over the years have instilled in many of us a love and enthusiasm for the game of baseball, and for Harry himself.

Never was this affection more apparent than last February, when Harry suffered a stroke. His dogged determination to recover, combined with the outpouring of sentiment to Harry and his wife, Dutchie, from his legions of fans throughout the world, had him back in Wrigley Field's broadcast booth, believe it or not, by the end of May.

Harry has always been a Hall-of-Famer in his way of treating people. Countless times I have seen him stand for hours, signing autographs and bantering with fans young and old, until all were accommodated. Through our many discussions over the years, I have come to know Harry Caray as a sincere, caring man with deep feelings for those less fortunate in our society and with creative ideas for helping them. This is a side of Harry which more people should know about.

Mr. President, I would like to add my voice to those of millions of other baseball fans throughout America in saluting Harry Caray, the newest broadcaster in Baseball's Hall of Fame and, I am proud to say, Mr. President, my warm and dear friend.

Mr. President, having made those genuine remarks out of love and affection for a dear friend, I now look at this Chamber and suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I be allowed to proceed as in morning business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

NOMINATION OF JOHN TOWER TO BE SECRETARY OF DEFENSE

Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, like other Members of the Senate, over the last several days I have been carefully weighing my own personal decision in regard to the nomination of John Tower to be Secretary of Defense. I have taken the time to read the FBI reports and both the majority and minority committee reports from the Armed Services Committee. I have carefully weighed the qualifications of this nominee. I have discussed the matter with colleagues on both sides of the aisle. I have discussed the matter with the President of the United States and have given due consideration to his views on this matter.

This is not an easy decision for me. I have had the privilege of serving with Senator Tower in the U.S. Senate. I knew Senator Tower through family friendship before I came to this body. I think that he is a man who possesses a great amount of knowledge and expertise which would be of benefit to this country. I think there are many ways in which he could be of service to this country. I know he has a true dedication to his country and a true desire to perform public service.

Mr. President, I believe that over the next year or two, important and fundamental decisions will have to be made at the Department of Defense: decisions about the defense budget, decisions about weapons systems, decisions about more effectively using every dollar of taxpayers' money in the defense budget. These decisions that will have to be made by the next Secretary of Defense are very difficult decisions.

Even if the Secretary of Defense making them were completely without controversy himself, it would be very difficult to make those decisions and to carry those decisions into effect. Therefore, I believe that for the good of this country, we need to have a Secretary of Defense for the United States, a person for whom there is broad support in the country, a person about whom there is not deep division of opinion or strong debate about his qualifications to hold office. It is for that reason I have decided I cannot in conscience at this time feel it is in the interest of the United States that I support the nomination of Senator Tower. Therefore, if this nomination comes to a vote on the floor, I will be casting my vote in the negative on that question of confirmation.

It is my sincere hope that that will not happen. As I have indicated, Mr. President, I believe that Senator Tower is a man who sincerely cares about this country. He has devoted a good portion of his life to national security issues and to trying to build a strong defense for this country. I hope that he will decide upon reflection that it is in the best interest of the country, in the best interest of the President, who is the President of all of us, and in his own best interest to withdraw prior to any vote on this nomination. I think, if Senator Tower were to take that action, it would affirm the belief that many of us have that he truly does want to put his country first. I think it would be an action that would be understood by both those who support him and those who find it impossible in conscience to support this nomination. If Senator Tower should decide to follow that course, I would be the first to say I believe there are many other positions of Government in which the talents and considerable expertise of Senator Tower could be used. I would be the first to support his nomination to some other position where he could be of service to his President and to his country.

Mr. President, having said that, let me also say that as the hours pass in the debate over this nomination, as the merits of this proposal are fully determined on the Senate floor, it is my hope also that we will not lose our sense of proportion. Whatever happens about this nomination I do not believe will determine the course of future relations between the President and the Congress. I think those who say it will be a crippling blow to this President if this nominee is not confirmed are wrong.

I know my own option of this President. I think he is one of the finest people to occupy that office for a long time. It has been many years since I have felt so good about the future course of this country as I feel because of the spirit and leadership which George Bush has been providing since he took the oath of office as the President of the United States. He is as much my President as anyone who serves on the other side of the aisle. No one in this body, Democrat or Republican, hopes that he succeeds more than I. In nearly all of the appointments that he has made and all of the first decisions he has made, I think he has followed the right course of action. My vote against this nominee should not be interpreted by anyone as a signal that I will not, without regard to politics or party, be prepared to support this President time and time again in the future as he tries to pull us altogether, to work together as Americans without regard to party for what is good for our country.

So I do not think anyone should interpret an action on this nomination as any kind of decision about whether or not this Congress should cooperate with the President of the United States whenever possible. After visiting with the President yesterday, I am also convinced that he shares that same opinion; that after this matter is put behind us, we will find ways to all work together in a better spirit than has existed between the Congress and the President for many, many years. I hope nothing will be said on the floor on either side of the aisle during the next several hours, perhaps days, of debate on this nomination that will impair the ability of any of us in this Chamber to work together for the national good or impair the ability of the President of the United States and Congress and our congressional leaders to work together.

A lot has been said in recent days in terms of whether or not political motivations are behind the decisions of Members of the Senate as to how they cast their vote on this nomination. Having been the target of some criticism on past occasions—for example, when I was one of two members of my party to vote for the confirmation of Mr. Bork to be a Justice of the Supreme Court—I think my own record indicates I do not put party ahead of what I think is best and right for the country.

I would say also that I know very well, perhaps as well as I know any Member of this body or any person in public life, as to the senior Senator from the State of Georgia, the chairman of the Armed Services Committee, there is no Member of the Senate, there is no person that I have known in public life who has more consistently put what he thinks is best for his country ahead of his own personal political ambition or ahead of any partisan political consideration.

So, Mr. President, I have great respect for the President of the United States, and I have great respect for my colleagues on the other side of the aisle who feel strongly that they should support this nomination. I honor the President for standing by his appointee. In politics, all of us know people who have been able to rise through the political ladders by being able to manipulate human beings, by not stopping and pausing to think of people and their human concerns. The President of the United States is not such a man. He is known as a man who has friends because he is a decent, good, caring human being. People have said to me, "I am puzzled. Why would the President of the United States put so much on the line for this nominee when such controversy has enveloped this matter?"

I believe, Mr. President, that President Bush has put so much on the line because he is a decent, caring human being who feels he should loyally stand with those he has asked to serve him. I salute him for his loyalty and for his friendships toward others. I do not think there is a basis for criticizing the President of the United States on that score, just as I salute the patriotism and integrity of the senior Senator from Georgia. American politics would be better served if we had more men in public life with the integrity of either George Bush or SAM NUNN of Georgia. Our country would be better if we had more men and women like them in public life. And so I appeal to my colleagues. There are honest differences of opinion, honest differences of judgment about what is best for this country. Let us not have a divisive debate. Let us debate on the merits as best we can. Let us reach a decision we think is best for the country. Let us not allow any divisions of opinion on this matter to keep us from fulfilling the pledge that we all made at the beginning of this session to work together as Americans, to keep us from following the dictate of the President when he said in his State of the Union Address that the American people did not send us here to bicker or to play politics. They sent us here to work together to solve the Nation's problems.

There is but one person who can remove the name of Senator Tower from consideration. The President of the United States, as I indicated, has commendable loyalty and strength of purpose. He will never do it. I can only say that I urge Senator Tower to take that action himself. It would be good for our country, good for our President. It would enable us to begin working together in a bipartisan spirit so essential to this country. Then I frankly hope that the President of the United States would use the talents and the expertise of Senator Tower either in some other public position of trust or at the very least his advice and counsel as a citizen who has much to offer and desires to contribute much to the good of his country.

Mr. President, it has been a difficult decision. It is a decision that I have reached and that I have communicated to Senator Tower, to the President, as well as to others. It is not a clear-cut decision. It is a matter about which reasonable people can differ. In my opinion it is a decision that should be reached without impugning the motives of anyone, and certainly I reach it without inpugning either the motives or character of the man who has been nominated by the President to be Secretary of Defense because he is a fine Member of the U.S. Senate. He has a good record of public service. He is a man who cares about his country. But for the good of the country I hope that he will withdraw. Let the President name a Secretary of Defense who can have the unified support without question, without deep debate of a broad spectrum of the American people because that Secretary of Defense is going to have tough decisions to make, decisions that are hard enough without having to also fight a battle to defend himself personally in his own position at the same time.

I thank the Chair. I yield the floor. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. SIMPSON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the senior Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I came to the floor to speak briefly on the issue of acid rain, but I have listened with great intent to my friend from Oklahoma, a man for whom I have the greatest respect and admiration, who came to this body when I did; we were sworn in together on this floor January 15, 1979. I agree with almost everything he said except his decision. What he says is very real. Much of it is the kind of thing that I would expect from him as a compassionate and very caring person. I guess before I would speak these 4 or 5 minutes on acid rain, I might note again the problems in society are what we see in this Tower situation. The issue now comes to the honest recommendation that Senator BOREN has made that he should withdraw, and yet there is something that gnaws in the bosom of every human being: how do I put my reputation back together? Who does that for me? How do I do that when I pick up the paper and read about the ballerina dancing on the piano and sloshing your way through life. When you go look at the FBI report and you find that the guy that put up the allegation about the ballerina on the piano and all the rest of the antics there, is some guy they will not even publish his remarks in the newspapers of America, some nut who has four aliases, a doctor, professor, what have you. How many times do we have to have people do that to us in the public vendue and then say, "Well, I am sorry, but there is no way you can produce your rebuttal because that is classified." If I had my way they ought to take some of that report and splash it out and hand it over to the Washington Post. Let the people of America see "anonymous witness No. T-4 and T-1." I do not know who T-1 and T-4 were but they were very serious about preserving their anonymity. That I don't doubt. Because when they went back and interviewed them, they found out they had a "different view" of it than the one that appeared in the newspaper. So how do you pick up the pieces? The Senator from Oklahoma voted for Robert Bork. Robert Bork knew he was going to lose, but he came right in here with his case because he wanted his grandchildren to read something about him other than the fact he was a racist, a sexist, a sterilizer of his fellow human beings—and all that junk that destroyed Robert Bork. So when you get to this point I do not know where else you go in this particular society of ours. But I think "win, lose, or draw," old John Tower ought to come right here and there will be some interesting people who will then get up and tell the story—the real story with facts and figures and attributable facts—and we will deal with it on facts instead of inuendo. He has already admitted some remarkable things. Humans do not like to do that. He said he did do some of those things in 1970, he did drink a little scotch, that those are things that happened but they were not so now. So it is fascinating to me, I guess it is ever so, as to just who are these appointed scorekeepers in society now who keep track of everybody. I am learning to handle them well. I just say to them when they ask me a question, "What did you do when you were 20 or 25 or 30?" because I think we are going to have to get into the issue of asking the examiners the same questions that are asked of the examinees because it has reached a point of absurdity. And we know our colleagues on both sides of the aisle who have been destroyed by it. And so that is where we are left. There is no other forum for a person to go to if they walk away from the fray for then the other stuff is believed and they have not had their opportunity to put their lives back together so that their children recognize the person who raised them and their grandchildren have an opportunity to see that there was a pretty noble guy who served as a U.S. Senator and put in a lot of years of public life and was really not some slosher who just kind of went through life without producing anything. So that is where we are. Who puts people back together? I guess you do that for yourself. Nobody else is going to do it for you around this place of Washington. Whoever said, "If you want a friend in Washington, buy a dog," was right.

Mr. BOREN. Will the Senator yield for just a moment?

Mr. SIMPSON. Indeed.

Mr. BOREN. I want to tell him I have bought a dog, and I think the advice, I believe, President Truman gave was well taken. I also do not know whether it is the time for us to begin confessing all of the matters of our youth. Since we now have C-SPAN and my mother does have it at home, I thought I would defer that for awhile.

Mr. SIMPSON. So does mine.

Mr. BOREN. I know my good friend, who has been listening to my statement, understands that I do not impugn the integrity of Senator Tower, nor do I. I did state for the record that I believed he was a very able Member of the Senate. He has considerable expertise. I think he has a desire to serve this country. If Senator Tower were to take himself out of consideration at this point, I do not believe the American people would take that as an act of admission or defeat. I think they would take it as a very graceful and courageous act and a statement on his part that given the circumstances and divisions that now exist he might not be able to perform and make those tough decisions and be able to get the support for tough discussions that he would need.

I would suggest—and I would be the first one to support the President of the United States if such a gesture were made by Senator Tower—as I say, it would have to come from him because George Bush is a person who would never request it, nor should he, and that is one of the reasons I have such great respect for the President of the United States. He is a fine human being in addition to being a fine leader. But I do believe and I would hope that if that happened, there might be other capacities in which Senator Tower could serve in public life and perhaps even in a way in which the Senate of the United States would have the opportunity to say that he was well qualified to serve in those positions and perhaps make it clear by another action that there is a great deal of respect and affection for him on the part of all of us who have struggled with this decision and come down on the other side. I know my good friend and colleague understands that and understands what I am saying. I simply wanted to say it to him again. I understand what he is saying. We all from time to time have been the target of unfair criticism. Anyone who steps into public life is from time to time. None of us enjoys seeing anyone else subjected to difficult personal situations, and I certainly do not.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I understand that fully, and never was any reference made by the Senator from Oklahoma about Senator Tower's integrity, and I understood that fully, indeed, before I made my remarks, and they have just been reemphasized, but certainly unnecessarily so, because I never heard any of that in his comments.

My comments were simply to the effect, "What choices do you have when you have been creamed in America and in the press, and it is your name and your reputation on the line and then suddenly you drop out?" I do not know. I am a fighter. The Senator from Oklahoma is a scrapper, and the Senators who are in the Chamber are fighters. When they are telling lies about you, you scrap, especially about yourself and your reputation. I do not know what other forum he has than this.

This old cowboy would never walk away from that: Innuendo and goofy witnesses interviewed by the FBI, who change their story when they are in their little cubicles with the FBI, different from what they did publicly. I would never allow that to happen to me.

I do not know what others may think, but that would not happen to me.

Now, I want to say, too, that I agree totally with our majority leader and with the Senator from Oklahoma, that if anyone thinks this is going to set a tone of destruction of getting things done in this country, that is just goofy too. There is no need to spend time on that, except that it keeps people excited, I guess, and we would not want to deny them that. I think the majority leader's words were that it would be "a gross overexaggeration" to believe this would be destructive of future relationships with President Bush, or the majority leader, or all of us here, or the minority leader, BOB DOLE. That just is not going to happen.

It is curious to me why the people who ask the question would want to see it happen. What does that do for our country? Sometimes they would want to think about that. Sometimes that high and laudable goal is not always attainable. We have so much to do with such great, ghastly problems of the budget and the deficit and all those things, that there will be plenty for us to do; and about once every 4 weeks somebody will ask if we are not going to destroy the country if we have another fight on the floor. We will have to say, "I guess not." It has gone on some 210 years, and we will slug along and see if we can continue to do it.

I came here to speak 4 minutes on acid rain, and I am still going to do that.

CLEAN AIR LEGISLATION

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, there was a bill introduced yesterday by which we are moving again on clean air legislation. I have been on the Environment and Public Works Committee for 10 years. It is the most extraordinary thing to deal with in that committee.

Former Senator Gary Hart was the chairman of the clean air coalition, and when he presented his work product, years ago which was a splendid work product, somehow the zealots on both sides went to work on that, and we never did a thing. It is ironic that a lot of things that were in there are still the things that will lead us toward a good result on this issue. In the past, all we have done is suffer from legislative gridlock on this issue of acid rain, a total polarization.

I have learned one thing in the Environment and Public Works Committee. Whatever the bill looks like, I just vote for it and get it out to the floor. That saves you from wading through 10,000 pieces of mail per month, from hysterical letters, and I always write people back and I say, "The bill that passes the Environment and Public Works Committee will never pass on the floor of the U.S. Senate, so why do you write?"

Now I finally think we have an opportunity to do it. Polarization is a product of the various interest groups in their extremity, taking those hard positions, showing an unwillingness to compromise. Senator BYRD has had a serious and intensive interest in this issue, obviously, representing West Virginia. I have an intense interest in it, representing Wyoming, which is now the largest coal-producing State in the United States. I know that is a shock, but it is true, some 163 million tons of low-sulfur coal. There are terrible problems of the high-sulfur coal States, but then there is the dagger in the breast of all of us in the West, which was put on the books in 1977 and it was heavily opposed by my friend Senator Muskie then, who said that this is just plain wrong.

It should never be in this measure. It was the issued percentage reduction. It simply said that if you had low-sulfur coal, you had to reduce it the same percentage of sulfur content as you would with the high-sulfur coal. How absurd. All it was, was to set up a georgraphical struggle, and that struggle has been going on now for 12 years and will become evident ever more in the market as the years go on.

So we can do it again this year as we did before, pass the same old stuff out of committee and see it always end up there at this desk in a rotting form. We can, in the committee, choose to listen to all sides and regions of the country and craft a bill that the Senate will actually approve for a change—a debate that will be participated in by the Senators who are most affected those from the States of Ohio, Illinois, Missouri, Indiana. They have never been in the debate yet, because the bill comes out of a committee which is heavily titled toward States that are least economically affected. We have some very heavy lifting to do on that one, and maybe we can get a little critical mass going for a change. The Bush administration is developing a clean air bill themselves. I think that is going to be an interesting legislative vehicle.

The one yesterday is well worth pursuing—parts of it. The committee and the Senate as a whole ought to try to support those measures, putting together something sensible, and take a good look at what the President unveils in the Clean Air Act legislation. I think we need to cooperate with the administration.

The President has said this is a critical national issue for him. That is great. It is for me, too. I have been trying to work on an acid rain bill for many years. Senator GEORGE MITCHELL and I were awfully close last year on a bill with 10 million tons reduction, recognizing the 40-years phaseout provision, recognizing that subsidies would be unacceptable, recognizing various phase-in procedures, recognizing that you could not gimmick the system with high sulfur versus low sulfur, recognizing that you could not have mandatory scrubbing. Now we are ready to go. I think that if we can get the various interest groups going, and stop trying to provide gimmickry in the marketplace with regard to coal and other fuel products. I do not think we can any longer afford the carving-out of special provisions in the law used to save a few jobs. We have seen how that only polarizes the debate, and it is important that we do not fall into that trap again this year.

I would be glad to visit with the United Mine Workers and hear what they are saying and try to work with them. It is ironic that the United Mine Workers will come up with a gimmick for high-sulfur coal, which affects the low-sulfur coal market and, yet, they go to the low-sulfur coal States and ask people to join their union. While they are out there cutting their bicycle tire, they are asking them to join the union in Wyoming, while they are here in Washington assuring that they have set up a permanent contest which is detrimental to those people that they are trying to get into their membership. I do not understand that, but at least it ought to be explained to the membership out there.

So here we come with a new bill. I really hope that we can craft one. I see that the players are here. I think we want to have something that has the least amount of cost to the citizens of the United States, and provide this 10 million ton reduction. We owe that to the electric rate payers and to the taxpayers. Maybe this year it will be a breakthrough for clean air if we all compromise a little. I am ready. It is time to ignore all of the environmental zealots who would shut down America and light up a wood stove and camp in the woods, and also to ignore the private-sector zealots who would say, "We do not need to do anything about this, because we need to study it some more." Just throw them both out of your office and get on with the issue of doing something that is sensible, common sense, and not intent of causing a geographical scrap.

I think we have a rare window of opportunity for cooperation and decisive action. Maybe we have learned from our past mistakes. Maybe we can seize the moment and advance the clean air bill that is based on good, constructive common sense and not on destructive dogma.

We lost one fine player, former Senator William Proxmire, a splendid player, but the others are here, and they are on both sides of the aisle: Senator BYRD, Senator MITCHELL, Senator CHAFEE, Senator BURDICK, Senator RUDMAN, and many, many more are ready to participate on the committee and off the committee, and maybe this year we can get something done, and I think we can, in the good spirit that will prevail.

I thank the Chair.

I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBB). The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BREAUX). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed en bloc to the following nominations on the Executive Calendar. Calendar items 13 through 35, and Calendar items 37 through 40; all

STATEMENT ON THE NOMINATION OF JOSEPH E. COPENHAVER TO BE BRIGADIER GENERAL

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I am pleased that the President has nominated Col. Joseph E. Copenhaver for the rank of brigadier general. Colonel Copenhaver is a native of Big Chimney, WV, and a graduate of the University of Charleston—formerly Morris Harvey College—in Charleston, WV.

Colonel Copenhaver has held a number of responsible positions in the West Virginia Air National Guard since he completed training in July 1956, including flight commander, operations officer, and squadron commander until 1976, at which time he was assigned as the air/group commander where he served until March 31, 1988. On April 1, 1988, he was assigned to his present position as commander of West Virginia's Air National Guard.

Colonel Copenhaver holds many honors, including the Meritorious Service Medal, the Air Force Commendation Medal, the Air Force Outstanding Unit Award, with one Bronze Oak Leaf Cluster, and the Combat Readiness Medal with five Oak Leaf Clusters. His State awards include the West Virginia Service Medal and the West Virginia Distinguished Unit Award with four Bronze Oak Leaf Clusters. Colonel Copenhaver holds the aeronautical rating of command pilot, and has accumulated over 6,000 military flying hours and 4,500 civilian flying hours.

Mr. President, it has been my experience that all members of the Reserve components of the armed services, and especially those reaching the high rank of brigadier general, must spend considerable time away from their families in the pursuit of their military duties. This requires no small sacrifice on the part of those family members, and in this regard, Colonel Copenhaver's wife, Barbara Lou, and their son, Capt. Joseph E. Copenhaver, Jr., currently assigned to headquarters 23d Air Force, and their daughter, Dr. Lisa A. Martin, of Charleston, WV, are also to be commended.

Mr. President, I am pleased to cast my vote for the confirmation of Col. Joseph E. Copenhaver as brigadier general, and I urge my colleagues to support this nomination.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I wish to congratulate the majority leader for his prompt action in gaining Senate approval of these nominations for senior positions in the State Department. The Foreign Relations Committee received these nominations in mid-February, scheduled hearings last week immediately following the recess period, and approved them at a business meeting Tuesday, February 28. All of the nominations formally received by the committee have been acted on, and with today's action all but one of them has been confirmed.

The Foreign Relations Committee remains eager and ready to give prompt consideration to additional nominations for State Department positions and ambassadorships as soon as they are received. However, as of today, March 1, 1989, the committee has in hand not a single formal nomination for any of its many prospective appointees. Today, the committee was notified of the administration's intention to nominate seven senior State Department officials, but I have been given no indication as to when the formal nominations, and the accompanying papers, will be received.

The names of many of these prospective nominees appeared weeks ago in press reports, and today's Washington Post gives the impression that they have now been formally nominated and that therefore the logjam is about to be broken. But that is not the case. As my colleagues know, the Senate and its committees cannot act until the President signs off on a nomination and transmits it to the Senate. That has not yet happened.

Of particular concern to me is that the notification I received today did not include Lawrence Eagleburger, who has long been reported to be the administration's choice to be Deputy Secretary of State. As of today, we don't even have an official statement of the administration's intention to nominate Mr. Eagleburger, much less the formal nomination. It is important to fill this important post, and I want to act as quickly as possible; so I hope that the formal nomination will be forthcoming soon.

I regret the delays, and I am sure Secretary Baker regrets that his team is not in place. I encourage the administration to move as quickly as possible to bring the nominations to the Foreign Relations Committee so that we can start the process of hearings and approval. Our consideration will be expeditious but complete. We will proceed as quickly as we can consistent with our constitutional responsibilities in the consideration process.

NOMINATION OF ROBERT M. KIMMITT

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, this first group of four subcabinet nominations for the Department of State consist of men and women who have previously served in positions of responsibility with Secretary Baker.

The Committee on Foreign Relations conducted hearings on their nominations on February 21. There was no objection expressed at that time to any of the four nominees.

I observed at the hearings, and I reiterate now, that their tenures will be more enjoyable for them if they continue the same responsiveness to the members of the Foreign Relations Committee, and other Members of the Senate, that Secretary Baker has demonstrated in his few weeks on the job. The Secretary is off to a fine start, and I look forward to working with him and his associates at the State Department.

Mr. President, in connection with Mr. Kimmitt's hearing, I filed some written questions. Because of the importance of these issues, I call to the attention of my colleagues the responses that I received, and I ask unanimous consent that these questions and responses appear in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Answer. The Department is collecting and reviewing the record of the negotiations, in which the U.S. role was that of mediator among the three signatory parties: the People's Republic of Angola, the Republic of Cuba, and the Republic of South Africa. The negotiations were conducted among the parties on a private and confidential basis, and the U.S., as mediator, would have to consult the signatory parties regarding release of the items in question. In the interim, the Department is prepared to provide a series of classified briefings on the negotiations. As part of the briefings, the Department would be prepared to respond to specific questions and concerns of members and staff.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I would mention that I first made this request of Jim Baker during his confirmation hearing in mid-January. He said he saw no reason why the information could not be given—under the proper security arrangements and so forth.

The African Bureau at the Department of State, Mr. President, has had a reputation both for its secrecy and its poor relations with Congress. I expect, certainly I hope, that this will improve decidedly under the new administration.

Assistant Secretary of State Chester Crocker served as a so-called mediator in negotiations between the South Africans and the Communist governments of Angola and Cuba which culminated in agreements signed at the United Nations on December 22, 1988. He and other State Department personnel spent much time, and taxpayer's money, in flying to countless meetings between the various parties in what have been described as tedious and time-consuming negotiations.

A great deal of mystique has surrounded these negotiations in that the U.S. Congress has not been apprised of precisely what promises, or hints of promises, were made to any of the parties to the agreement. We're already seeing the first rumblings from the signatories that understandings are not being fulfilled.

Now, as usual, it comes time for the U.S. taxpayers to be given the bill—approximately $150 million to support U.N. peacekeeping to enforce the agreement this year alone.

The Senate insisted last year, and properly so, that it be given, on a classified basis, access to the INF Treaty negotiating record. Then-Majority Leader BYRD and others insisted on this procedure, and it proved invaluable in evaluating the discussions of both parties to the treaty. In my judgment, that same access will need to be granted to the Senate this year with respect to the Angola/Namibia agreements which the United States was instrumental in forging and which we are suppose to help enforce. The Senate will need this information both in order to evaluate United States funding for the peacekeeping and verification operations in Angola and Namibia as well as to ascertain what, if any, United States commitments have been made to any of the parties.

Obviously, there are many of us who are concerned with the potential impact on Jonas Savimbi and his courageous UNITA freedom fighters. President Bush has already demonstrated his comment to Dr. Savimbi and his democratic forces.

Additionally, the United States has agreed to participate in the verification of the agreements apart from our financial contribution through the United Nations. We certainly need to have a clear understanding of what was agreed to in order to ensure proper verification of its implementation.

I appreciate Mr. Kimmitt's initial response. However, it is imperative that the Senate have access to the records before the Senate is asked to consider the peacekeeping funding request.

Indeed, his answers to some of the other questions I posed underscore the need for the Senate to develop a comprehensive understanding of what these agreements encompass for U.S. foreign policy.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the reminder of the questions, and Mr. Kimmitt's responses, be printed at this point.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

13TH AND 15TH PARALLELS

Q: The December 17, 1988 report of the U.N. Secretary General makes reference to the deployment of international military teams close to the line of the "15th parallel as adjusted" and the "13th parallel as similarly adjusted." A footnote in this report defines these adjustments. The bilateral and tripartite agreements do not appear to make any geographic reference other than to the 13th and 15th parallels per se. What is the understanding about the lines below which the Cubans must withdraw? Are they "adjusted", as described by the Secretary-General?

A: The "adjustments" mentioned in the Secretary General's December 17 report on the regulations governing the verification team set up to monitor total Cuban troop withdrawals from Angola refer to decisions taken by South Africa and Cuba/Angola to meet military requirements of the Cuban withdrawal process. One adjustment enables the Cubans to utilize the Port of Namibe, which is just below the 15th parallel, for troop witdrawals between August 1 and November 1. Similarly, the complex of Benguela-Lobito, which is located just south of the 13th parallel, is important to Cuba's phased withdrawal of its troops from Angola. The "adjustments" worked out among military representatives of South Africa, Cuba and Angola allow the Cubans to use the ports for withdrawal of equipment and personnel during the timeframe alloted for the northward redeployment and withdrawal of Cuban troops from southern Angola. In the case of Namibe, this would permit the use of this port through the first seven months of the agreement; Benguela-Lobito would be available for the withdrawal of forces and materiel until the withdrawal is completed.

IMF/WORLD BANK

Q: At the time of the signing of the agreement—December 22, 1988—or any other time, did Secretary of State Shultz, or any other U.S. official, convey the message that the U.S. would no longer oppose the entry of Angola into either the World Bank or the IMF? Prior to December 22, 1988, what was the U.S. position with regard to Angola's entry into the IMF or the World Bank? After December 22, 1988, what was the Reagan Administration's position with regard to Angola's entry into the IMF or the World Bank?

A: On December 22, 1988, Secretary Shultz met with the delegation of the People's Republic of Angola to the signing ceremony for the Angola/Nambia accords. In that meeting he said he would recommend to his successor that the U.S. no longer oppose Angola's bid for IMF/World Bank membership on political grounds. He noted, however, that Angola would have to meet the full range of economic criteria for membership which he described as onerous. This position was consistent with our long-standing position that a shift in our policy towards Angola's IMF application was contingent on Angola's making a verifiable commitment to the total withdrawal of Cuban troops from Angolan soil. The achievement of this important policy objective led to Secretary Shultz's conditional statement to the Angolan delegation, and remained the policy of the Reagan Administration through January 20, 1989.

Q: What is the Bush Administration's position with regard to Angola's entry into the IMF or the World Bank?

A: In light of the December 22 accords, the Bush Administration will evaluate Angola's application to the IMF/World Bank in the context of evidence of Angolan compliance with the agreements following the April 1 date for the beginning of total Cuban withdrawal from Angola.

ACTA DI MINDELO/MINDELO MINUTES

Q: Please provide the Committee with a copy of the Acta di Mindelo, also known as the Mindelo Minutes. This agreement was allegedly signed—or initialled—5 years ago. Why was the Senate not notified of this agreement under the Case Act reporting requirement? What is the legal status of the Mindelo Minutes?

A: The so-called Mindelo Minute (which actually bears the heading "Act of Sao Vicente") was a written summary of an exchange of views between Angola and the U.S. in the Republic of Cape Verde in January 1984. The Minute recorded the position of each side at that stage of our efforts to broker the withdrawal of South African forces from Angolan soil for a fixed period of time in return for an Angolan Government commitment to use its influence on SWAPO to restrict its actions in Namibia. The Act of Sao Vicente also summarized the state of our negotiations with Angola regarding the total withdrawal of Cuban forces from Angola. Release of the text of the Act of Sao Vicente remains subject to the agreement of the Luanda authorities. The Act of Sao Vicente was not submitted to Congress pursuant to the Case Act because it was not an international agreement entered into by the United States. It does not create legal obligations for the U.S. Rather, it was an agreed summary of the views exchanged by the U.S. and Angolan representatives.

U.S. AID TO ANGOLA

Q: Please provide a copy of the report of the U.S. A.I.D. team which visited Angola in October, 1988. Who were the members of the team?

A: A copy of the final report of the U.S. Private Voluntary Agency/U.S. Government assessment team's visit to Angola is attached.

The team leader was Ronald P. Burkard of CARE. The other team members were: William Garvelink (A.I.D. Office of Foreign Disaster Assistance), Richard Hough (A.I.D. Office of Food for Peace), David B. Jackson (Africare), Hector Jalipa (World Vision), and Michael Mispelaar (CARE). More information on the team members is contained in Annex G (page G-1) of the report.

Q: Under what authority was such a trip conducted?

A: I am advised that A.I.D.'s Office of Foreign Disaster Assistance has the general authority to provide relief and humanitarian assistance worldwide, and that Section 491 of the Foreign Assistance Act provides specific authority.

Q: Specifically, how are such trips—to determine whether a U.S. aid program should be initiated—permitted when U.S. law prohibits aid to Angola? Indeed, this trip appears to be begun immediately after the passage of legislation—sections 512 and 550 of the Foreign Operations, Export Financing, and Related Programs Appropriations Act, 1989—which explicitly prohibits direct or indirect aid to the government of Angola.

A: The PVO assessment team visit to Angola was funded by the Office of Foreign Disaster Assistance. The Department believes that the prohibitions on direct and indirect aid to Angola in sections 512 and 550 of the Foreign Operations, Export Financing, and Related Programs Appropriations Act, 1989, as noted above, do not apply to disaster assistance funds. Also, it is the Department's view that, since the 1989 act does not provide funds for PL 480, the restrictions in Sec 512 and 550 do not apply to food assistance provided under PL 480.

Q: Is the Bush Administration still considering an aid program to Angola?

A: The Administration does not contemplate any direct or indirect development assistance to Angola as currently prohibited by legislation. A.I.D. has contributed modest amounts of humanitarian assistance through UNICEF, since 1981, in the form of PL 480 emergency supplemental food for mothers and children displaced by the war, and is considering OFDA emergency relief requested by U.S. PVOs. In addition, State/Refugee Programs has provided assistance to refugees through UNHCR and ICRC since 1980.

CUBANS IN AFRICA

Q: It appears that the Cubans are required to withdraw 50,000 troops from Angola. However, Jonas Savimbi's UNITA forces contend that the Cubans have more than 50,000—perhaps as many as 60,000-62,000. In any event, does the agreement require the removal of all Cuban military troops from Angola?—or only 50,000, if there are, in fact, more than 50,000?

A: The December 22, 1988, agreements call for the total removal of all Cuban troops from Angola. The presence of any Cuban troops in Angola beyond July 1, 1991, would violate the accords.

Q: Are the Cubans required to withdraw their Soviet-made MiGs from Angola? Will Cuban naval forces be required to be withdrawn from off the Angolan coast? Please furnish a list of all Cuban military equipment that is to be withdrawn under the agreement.

A: While the New York agreements do not specify what equipment the Cuban forces in Angola must withdraw, Cuba and Angola have assured South Africa and the UN that Cuban units will be withdrawn together with their equipment. The Department is prepared to brief the Committee and its staff on Cuban military equipment and naval forces.

Q: It has been reported to me that the Cubans have been searching around for other countries who would consider "hosting" the troops being withdrawn from Angola and specifically that they have talked to Ethiopia, Mozambique, Zimbabwe, Ghana and also Nicaragua. Have the Cubans approached (1) Ethiopia, (2) Mozambique, (3) Zimbabwe, (4) Ghana, and/or (5) Nicaragua? Doesn't the agreement require that the Cuban forces be withdrawn "to Cuba"?

A: It is the clear understanding of the parties to the New York agreements that all Cuban forces in Angola will be withdrawn to Cuba. This understanding is based on the categorical statements of the Cuban Government. There have been reports that Cuba has approached a number of African countries, including some of those you mention, as to their willingness to "host" troops being withdrawn from Angola. None of these reports has been confirmed.

Q: Would an increase in Cuban forces in other African countries violate the recent agreement?

A: An increase in Cuban forces in other countries would not violate the letter of the New York agreements, but the U.S. would certainly view such a development as a serious violation of the spirit of the accords and as contrary to the categorical statements made by the Cuban Government.

DEMARCHES TO FRG ON LIBYAN CW PROGRAM

Q: Last week West German Minister Schaeuble reported on his government's information regarding West German firm participation in the construction of a poison gas facility at Rabta, Libya. The report outlines a number of warnings, notes, demarches, and other communications both formal and informal from the United States Government to West German officials. Some references in the report such as "friendly services" or "partner services" may also refer to communications from the United States. Please review the Schaeuble report and provide the Committee with copies of all such communications to the West German Government regarding West German firm participation in chemical weapons production in Libya.

A: The Department is working with other agencies to identify those communications with the FRG that raised this issue. In the interim, State Department officials, together with representatives of relevant intelligence agencies, are prepared to present a classified briefing on this topic.

DEMARCHES TO FRG ON IRAQI CW PROGRAM

Q: The March 30, 1984 issue of the New York Times, (Page 1) reports on demarches made to the West German government regarding West German firm participation in chemical weapons production in Iraq. Please provide for the committee copies of all communications with the West German government on this subject.

A: Information on FRG firms involved in building a chemical weapons plant in Iraq and the sale of chemicals and specialized equipment was passed to FRG officials as early as November 1983. The government prosecuted the Karl Kolb Company, the firm responsible for constructing the CW facility at Samarra, and took several actions to stop exports to the Iraqi CW program. Classified information passed to FRG officials in Washington and Bonn can be provided the committee in a special intelligence briefing.

CW: JAPANESE INVOLVEMENT AT RABTA

Q. News accounts suggest that at least two Japanese firms, Japan Steel Works and Toshiba, have made deliveries to Rabta. Has the Department made any representations to the Japanese government on this subject and if so, what was their reply?

A. Since August 1988, the Department has had a series of consultations with the Japanese Government concerning the involvement of Japanese firms at a metal fabrication plant adjacent to the Libyan chemical weapons plant at Rabta.

Toshiba Corporation recently announced that Toshiba electrical switching equipment was provided to Japan Steel Works under sub-contract. Toshiba Corporation assumes the equipment was shipped and installed at the metal fabrication plant. The Department of State had no prior information concerning specific Toshiba involvement with the metal fabrication plant, but in its diplomatic representations to the Japanese Government, the Department had expressed concerns over the involvement of any firms with the Libyan chemical weapons program.

I am advised that consultations, which are ongoing, with the Japanese Government have been positive and constructive. The Government of Japan has informed the U.S. that as of July 1988 Japanese firms had ceased all involvement with the metal fabrication plant.

The Japanese Government recently has taken the following measures on its own initiative to strengthen export controls on precursor chemicals: revised Japan's export control order, adding four more chemicals (to make a total of 10) to Japan's control list; expanded destination controls on precursor chemicals to worldwide; and issued warnings and guidance to Japanese chemical companies concerning exports of chemicals on the warning list of the Australia Group, an organization in which Japan is an active member.

SWISS BANKS

Q: News accounts from Europe suggest that West German firms have used Swiss banks as intermediaries and financiers of their chemical weapons equipment sales. Have we made representations to the Swiss government on this subject, and if so, how have they responded?

A: While the Department has not made representations to the Swiss government on the specific subject of possible use by West German firms of Swiss banks as intermediaries and financiers of chemical weapons equipment sales, the Department has approached the Swiss government regarding the U.S. government's serious concern about chemical weapons proliferation. The Swiss government has been asked to undertake to ensure that Swiss firms and individuals are not providing assistance to the Libyan and other Middle Eastern CW programs.

AUSTRALIA GROUP

Q: What plans does the Administration have to regularize the chemical suppliers' group known as the Australia Group?

A: The Australia Group (members of the European Economic Community and Australia, Canada, Japan, New Zealand, Norway, Switzerland, and the United States) meets every six months at the Australian Embassy in Paris to consider the problem of Chemical Weapons (CW) proliferation.

Participating states have imposed export controls on certain chemical weapons precursors to deny them to probable users, particularly Iran and Iraq. Under the chairmanship of Australia, the group has been consulting informally since 1985 to improve the effectiveness of those controls and to find other ways to curb the illegal use of CW. The U.S. is looking into ways to enhance the effectiveness of the Australia Group, including formalizing the Group.

29-059 O-90-12 (Pt. 3)

DEMARCHES TO ALLIED GOVERNMENTS

Q: Have we made diplomatic representations to allied governments regarding their firms' participation in chemical or biological warfare production in Iran, Syria or Egypt? If so, please provide details.

A: I am advised that the Department has made numerous diplomatic representations to several allied governments since the mid-1980s on their firms' assistance to chemical and biological programs in the Middle East. If the Committee so wishes, a classified briefing can be provided on such diplomatic demarches and other communications. Given the sensitive nature of the information, it would be appropriate for the briefing to be conducted by State Department officials and representatives of the relevant intelligence agencies.

H.J. Res. 22. Joint resolution to designate the week beginning March 6, 1989, as "Federal Employee Recognition Week"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The following petitions and memorials were laid before the Senate and were referred or ordered to lie on the table as indicated:

POM-17. A resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Minnesota; to the Committee on Appropriations.

"RESOLUTION No. 1

"Whereas, because of underfunding, the Veterans Administration Central Office has found it necessary to limit health care to those veterans mandated by public law; and

"Whereas, in Minnesota, at the Minneapolis and St. Cloud Veterans Administration Medical Centers, a means test has been established to determine eligibility for health care; and

"Whereas, some veterans who are inpatients requiring nonemergency inpatient care who have health insurance, Medicare, or substantial liquid assets, will be referred to the community not at the Veterans Administration expense; and

"Whereas, other veterans who are outpatients will receive an initial evaluation and medications for up to 14 days, but will not be placed in an outpatient program and will not be scheduled for continued care; and

"Whereas, placements for nursing home care will now be limited to a maximum of 90 days when the need primarily results from nonservice-connected disabilities; and

"Whereas, providing over-the-counter drugs to patients, if the prescription is to be taken on an "as needed" basis, has been discontinued; and

"Whereas, the cutbacks in medical care provided by the Veterans Administration means it will no longer provide veterans with the medical care they need and deserve; and

"Whereas, it is irresponsible not to provide veterans with this medical care: Now, therefore,

"Be it resolved by the Legislature of the State of Minnesota, That it urges the President and Congress of the United States to restore full funding to the Veterans Administration Medical Centers.

"Be it further resolved, That the Secretary of State of the State of Minnesota is directed to prepare certified copies of this memorial and transmit them to the President of the United States, the President and Secretary of the United States Senate, the Speaker and Chief Clerk of the United States House of Representatives, and to Minnesota's Senators and Representatives in Congress."

POM-18. A joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Idaho; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works:

"HOUSE JOINT MEMORIAL No. 2

"We, your Memorialists, the House of Representatives and the Senate of the State of Idaho assembled in the First Regular Session of the Centennial Idaho Legislature, do hereby respectfully represent that:

"Whereas, large scale rehabilitation, repair and capacity improvements are ongoing necessities of the national highway transportation system; and

"Whereas, the highway transportation system is the most critical component of the physical infrastructure of the United States of America; and

"Whereas, there is a growing and concentrated national consensus for a program to serve the country's highway transportation needs through the year 2020; and

"Whereas, high quality highways are critical to the ability of manufacturers to build and deliver products, and to the ability of states and communities to attract new industry and to sustain economic growth; and

"Whereas, the international-trade competitive positions of the nation and of the states are directly related to the quality of access to the Interstate Highway System and related also to the physical condition of interstate and primary highways; and

"Whereas, current national policy makes no provision for continuing the Federal-Aid Highway Program into the future; and

"Whereas, in all recent federal-aid highway acts, Congress has had to include provisions for extending the Highway Trust Fund and the taxes which fund it; Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the members of the first regular session of the Centennial Idaho Legislature, the house of representatives and the senate concurring therein, That we petition the United States Congress to make permanent the Highway Trust Fund and the user fees accruing to it, so that a reliable funding source is available for constructing, rehabilitating, and othewise improving the highways and bridges which are so essential to the economic vigor of Idaho, and of the nation; and be it further

"Resolved, That we petition the United States Congress to protect the Highway Trust Fund from predatory proposals to divert highway user revenues to programs entirely unrelated to the transportation purposes for which the Fund was established; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Chief Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and she is hereby authorized and directed to forward copies of this Memorial to the President of the United States, the Secretary of the United States Department of Transportation, the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States Congress, the cochairmen of the National Economic Commission, and the congressional delegation representing the State of Idaho in the Congress of the United States."

POM-19. A resolution adopted by the legislature of Ulster County, New York favoring enactment of the Recyclable Materials Science and Technology Development Act; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

POM-20. A joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Idaho to the Committee on Finance.

HOUSE JOINT MEMORIAL No. 1

"We, your Memorialists, the House of Representatives and the Senate of the State of Idaho assembled in the First Regular Session of the Centennial Idaho Legislature, do hereby respectfully represent that:

"Whereas, the United States Congress is seeking some effective means of reducing the federal budget deficit in the immediate future; and

"Whereas, several proposals being considered for budget reduction purposes would increase the existing federal gasoline tax by various sizable increments; and

"Whereas, the U.S. Department of Energy has stated that "a motor fuel tax will create an economic loss which is of far greater magnitude than the possible benefits. . ."; and

"Whereas, a gasoline tax for deficit reduction would be a regressive tax affecting the poor to a greater extent than other income levels; and

"Whereas, states would receive no direct revenue benefits, while incurring substantial increases in their public assistance costs; and

"Whereas, residents of the south, midwest and west pay more fuel taxes because they must travel greater distances by personal vehicles than residents of other regions and therefore would bear a disproportions burden of deficit reduction; and

"Whereas, since there continues to exist a great need to rehabilitate and reconstruct the nation's transportation infrastructure, motor fuel taxes should continue to be dedicated to transportation purposes; and

"Whereas, the tourism industry, one of the top three employers in eighty per cent of the states, would be adversely affected; and

"Whereas, the gross national product, consumer price index, and employment all would be severely and negatively affected; and

"Whereas, raising the gasoline excise tax for deficit reduction purposes would not only undermine the highway trust fund, but would also fail to get to the root of the problem of federal spending exceeding federal income: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the members of the first regular session of the Centennial Idaho Legislature, the house of representatives and the senate concurring therein, That we petition the United States Congress to oppose the use of the Federal gasoline tax to reduce the federal deficit; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Chief Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and she is hereby authorized and directed to forward a copy of this Memorial to the President of the United States, the Secretary of the United States Department of Transportation, the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States Congress, the cochairmen of the National Economic Commission, and the congressional delegation representing the state of Idaho in the Congress of the United States."

POM-21. A resolution adopted by the Municipal Police Employees Retirement System, Baton Rouge, Louisiana, relative to medicare, social security, and related programs for state and local public employees; to the Committee on Finance.

POM-22. A resolution adopted by the House of Represenatives of the State of Michigan; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

HOUSE RESOLUTION No. 766

"Whereas, The year 1990 marks the 150th anniversary of the 1840 "log cabin and hard cider" presidential campaign of William Henry Harrison, the ninth President of the United States. A man to the manor born and the son of the governor of Virginia, he gained fame for himself as victor over the Indians at the Battle of Tippecanoe; and

"Whereas, While Harrison's own high living on his 3,000-acre estate in Ohio resulted in great debt, the image of himself he projected as a Whig candidate in the 1840 election was of a simple man of the frontier who enjoyed nothing better than sipping cider in his log cabin. This man of myth received fifty-three percent of the popular vote in this contest against President Martin Van Buren. One month after taking office, he was dead, having caught cold during lengthy inaugural address in the freezing rain. He never made a single major decision as president, but did turn the attention of the nation to the sturdy, little houses that served so well the early settlers as the American frontier was pushed westward; and

"Whereas, Log cabins, humble dwellings fashioned out of the rich resources at hand, were the homes of many early settlers who found the construction of shelter the first priority in the new land. Log cabins are, of course, places of the past. Time, neglect, and often fire have removed their traces from the landscape, while a few still stand preserved and maintained by historical societies. Yet, log cabins are also places of the present and the future, a fact attested to by their new popularity as cottages and year-round homes. The log cabin is a true American artifact, one deserving of special national recognition: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the House of Representatives, That this legislative body respectfully memorializes the Congress of the United States to issue a log cabin commemorative postage stamp in 1990 to commemorate the important place of these humble dwellings in our pioneer and political history; and be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this resolution be transmitted to the President of the United States Senate, to the Speaker of the United States House of Representatives, to the United States Postmaster General, and to the members of the Michigan congressional delegation."

POM-23. A joint resolution adopted by the Third Olbiil Era Kelulau; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources:

"SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION

"Whereas, the former Congressman Lujan is a native of Albuquerque, New Mexico; and

"Whereas, the former Congressman Lujan is a Republican of New Mexico and was elected to the House of Representatives of the United States Congress in 1970, having served nine terms in the Congress; and

"Whereas, the former Congressman Lujan served on the House Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs and served as a Ranking Minority Member of the House Committee on Science and Technology in the United States Congress; and

"Whereas, the former Congressman Lujan co-sponsored the United States Congress House Joint Resolution No. 597 with Congressman Ron de Lugo of the Virgin Islands, which resolution attempted to authorize entry into force of and increase the benefits in the Compact of Free Association between the United States and the Government of Palau; and

"Whereas, the former Congressman Lujan has retired from the United States Congress after serving nine full terms; and

"Whereas, the new President of the United States, the Honorable George Bush, has appointed the former United States Congressman Manuel Lujan, Jr. to the position of Secretary of the United States Department of the Interior; and

"Whereas, the people of the Republic of Palau are pleased with the appointment of the former Congressman, the Honorable Manuel Lujan, Jr., who has distinguished himself as a capable statesman and a strong advocate of Pacific interests, to this important position which has a direct impact upon the relationship between the United States and the Republic of Palau; now, therefore,

"Be it resolved by the Senate of the Third Olbiil Era Kelulau, First Regular Session, January 1989, the House of Delegates concurring, that the people of Palau, represented in the Olbiil Era Kelulau, do hereby congratulate and commend the former United States Congressman, the Honorable Manuel Lujan, Jr., on his appointment to the position of Secretary of the United States Department of the Interior; and

"Be if further resolved that certified copies of this joint resolution be personally delivered to the Honorable Manuel Lujan, Jr. upon his arrival in Palau; the President of the United States of America; the Vice President of the United States of America in his capacity as the President of the Senate; the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States Congress; the President of the Republic of Palau; the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Delegates of the Third Olbiil Era Kelulau."

POM-24. A petition from the Secretary of the State of Arizona transmitting revised election figures for certain candidates; to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

POM-25. A concurrent resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of South Dakota; to the Committee on Rules and Administration:

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION No. 4

Whereas, the economy of the United States continues to be threatened by an increasing federal budget deficit attributable in large part to increases in federal spending; and

"Whereas, the federal budget deficit reached one hundred twenty-five billion dollars as of June 30, 1988; and

"Whereas, Congress continually fails to take corrective action to effectively reduce the federal budget deficit; and

"Whereas, the national average annual per capita income for 1987 was fifteen thousand four hundred eighty-one dollars; and

"Whereas, the recommendation of the Quadrennial Commission on Executive, Legislative and Judicial salaries calling for an approximate fifty percent increase in pay for United States congressmen has been approved by the President; and

"Whereas, the pay for congressmen under the salary raise proposal would increase from eighty-nine thousand five hundred dollars to one hundred thirty-five thousand dollars per year; and

"Whereas, Congress may take action on the recommendation on or before February 7, 1989, to reduce or eliminate the raise for members of Congress; and

"Whereas, the members of Congress should debate in public the merits and disadvantages of such a pay raise at this time: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, by the Senate of the Sixty-fourth Legislature of the state of South Dakota, the House of Representatives concurring therein, that the South Dakota state Legislature respectfully request that the United States House of Representatives and the United States Senate conduct meaningful debate and vote on the subject of a congressional salary increase and do so prior to the February 7th deadline; and

"Be it further resolved, that the Secretary of the Senate of the state of South Dakota forward a copy of this resolution to the members of Congress in key leadership positions."

POM-26. A resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Minnesota; to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs:

RESOLUTION No. 1

"Whereas, because of underfunding, the Veterans Administration Central Office has found it necessary to limit health care to those veterans mandated by public law; and

"Whereas, providing over-the-counter drugs to patients, if the prescription is to be taken on an "as needed" basis, has been discontinued; and

"Whereas, the cutbacks in medical care provided by the Veterans Administration means it will no longer provide veterans with the medical care they need and deserve; and

"Whereas, it is irresponsible not to provide veterans with this medical care; Now, therefore, be it resolved by the Legislature of the State of Minnesota that it urges the President and Congress of the United States to restore full funding to the Veterans Administration Medical Centers.

"Be it further resolved that the Secretary of State of the State of Minnesota is directed to prepare certified copies of this memorial and transmit them to the President of the United States, the President and Secretary of the United States Senate, the Speaker and Chief Clerk of the United States House of Representatives, and to Minnesota's Senators and Representatives in Congress."

By Mr. HATCH (for himself, Mr. SIMON, Mr. HUMPHREY, Mr. METZENBAUM, Mr. THURMOND, Mr. COCHRAN, Mr. LEVIN, Mr. SYMMS, Mr. COATS, and Mr. GORE):

S. 479. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code to allow for deduction of qualified adoption expenses, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Finance.

FAIRNESS FOR ADOPTING FAMILIES ACT

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I am introducing today the Fairness for Adopting Families Act, a bill that will greatly assist American families to adopt children. Senators THURMOND, SIMON, HUMPHREY, METZENBAUM, COCHRAN, LEVIN, SYMMS, COATS, and GORE are joining with me to introduce this legislation.

A tax deduction for adoption expenses is desperately needed, both for its substance as well as its message. As lawmakers, we must make sure our laws treat families formed through adoption the same as laws for families formed biologically. As lawmakers, we must also continue to express our support for the family unit. We all agree that strong families are the key to a strong America and our support for their formation must be the cornerstone of our message. For many prospective parents, the only way to form their family is through adoption.

To many seeking to adopt a child, the costs associated with such a procedure are simply prohibitive. Prospective parents are often required to pay not only court and attorney fees but also expenses for maternity home services, hospital and physician costs, and at times, prenatal care expenses for the natural mother. Data provided the National Center for Adoption show that the actual costs connected with legal adoptions can exceed $15,000. Family wealth should not be the determinative factor in adopting a child. This bill recognizes the importance of the family unit through alleviating many of the cost barriers associated with adoption.

This proposed legislation has three major features. First, it would provide a tax deduction of up to $5,000 for unreimbursed and legitimate adoption expenses. Second, it would exclude from an employee's gross income up to $5,000 in payments made by an employer for adoption expenses. Third, it would treat any employer contribution to an adoption expense plan as a deductible business expense.

This bill provides that as long as an adoption is in accordance with State and local law, the tax deduction for unreimbursed adoption expenses would be available. Each legal adoption is socially useful and beneficial. Each adopting family deserves our support. This is true whether the child is a healthy infant, a child with special needs, or a child from another country.

This legislation does not provide, however, a deduction for expenses for adoptions administered through illegal practices, such as through a baby broker. Many adopting parents in my own State of Utah and in other States have been defrauded by such schemes. The cost of an illegal adoption often exceeds $25,000, most of which goes into the pockets of middlemen. Fees for such unconscionable arrangements should not and would not be deductible.

Two of this bill's provisions deal with the interest in adoption by many of America's employers. Corporations such as Dow Chemical, IBM, Digital Equipment, and Honeywell offer adoption benefits. This legislation will encourage more employers to establish such profamily plans.

The bill addresses two problems now associated with employer-provided adoption benefits. The first problem is that adoption payments made to employees are taxable to the employee as income. The bill excludes from an employee's income those payments. The second problem is that employers may not treat their adoption payments to employees as deductible business expenses. The bill solves this problem by treating employer contributions to an adoption expense reimbursement program as ordinary and necessary business expenses.

This legislation will also save our society money. The National Center for Adoption has shown savings in two ways. First, the bill would move thousands of children, who might otherwise have lingered in foster care, into loving homes. Second, the tax deduction encourages shifting medical costs to the adopting family and away from the more expensive AFDC and Medicaid systems.

I strongly encourage my colleagues to support this legislation. We are representatives of a society that professes a commitment to ensure the success of the family. The Tax Code should demonstrate that commitment by allowing for the deduction of adoption expenses. Congress manifested its agreement with this concept last fall when it included in the Technical and Miscellaneous Revenue Act of 1988 a sense of the Congress resolution that adoption expenses should be deductible. President Bush has also recognized the importance of the deduction by including it as a proposal in his budget message to Congress.

I urge my colleagues on the Finance Committee to take quick action on this bill. The $5,000 limit on the deduction is a flexible figure and can be changed to meet budgetary constraints, as are other provisions in this bill. The most important resource America has is its families. We must do everything in our power to ensure their continued growth and success. A relatively small dollar investment in this bill will greatly benefit not only children and families but society as a whole.

I ask unanimous consent that the full text of the bill and summary of the bill be included in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Mr. COCHRAN:

S. 480. A bill to authorize the several States and the District of Columbia to collect certain taxes with respect to sales of tangible personal property by nonresident persons who solicit such sales; to the Committee on Finance.

EQUITY IN INTERSTATE COMPETITION ACT OF 1989

● Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation to correct an inequity which is eroding State tax bases and injuring local retailers. The Equity in Interstate Competition Act is identical to legislation I introduced in the 100th Congress to help State governments collect sales taxes on interstate mail order sales.

Congressional interest in this issue has grown as States have become increasingly concerned about their inability to collect sales taxes on out-of-State mail order purchases by their residents. During the 100th Congress, the House Subcommittee on Select Revenues reported a measure requiring large retailers to collect sales taxes on such transactions. Hearings were held in the Senate by the Finance Subcommittee on Taxation and Debt Management, and the chairman of the Small Business Committee introduced legislation to address this inequity.

In 1967, the Supreme Court held in the National Bellas Hess case that, without congressional guidance, a State could not require an out-of-State vendor to collect and remit the State sales or use tax on purchases made by customers in that State if the company did not have an actual physical presence in that State. Since that decision, however, the retail sales market has changed significantly, with mail order companies enjoying a rapid growth in popularity. Direct marketers have increased annual earnings to more than $150 billion through catalog sales and at-home shopping by means of cable television, telephones, and computers. The National Conference of State Legislatures reports that more than 14 percent of all retail sales are now made by out-of-State direct sellers. The National Association of Tax Administrators estimates that interstate transactions could eventually reach 25 percent of all retail sales.

My own State of Mississippi depends heavily on sales and use tax revenues to support education, health, welfare, corrections, and other operations of government. These taxes account for 62 percent of State tax collections and are derived from the sale of items which could be sold in interstate commerce. The Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations estimates that Mississippi will lose approximately $23.4 million in 1989 as a result of mail order sales that escape taxation.

It is important that Congress provide State governments with the opportunity to collect all revenues to which they are entitled. Many States and local authorities have had to raise taxes and curtail services in order to meet their obligations. The State of Mississippi, for instance, has raised its sales and use tax rate twice since 1983, to a current level of 6 percent. Income tax rates for individuals and corporations have been increased, and expenditures for many programs have been reduced.

States are justified in urging that unwarranted tax exemptions enjoyed by out-of-State vendors be removed. Increased mail order sales have diverted business from local companies which support their communities through services, property taxes, and charitable contributions. It is unfair to exempt mail order firms from sales taxes that are collectible when the same products are purchased from a local retailer.

My bill does not authorize a new tax, nor does it create burdens for the consumer. The legislation simply gives States the authority to require that out-of-State retailers collect sales taxes which are already legally due.

Under my bill, collection of the sales tax can only be required if the sale destination is in the State imposing the tax and the seller engages in regular or systematic soliciting of sales in that State. Small mail order firms will not be affected, since collection will be required only if the seller has gross sales of $12.5 million nationwide or over $500,000 in a particular State.

The bill will not require the collection of local sales taxes unless they are uniform throughout that State. Accounting for collection will be limited to quarterly reporting, and the bill specifies that the seller will not have to account in any manner for receipts on the basis of geographic location within the State.

It is time for Congress to recognize this tax inequity and to act to give our States the authority to correct the problem. I urge Senators to join me in support of this legislation.●

By Mr. CRANSTON:

S. 481. A bill to place a moratorium on the relocation of Navajo and Hopi Indians under Public Law 93-531, and for other purposes; to the Select Committee on Indian Affairs.

MORATORIUM ON RELOCATION OF NAVAJO AND HOPI INDIANS

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, today I am pleased to reintroduce legislation to halt for at least 18 months the relocation, pursuant to Public Law 93-531, of Navajo and Hopi Indians from their ancestral homes in and around Big Mountain in the northern desert area of Arizona. Identical legislation is being introduced in the House by Congressman BATES. This issue involves important questions of religious freedom and Native American policy. The legislation I am introducing today is based on a measure I first introduced during the 99th Congress as S. 2545 and reintroduced as S. 2452 in the 100th Congress. Unfortunately, after having been referred to the Senate Select Committee on Indian Affairs in both the 99th and 100th Congresses, no action was taken on either bill.

Mr. President, the need for Congress to place a moratorium to halt further relocations is now as urgent as ever. Indeed, the problems faced by Hopi and Navajo as they confront the relocation mandated by Public Law 93-531 are increasing with time rather than decreasing.

PUBLIC LAW 93-531

Mr. President, Congress enacted Public Law 93-531, the Hopi and Navajo Land Settlement Act of 1974, in an attempt to resolve what appeared merely as a land dispute between two Indian tribes occupying adjacent reservations. Public Law 93-531 resulted in the partition of land, known as the Joint Use Area, which had been held jointly by the two tribes. The statute also mandated the relocation of Indians of each tribe then living on lands partitioned to the other, and established the Navajo and Hopi Indian Relocation Commission to carry out this mandate.

Mr. President, the competing interests involved in generating the Hopi and Navajo Settlement Act debate were not as clearcut as they may have first appeared. A land dispute between the Hopi and Navajo Tribal Councils regarding the proper bounds of their respective reservations as set forth in the Executive order of 1882, was surely a motivating force in generating the debate. Yet, as many people have come to understand, this boundary dispute is one which has little meaning to many of the traditional Navajo and Hopi inhabiting the Joint Use Area, who have lived side by side, traded and intermarried for generations and who are the ones most affected by the relocation mandates. Furthermore, the unclear role played by those in favor of developing coal and other energy resources in the Joint Use Area remains a troubling aspect of the debate.

Mr. President, my proposal to establish an 18-month moratorium on the Federal Government's relocation efforts will give the Congress the opportunity to rethink the Hopi-Navajo land dispute controversy in the only way that is practical, and to correct it, as conscience and fairness require. Perhaps more importantly, it will give those most directly affected by this situation—for the first time—the opportunity to speak and negotiate for themselves.

HISTORICAL BACKGROUND

Mr. President, as I mentioned earlier, it is true that a long-standing conflict between the federally recognized Hopi and Navajo tribal councils is one aspect of this controversy. That over the centuries differences have arisen between Navajo and Hopi residing on adjacent lands in northeastern Arizona is also true.

Although minor differences exist in the various historical accounts of how the complex relationship between Hopi and Navajo residing in northern Arizona developed, the general history of this area can be outlined as follows.

Descended from the Anasazi ("the Ancient Ones") cliff dwellers of Mesa Verde and elsewhere, the Hopi have lived in what is now northeastern Arizona at least since 1000 A.D. Indeed, the Hopi have a longer authenticated history in North America than any other ethnic group.

Today the Hopi occupy the same self-governing, autonomous villages on three high mesas as were occupied by their ancestors centuries ago. Old Oraibi, on Third Mesa, established around 1100 A.D., is the oldest continuously occupied community in North America. Most Hopi villagers are primarily farmers who depend on their own agriculture for their survival. Living areas are generally limited to the mesa villages while Hopi farms are located below and surrounding the villages, within about a 5 to 10 mile radius, on communally held land. In addition to farming, grazing, and gathering, lower elevation outland areas are used for religious and cultural purposes.

The Navajo first arrived in the area sometime in the 15th century. The Navajo were herdsmen who required grazing lands for their animals. Their pastoral lifestyle and their need for abundant grazing lands for their livestock brought them into occasional conflict with numerous Southwestern neighbors, including the Hopi. Often, however, Navajo were allied with Pueblo Indians against a common enemy, the Spanish, who showed up in the area in 1540, and continued to occupy the area until 1823, when Mexico took jurisdiction.

Mexican rule ended in 1848, when the United States acquired jurisdiction over the area through the Treaty of Hidalgo. Yet, like the Spanish adventurers before them, the arrival of American immigrants led to competition and friction. The entrance of the U.S. Government in the lives of the Southwestern Indian tribes soon followed.

The intensity of the tensions which developed between the United States and the Navajo Nation led to the infamous "search-and-destroy" campaigns of Kit Carson in 1863 and culminated in the forced relocation ("The Long Walk") of the Navajo to Fort Sumner, NM. Five years later, the Navajo were released from Fort Sumner and the U.S. Government approved for them a small land holding by Executive order.

Although the U.S. military campaign against the Navajo, their dire economic condition upon release from Fort Sumner, their subsequent westward expansion, and their growing population sometimes strained relations between Hopi and Navajo, they continued to engage in both social intercourse and commercial trade. Indeed, in the latter part of the 1860's, Hopi and Navajo traditional leaders met together in the Hopi village at Walpi, on First Mesa, and entered into a Treaty of Peace. Despite the passage of time, many Hopi and Navajo traditional leaders claim this peace pact, as well as older covenants of peace, reportedly dating back to the 15th century, have not been broken and continue to bind them to this day.

In 1882, President Chester withdrew certain lands from the public domain under Executive order, "for the use and occupancy of Moqui, [Hopi] and such other Indians as the Secretary of the Interior may see fit to settle therein."

The ambiguity of this language later became the basis of complex and lengthy litigation between the federally recognized Hopi and Navajo tribal councils, to determine the rights and interests granted to each tribe by the 1882 Executive order. The Hopi and Navajo Settlement Act of 1974, then, represented an attempt by Congress to enforce a final settlement of the competing land title claims of the Hopi and Navajo tribal councils, title claims with origins in a 19th century Executive order of President Arthur.

HUMAN COSTS OF PUBLIC LAW 93-531

Mr. President, I believe it is imperative that we not allow the "land title" aspects of the controversy to obscure the staggering human costs of implementing the relocations mandated by Public Law 93-531.

As we now know, early estimates of the number of individuals subject to relocation were not accurate. Rather than approximately 1,000 families, more recent estimates of the Navajo and Hopi Relocation Commission indicate that full implementation of Public Law 93-531 may require the relocation of approximately 2,700 families. Altogether then, the families, predominately Navajo, subject to the relocation mandates of Public Law 93-531 may total close to three times the number originally estimated. This means that full implementation of Public Law 93-531 may require the relocation of more than 10,000 individual family members.

In February 1985, President Reagan commissioned William P. Clark, former Secretary of the Interior, to study certain aspects of the implementation of Public Law 93-531. A memorandum dated September 20, 1985, prepared by Richard C. Morris, who served as counsel in the Department of Interior, outlines many problems related to implementation of the relocation mandates of Public Law 93-531. The Morris report describes the suffering of some of those who voluntarily accepted relocation to the off-reservation, urban areas:

> [P]articularly the older—or traditional—families have been able unable to cope in an urban or even suburban environment. Some could speak only in their native tongue and had no marketable skills. They had no understanding of municipal taxes, utility services, or maintenance of the simplest mechanical devices in their modern homes. They were soon in debt and became victims of unscrupulous lenders. Many lost or sold the homes provided by the Relocation Commission, probably the central reason they had agreed to move in the first instance. Many suffered severe emotional traumas when placed in an environment in which they could not cope and now regret their decision to move.

Some of the problems faced by those who "volunteered" for relocation such as cultural shock and substandard living conditions are also addressed in a report released on April 25, 1985, by the surveys and investigations staff of the Subcommittee on the Department of Interior and Related Agencies of the House Committee on Appropriations. This report is critical of the way the relocations mandated by Public Law 93-531 have been implemented by the Relocation Commission, and it highlights a number of the problem areas, including: long delays in completing replacement housing, a lack of planning, failure to provide decent housing, cost overruns, inadequate counseling activities, relocatee housing resale activity and related fraud allegations.

The large-scale removal of people from their traditional homes to new communities required by Public Law 93-531 surely poses logistical problems. Nevertheless, the failures of the Relocation Commission to cope with logistical and other problems has increased the human suffering of relocatees. This intolerable situation must not be allowed to continue.

RELIGION AND TRADITIONAL RESISTANCE

If the experiences of those who "volunteered" for relocation are disturbing, the problems of those Navajo subject to relocation who have steadfastly refused to go, are even more so. Yet, despite years of impoverishment, forced livestock reduction and a profound sense of uncertainty concerning their future, traditional Navajo continue to oppose relocation. The essence of the Navajo resistance to the relocation mandates of Public Law 93-531 is founded in their traditional Navajo religion. As one Navajo resister has explained, relocation is not acceptable to traditionals because it would force them to accept a "deportation from the spiritual world of their ancestors." Many of those who have chosen to relocate frame their decision in a religious context as well. For example, one Navajo relocatee explained his decision to relocate: "we are Christians and our God can go anywhere."

Because their religion is linked to the land, compulsory relocation would seriously undermine traditional Navajo religious beliefs. Relocation heightens the spiritual, social, and psychological suffering experienced by traditionals by tampering with their connection to the land and their system of religious belief.

The complex relationship which has developed over the years between Navajo and Hopi in major part arises from historical, cultural and traditional considerations. Throughout numerous legal struggles between the two federally recognized tribal councils over the past few decades, however, many traditional Hopi and Navajo have always maintained that they had more in common than at odds.

The religious beliefs of traditional Hopi and Navajo are both based on land theologies which follow natural laws. Moreover, they share a commitment to revere forever and serve as caretakers of the land. This commitment serves as a strong common bond between many traditional Hopi and Navajo, and is the foundation of their joint opposition to the relocation mandates of Public Law 93-531.

MONETARY COSTS

Although the tragic human costs associated with the relocation efforts of the Federal Government are impossible to calculate, the economic costs are less elusive. We now know that early estimates of the cost of relocation were completely erroneous. Indeed, rather than approximately $40 million, more recent estimates indicate that 7 or 8 times that amount may be required to complete the relocation. The House report that accompanied the fiscal year 1987 Department of the Interior and Related Agencies Appropriation bill noted that although approximately $150 million had already been appropriated, more than $100 million in additional costs would be required to complete relocation. Moreover, with the target date for completion in 1993, 4 years into the future, and the horrendous record of the Relocation Commission in meeting cost estimates, it does not seem unlikely that the total costs of the compulsory relocation ultimately may soar to heights of between one-third and one-half of a billion dollars.

SUMMARY OF THE LEGISLATION

Congress has grappled with the problems stemming from the implementation of Public Law 93-531 for 15 years now, Mr. President. As our understanding of the complexities and dimensions of the issues have increased, modifications to the original act have been adopted. Fifteen years later, however, it is increasingly apparent that the approach of Public Law 93-531 is seriously flawed, and that it has inflicted, and will continue to inflict, great hardship and suffering.

Mr. President, the legislation I am proposing today will give us the opportunity to halt the relocations for 18 months and reconsider the implementation of Public Law 93-531. It will establish a Navajo and Hopi Indian Relocation Advisory Commission with a majority of Hopi and Navajo viewpoints as separate from the viewpoints of the respective tribal councils. Thus, this legislative proposal represents the only congressional initiative which seeks to provide Hopi and Navajo traditionals with a forum in which to express their views concerning implementation of Public Law 93-531.

Mr. President, it is imperative that any proposed solutions or alternatives to the problems resulting from the implementation of Public Law 93-531 must incorporate the views of traditional spokesmen and leaders of both tribes. If those most directly involved and most harshly affected by the relocation mandates are not allowed to participate fully in the process, it is highly unlikely that any viable resolution of the controversy can be found.

The Advisory Commission would be required to hold public hearings on the lands subject to the mandates of Public Law 93-531. These hearings would be held at a variety of locations, including communities facing relocation. By mandating public hearings on the land and requiring a rotation of hearing sites, this measure aims at encouraging the greatest level of participation by Hopi and Navajo representing the entire spectrum of viewpoints.

After the Advisory Commission concludes its study of the problems resulting from implementation of Public Law 93-531, it would be required to submit a report to Congress outlining recommendations for solutions to the remaining problems involved in completing the requirements of Public Law 93-531, and viable alternatives to relocation, that would resolve the disputes between the Hopi Tribal Council and the Navajo Tribal Council, and meet the needs of many traditional Hopi and Navajo as well.

Mr. President, my legislation does not impose another legislative solution. Rather, it provides the time and the means to change the course. The initiative I am introducing today offers an alternative process for dispute resolution, a process which emphasizes the input of those most uniquely qualified to negotiate for themselves an acceptable solution.

Finally, I ask unanimous consent that the complete text of S. 481 be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

(d) The Commission shall have the power to—

(1) appoint, terminate, and fix the compensation (without regard to the provisions of title 5, United States Code, governing appointments in the competitive service, and without regard to the provisions of chapter 51 and subchapter III of chapter 53 of such title, or of any other provision of law, relating to the number, classification, and General Schedule rates) of such personnel as may be necessary to assist in the performance of the duties of the Commission, at rates not to exceed a rate equal to the maximum rate for GS-18 of the General Schedule under section 5332 of such title; and

(2) procure, as authorized by section 3109 of title 5, United States Code, temporary and intermittent services to the same extent as is authorized by law for agencies in the executive branch but at rates not to exceed the daily equivalent of the maximum annual rate of basic pay in effect for grade GS-18 of such General Schedule.

(e)(1) Each member of the Commission not otherwise employed by the Federal Government shall receive compensation at a rate equal to the daily rate for GS-18 of the General Schedule under section 5332 of title 5, United States Code, for each day, including traveltime, such member is engaged in the actual performance of duties as a member of the Commission.

(2) Except as provided in paragraph (3), a member of the Commission who is otherwise an officer or employee of the United States Government shall serve on the Commission without additional compensation.

(3) All members of the Commission shall be reimbursed for travel and per diem in lieu of subsistence expenses during the performance of duties of the Commission in accordance with subchapter I of chapter 57 of title 5, United States Code.

Any member of the Commission may administer oaths or affirmations to witnesses appearing before the Commission.

(g) The provisions of the Federal Advisory Committee Act shall not apply to the Commission established under this section.

(h)(1) The Commission is authorized to secure directly from any officer, department, agency, establishment, or instrumentality of the Federal Government such information as the Commission may require for the purposes of this section, and each such officer, department, agency, establishment, or instrumentality is authorized and directed to furnish, to the extent permitted by law, such information, suggestions, estimates, and statistics directly to the Commission, upon request made by the Chairman of the Commission.

(2) Upon request of the Chairman of the Commission, the head of any Federal department, agency, or instrumentality shall make any of the facilities and services of such department, agency, or instrumentality available to the Commission and detail any of the personnel of such department, agency, or instrumentality to the Commission, on a nonreimbursable basis, to assist the Commission in carrying out its duties.

(3) The Commission may use the United States mails in the same manner and under the same conditions as other departments and agencies of the United States.

(i) The Commission shall cease to exist on the date that is 30 days after the date on which the Commission submits the report required under subsection (c)(3).

SEC. 3. Funds necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act shall be paid out of amounts appropriated to the Navajo and Hopi Indian Relocation Commission.

By Mr. GORE:

S. 485. A bill to authorize a White House Conference on Homelessness; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

WHITE HOUSE CONFERENCE ON HOMELESSNESS

● Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the U.S. Conference of Mayors recently released its latest report on homelessness, revealing what just about everyone involved in this issue already suspected; afforable housing is becoming even scarcer, hunger and homelessness continue to increase, the number of persons seeking emergency shelter is rising, and families compose more than a third of the homeless population.

Among the recommendations of the chairman of the Conference of Mayors, Mayor Raymond L. Flynn of Boston, was the convening of a White House Conference on Homelessness. The Stewart B. McKinney Homeless Assistance Act passed with broad, bipartisan support in the last Congress; and I am convinced that a White House Conference on Homelessness would play a constructive role in helping develop the next stage of a unified public policy affecting the homeless.

Therefore, today I am introducing the "White House Conference on Homelessness Act" to authorize a national conference of individuals concerned with programs and issues, both public and private, relating to homelessness. This assembly will be charged with the responsibility of examining homelessness and developing specific and comprehensive recommendations for appropriate executive and legislative action to address the problems of homelessness.

The Conference also will be asked to review existing laws and regulations related to public policy regarding the homeless and make recommendations for improvements. Joining me as original cosponsors of this act are Senators DODD, HEINZ, KERRY, ROCKEFELLER, SASSER, SHELBY AND STEVENS.

During the campaign, President Bush repeatedly called for full funding of the Stewart B. McKinney Homeless Assistance Act, the major homeless bill in the last Congress. The President, and his new HUD Secretary Jack Kemp, have made a public commitment to addressing the problems associated with homelessness. I applaud that commitment, and I welcome the opportunity to work with the administration to make real and permanent progress toward solving this crisis. And, Mr. President, homelessness is indeed at crisis proportions in this Nation.

In the January report of the Conference of Mayors, one in a series issued by that organization since 1982, the extent of homelessness in the Nation's cities was once again cited in detail. Among the conclusions of the report, which complied the results of a 27-city survey, were the following:

During the past year, requests for emergency shelter increased by 13 percent, while requests for shelter by homeless families increased by an average of 18 percent. An average of 19 percent of the requests for emergency shelter went unmet during 1988; and for homeless families, 23 percent of the requests were unmet. Nearly all cities expect requests for emergency shelter to increase again this year.

Emotional and mental health problems were identified most frequently as a consequence of homelessness for parents, children, and families as a whole. Among the other consequences cited were school-related problems, health problems and inadequate health care, loss of self-esteem and hopelessness, and family problems.

Every survey city cited the lack of housing affordable by low-income people as a main cause of homelessness. Other causes frequently identified were unemployment; mental illness, and the lack of services for the mentally ill; substance abuse, and the lack of needed services; and, of course, poverty.

More than a third, 34 percent, of the homeless are members of families; and one in four homeless persons is a child. Another 34 percent are substance abusers; a fourth are mentally ill; and 23 percent are employed.

Mr. President, the statistics go on and on, almost to a numbing degree. There are statistics about runaway youth, the elderly, veterans, the physically and mentally ill, abused and battered women and children. There are as many reasons for homelessness as there are homeless people. And I am certain that every one of my colleagues is appalled by the number of children who do not have a home.

The Tennessee Department of Education recently issued its report on the education of homeless children and youth as required by the McKinney Act. Commissioner Edward Smith determined that a lack of stability is the No. 1 concern for homeless children. Let me quote from Commissioner Smith's report:

Deprived of basics such as proper heating and clothing, attending school on a regular basis is difficult. Many of these children feel rejected and are shuffled around so much, they fall far behind academically. These children need an assurance that they are worthy of love and consideration as human beings; they need help in developing their self-esteem.

Mr. President, the McKinney Act was, and remains, an essential element of the Federal response to homelessness. To some extent, it begins to address most of the problems associated with homelessness. But with the problem continuing to grow, the next step in homeless policy needs to be defined, and a coherent long-range policy must be developed. It is for that reason that I am introducing the White House Conference on Homelessness Act.

The Conference is meant to increase public awareness, identify the problems of homelessness, assemble the individuals involved in the issues and programs related to homelessness, review existing laws and programs, and make recommendations for executive and legislative action.

Delegates will be selected in State and regional conferences or appointed by Governors, mayors, and Members of the House and Senate. Each Senator will be given the opportunity to name a delegate to attend the national conference. The President will name 100 delegates; and he is authorized to call and conduct the conference within 18 months of enactment and to appoint a conference director and staff.

The Executive Director of the Interagency Council on the Homeless will be charged with preliminary preparations for the conference, including giving approval for the State and regional conferences. In general, this conference is modeled on the very successful White House Conferences on Small Business.

Mr. President, I believe this conference will serve a very important function by giving those most closely involved in services and advocacy for the homeless the opportunity to make specific recommendations for public policy. I urge my colleagues to join me in making this conference a reality and a success.

At this time, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that two letters from Mayor Flynn, one endorsing this legislation and one to President Bush, be inserted in the RECORD at this point, along with a copy of the full text of the legislation.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OFFICE OF THE MAYOR,
Boston, MA, March 1, 1989.

Hon. ALBERT GORE, Jr.,
U.S. Senate, Russell Senate Office Building, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR GORE: I appreciate your action today in filing legislation to establish a White House Conference on Homelessness. You have always been a strong advocate for the homeless, and this new legislation further demonstrates your commitment to this important issue.

As Chairman of the U.S. Conference of Mayors Task Force on Hunger and Homelessness, and on behalf of the nation's mayors, I recently issued our annual survey which shows that this problem continues to grow, and needs the increased attention of the federal government.

Last October, I wrote to the two Presidential candidates and urged them to convene a White House Conference. Recently, I wrote to President George Bush, and sent him the attached letter along with a copy of the U.S. Conference of Mayors report on Hunger and Homelessness.

I am encouraged by President Bush's expressed concern for the homeless in America, and hope that he will convene this conference. With your leadership in the Senate, this conference will be a giant step toward the solution to homelessness in our country.

Thank you for your long-standing commitment to the homeless in America. Mayors across the nation know that they can count on you to work with them on issues of fairness and equity.

Sincerely,

RAYMOND L. FLYNN,
Mayor of Boston.

OFFICE OF THE MAYOR,
Boston, MA, January 30, 1989.

President GEORGE BUSH,
The White House,
Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: In your inaugural speech, and in other speeches and statements you have made, you have called attention to the urgency of the plight of the homeless in America. As Chairman of the United States Conference of Mayors Task Force on Hunger and Homelessness, I greatly appreciate that you have moved to elevate the needs of our homeless Americans to the top of our national agenda and I would like to reiterate a plan of action that I submitted to you during the presidential campaign.

Last October, I wrote to you and to Governor Dukakis to ask that the next President convene a White House Conference on Homelessness, as a way to mobilize the strong public-private partnership that is needed to end the shame of homelessness in America. This conference would bring together representatives of your administration, Congress, state and local government, the clergy, shelter and service providers, the private sector, unions, veterans' groups and community organizations to map an all out effort in which every person and every group can play a role in ending homelessness.

Together, this conference can adopt as a national goal, the commitment made in my city by the people of Boston that:

"No person shall be denied a warm bed, a hot meal, decent health care and transportation to and from shelter."

As a further goal, this conference would also consider the steps needed to provide safe, decent and affordable housing for all in need. While shelters are important, shelters are not homes and we cannot rest until we have devised a way for every homeless family—and in particular, every homeless child to have a place that they can call home.

I also believe that a White House Conference on Homelessness would be complimentary to your commitment to provide "full funding" for the Stewart B. McKinney Homeless Assistance Act as well as your support for raising the minimum wage—an action that will help many of the homeless who work full or part time jobs, and still cannot afford food or housing. As you know, the McKinney Act is an important step in providing services to the homeless, but it is no panacea in and of itself. A White House Conference on Homelessness would serve to illuminate the "thousand points of light" to which you have often referred—the dedicated individuals and organizations who give their time and money to help those in need.

Earlier this month, on behalf of the mayors of America, I released our annual report on "The Status of Hunger and Homelessness in America's Cities," which I am enclosing for your review. In our report, we found that hunger and homelessness are continuing to increase—particularly among families and veterans—however, we also found that due to the McKinney Act and expanded activity by local governments and community organizations, the increase had abated somewhat. This does not mean that we should stop to pat ourselves on the back, rather, it means that our efforts are beginning to pay dividends and that we should redouble these efforts to turn around these disturbing statistics.

Your action in convening a White House Conference on Homelessness would have the strong support of all Americans. The National League of Cities unanimously adopted this proposal during their annual meeting in Boston last December and I have received letters of support for this idea from both Democratic and Republican mayors. Further, the Heritage Foundation, a conservative "think tank," recently held a conference on homelessness at which the need for increased presidential leadership was frequently cited. The White House Conference on Homelessness could be a centerpiece of your administration's strong commitment.

Thank you for your leadership on this issue. I would appreciate the opportunity to discuss this proposal with the appropriate members of your administration.

Sincerely,

RAYMOND L. FLYNN,
Mayor of Boston.●

By Mr. BENTSEN:

S. 486. A bill to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to construct and test the Lake Meredith Salinity Control Project, New Mexico and Texas, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

LAKE MEREDITH SALINITY CONTROL PROJECT

● Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, today I am again introducing legislation to help the people of the Texas Panhandle assure themselves of a reliable supply of quality drinking water.

This bill will authorize the Bureau of Reclamation to work with the Canadian River Municipal Water Authority to reduce the salt content of the water supplied to the CRMWA's member cities. Those member cities include Amarillo, Borger, Pampa, Plainview, Lubbock, Slaton, Tahoka, O'Donnell, Lamesa, Brownfield, and Levelland. These towns have a combined population of some 430,000 people.

Water is the lifeblood of our country. In west Texas water is especially scarce and valuable. The high value which the citizens of this great area of our country place on a reliable water supply is indicated by their willingness to pay for most of the costs of this project themselves. Local citizens, with the help of the able then-State Senator BILL SARPALIUS, got the Texas State Legislature to enact a law enabling the CRMWA to sell tax-exempt revenue bonds to finance this project. I am pleased that Congressman BILL SARPALIUS is now one of the newest Members of the Texas congressional delegation and is a sponsor of the House version of this bill, along with another of my distinguished Texas colleagues, Congressman LARRY COMBEST.

The Canadian River Municipal Water Authority began delivering water from Lake Meredith to its member cities in 1968, and since the beginning there has been concern about the quality of that drinking water. The salt content has shown a generally increasing trend, with drought cycles producing chloride levels as high as 400 milligrams per liter. Health and environmental agencies generally recommend maximum chloride levels of 250 mg/L for drinking water. Cities which also have ground water available have in some cases mixed that in with the lake water to get a more acceptable water supply, but that option is more expensive and is not available to all.

Studies by private consultants and by the Bureau of Reclamation have shown that about 70 percent of the salt entering Lake Meredith originates in a shallow brine acquifer just downstream from Ute Dam near Logan, NM. This brine acquifer is under artesian pressure and is leaking into the river.

In 1980 the Bureau of Reclamation was directed by Public Law 96-375 to study this problem and report on possible solutions. This report, completed in 1985, recommended drilling wells into this acquifer and pumping brine out to reduce the artesian pressure. The most economical method of disposing of this brine is through deep injection wells of the type used in the oil industry, and there appears to be suitable geologic strata for this purpose in the area.

This project is essential if the Texas Panhandle is to have an adequate supply of acceptable quality drinking water for the future of the region. The CRMWA and its member cities are prepared to operate and maintain the project and to pay for the cost of construction, but they need the technical expertise of the Bureau of Reclamation in designing and building the project.

The bill I am introducing today will authorize funds to be appropriated to the Bureau of Reclamation to carry out the preliminary work and to supervise the construction of the project. It will also authorize the Bureau to accept funds from the CRMWA to pay for land acquisition and construction costs. The CRMWA has estimated that their part of the costs will total about $6.4 million, with the Federal portion totaling about $2 million. These figures will undoubtedly be updated by more detailed Bureau of Reclamation estimates during consideration of this bill. However, this is obviously a very heavy commitment of non-Federal funds, giving a high degree of leverage to the small Federal investment which will be required if this project is to be successful.

The people of west Texas understand that the alternative is to allow salt pollution of the region's water to continue, possibly rendering Lake Meredith useless eventually. Lack of a reliable water supply will make future economic growth very difficult, and the loss of Lake Meredith would threaten the existing economic base.

The citizens of west Texas are not asking the Federal Government for a handout. They are not asking the taxpayers to carry them. They are asking the Federal Government to work side by side with them in this endeavor and to share the essential expertise which the Bureau of Reclamation has developed through years of construction projects.

Passage of this legislation will allow this local self-help project to get started. I am pleased to be able to introduce this bill, and I urge its passage by the Senate.●

By Mr. CRANSTON (for himself and Mr. MATSUNAGA):

S. 487. A bill to include among those eligible for the prisoner-of-war medal certain individuals who were held captive in circumstances comparable to those under which persons have been held captive by enemy governments; to the Committee on Armed Services.

PRISONER OF WAR MEDAL

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, as chairman of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs, I am today introducing legislation, S. 487, to amend section 1128 of title 10, United States Code, which establishes eligibility for the prisoner-of-war medal, to incorporate the definition of prisoner of war that is utilized in title 38, United States Code, for determining eligibility for VA benefits, and thereby include among those eligible for the medal those individuals who were held captive in neutral or allied countries in situations similar to those of prisoner-of-war conditions during armed conflict. Joining with me in this legislation is fellow committee member Senator MATSUNAGA. Section 532 of Public Law 99-145, the Department of Defense Authorization Act for fiscal year 1986, directed the various Secretaries of the military departments to issue a medal to former prisoner of war. The Department of Defense has interpreted that provision, which is codified at section 1128 of title 10, as not permitting the award of this medal to individuals who were taken and held as prisoner in situations other than the classical prisoner-of-war situation during armed conflict. As a result, the medal has not been awarded to such former captives as the crewmembers of the U.S.S. Pueblo and the military personnel who were held captive in Iran during the seizure of the United States Embassy in Teheran.

On May 20, 1988, legislation I coauthored with my good friend from Florida, Senator GRAHAM, was enacted in Public Law 100-322, providing that an individual who was detained during wartime by a foreign, nonenemy government— that is, a neutral or ally—is a former POW for VA benefit purposes, if the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs determines that he or she was held under circumstances comparable to those under which persons are held as POW's by enemy governments. Therefore, individuals who previously have been turned down as ineligible for POW status for VA benefits but who satisfy the new criteria may now receive those benefits as former POW's.

In my view, a change in the criterion establishing eligibility for POW medal purposes is certainly justified as a matter of policy. There can be no doubt that the Pueblo crew members were held as prisoners under conditions as bad or worse than many other military personnel who were taken and held as prisoners during time of war. In addition, this change could bring eligibility for the former prisoner-of-war medal into conformance with the standard used for eligibility for benefits under title 38 that are provided on the basis of the veteran being a former prisoner of war.

It is my hope that this bill will enable the Pueblo crew and others with similar experiences to receive the recognition which they earned at such great personal cost—recognition that they have been denied due to the rigid definition of prisoners of war currently being applied for purposes of the medal.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to give their support to this measure. I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 487

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 1128(a) of title 10, United States Code, is amended—

(1) by striking out "or" at the end of clause (2);

(2) by striking out the period at the end of clause (3) and inserting in lieu thereof "; or"; and

(3) by adding at the end the following new clause:

"(4) by a foreign government or its agents, or a hostile force, under circumstances which the Secretary concerned finds to have been comparable to the circumstances under which persons have generally been held captive by enemy governments during periods of war.".

By Mr. FOWLER (for himself, Mr. FORD, Mr. METZENBAUM, Mr. BINGAMAN, Mr. CONRAD, Mr. KERRY, and Mr. WIRTH):

S. 488. A bill to provide Federal assistance and leadership to a program of research, development and demonstration of renewable energy and energy efficiency technologies, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

RENEWABLE ENERGY AND ENERGY EFFICIENCY TECHNOLOGY COMPETITIVENESS ACT

● Mr. FOWLER. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce the Renewable Energy and Energy Efficiency Technology Competitiveness Act. This proposed legislation reflects my long-held belief that renewable and conservation technologies are an essential component of the comprehensive, long-term energy policy our Nation must have if we are going to establish energy independence.

It is easy to forget the gas lines of the 1970's. We have proven that by letting our dependence on oil imports escalate until it exceeds that of the Arab oil embargo era. It is easy to forget the uncertainty of the oil supply the world experienced so recently during the Persian Gulf conflict. With a weak OPEC and plentiful oil production, it is even easier to ignore the limits of world oil reserves to supply our energy needs into the next century.

But I believe we are shirking a basic responsibility of foresight in government if we succumb to these Lethe-like temptations to laziness and procrastination. That is why I introduced this bill in the 100th Congress, where it came very close to final passage. At that time American servicemen were still escorting oil tankers through a war zone, coming under attack and inflicting casualties. Some of the reminders of the urgent need for action have dissipated, but the underlying portents remain the same. So today I am reintroducing this legislation and urging Congress to respond to this challenge of energy independence, instead of waiting to respond to another energy crisis.

I can think of no more opportune moment, at the beginning of a new administration, to consider this legislation which seeks to reverse policies which have allowed our development efforts in solar, photovoltaics, wind, geothermal, biomass and other promising technologies to fall into stasis and neglect.

This legislation calls for targeted renewable energy and energy efficiency research, along with development and demonstration programs to bring these ideas into the mainstream. It authorizes funding levels on a multiyear basis to provide stability in these programs. And it calls on the Department of Energy to focus on commercial applications of the most promising technologies—to translate our research, development and demonstration efforts into marketable products that can provide major help in meeting evergy demand.

Under the previous administration, very beneficial and cost-effective Department of Energy programs in conservation and development of renewables were all but eliminated, while our main competitors in the advancement of technology were not so shortsighted. The Japanese, the Germans, the Dutch and the Brazilians bolstered their support for research and development in alternative sources of energy. In the 1980's we lost our lead, to international competition, in many renewables technologies invented by Americans.

The development and marketing of these technologies can make major contributions to eliminating our trade imbalances—by reducing our need for oil imports and increasing our exports of energy technologies. The potential for marketing photovoltaics devices alone is huge in developing countries.

Many of these resources which we know how to develop can provide a virtually inexhaustible energy supply with no adverse affects on the environment. These technologies could substitute for some of the environmentally destructive energy projects undertaken by Brazil and other debtor nations in their rush for industrial development. They can stem the greenhouse effect and arrest global warming. They can also lessen our need to turn to nuclear energy before we can solve the massive, and growing, environmental problems we are experiencing in that area.

These clean sources of energy will also have direct economic benefits. We can potentially save billions on pollution control, cleanup and health care costs. We can also abate extensive damage to our natural resources—from our farms to our lakes and forests.

Developing energy efficiency and renewable energy technologies makes sense. It offers immense returns in energy independence, economic security, environmental protection, and international competitiveness. That is what I am proposing to invest in. I think it is a modest investment, one we can hardly afford not to make, and I urge my colleagues in the Senate to once again support this legislation.●

● Mr. WIRTH. Mr. President, I appreciate the opportunity to join Senator FOWLER in introducing this important bill. Eight years ago, this Nation was investing substantial resources into energy efficiency and conservation programs. The oil price shocks of the 1970's forced us to recognize that our dependence on foreign sources of oil threatens our national security as well as our economy. We also realized that it was time to roll up our sleeves to respond to these challenges. So we set the Nation's research community, Federal agencies, and industry to work to reduce our dependence on foreign energy supplies—particularly imported oil. The result of that effort is nothing short of astounding.

Improvements in energy efficiency have leveled off the Nation's energy consumption. Today, we use the same amount of energy as we used in 1973, despite enormous growth in our economy. And the United States took the lead in developing alternative sources of energy, including promising solar energy technologies.

Unfortunately, the impressive gains that have been derived from energy conservation and renewable energy research and development have been reversed by misguided budget priorities within the DOE budget over the past years. We should restore as a priority commonsense energy research that will contribute to our efforts to reduce the trade deficit, enhance our competitiveness, and protect the environment.

I am concerned that we may have lost an international competitive edge to Japan, a country that now is twice as energy efficient as the United States. Our Government should have been following policies designed to take that edge away. Instead, over the past 8 years, we have abandoned energy conservation as the cornerstone of a sound and effective energy plan.

Eight years ago we were spending more than $500 million on solar and renewable research programs. This year's budget funded these programs at $84.5 million. Similarly, when the Reagan administration began, the budget for energy conservation research and development was $343 million. Now we have an energy conservation research program funded at $86 million. We must ask ourselves: Why have we cut these programs 85 percent and 75 percent respectively?

Have these programs been sacrificed in order to balance the Federal budget? Have we realized the full benefits of energy conservation and renewable energy supplies? Has the private sector taken over leadership of the Nation's energy research and development? The answer to these questions can only be no.

If we do not reverse this trend toward reducing the critical investments we must make for future generations, we owe an apology to our children and grandchildren. For example, the U.S. world market share in photovoltaics has dropped from 80 percent in 1981 to 50 percent this year. Our international competitors, such as Japan and West Germany, have increased their expenditures on photovoltaic research and development—and they are reaping the benefits of that. We must take a sober look at today's budget realities, and readjust our priorities to invest in energy efficiency improvements and renewable energy.

In my home State of Colorado, the Solar Energy Research Institute, which was designed to be the Nation's primary Federal laboratory for solar energy research and to perform functions assigned by the Department of Energy in research, development, and testing, has had to absorb significant cuts for the last 8 years. SERI simply cannot absorb any additional cuts and continue to conduct and coordinate research and development on solar technologies which private industry cannot reasonably be expected to undertake.

Energy efficiency, solar energy, and other renewable energy technologies can enhance our industries' competitiveness in international markets and can help improve the Nation's balance of trade by reducing the need for imported oil. And as atmospheric scientists from around the world are sounding an alarm about the potentially profound threat of global warming, it is becoming increasingly clear that energy efficiency and alternatives to fossil fuels must be found to preserve and protect our environment.

This bill would provide stable, multiyear funding for these research programs, enabling them to plan programs that often take several years to develop. In addition, this legislation would provide the impetus to expand the use of public/private partnerships to demonstrate the commercial feasibility of energy efficiency and renewable energy technologies. I look forward to working with Senator FOWLER in passing this vital bill and to developing a comprehensive national energy policy that emphasizes the critical importance of energy conservation and alternative sources of energy.●

By Mr. KENNEDY (for himself, Mr. KASTEN, Mr. LEAHY, Mr. INOUYE, Mr. SIMON, Mr. PELL, Mr. LAUTENBERG, Mr. METZENBAUM, Mr. GRASSLEY, Mr. EXON, and Mr. D'AMATO):

S. 489. A bill to transfer certain funds available for State legalization assistance programs to programs to assist refugees; to the Committee on Appropriations.

TRANSFER OF CERTAIN FUNDS FOR REFUGEE ASSISTANCE

● Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I am pleased to join with my colleague from the Appropriations Committee, Senator KASTEN, as well as many other Senators, in introducing this bill to deal with the refugee crisis that has developed in our program for Soviet refugees.

An emergency situation has now developed in the flow of Jewish refugees and others from the Soviet Union. The number suddenly being allowed to leave the Soviet Union will nearly double the total last year, and will be 50 percent more than was budgeted or planned for this fiscal year.

During the President's consultations with the Judiciary Committees last September, on refugee admissions under the terms of the Refugee Act, the administration proposed a ceiling for the Soviet Union of 18,000 which was increased to 25,000 in December, after emergency consultations. But, at the rate of the current flow of Soviet refugees, those numbers will be exhausted by the end of this month. No funding will be available, and the program will come to a halt.

Clearly, we have a humanitarian as well as a foreign policy interest in responding to this emergency. As chairman of the Subcommittee on Immigration and Refugee Affairs of the Judiciary Committee, we are prepared to use the emergency provisions of the Refugee Act to provide the additional admission numbers, but this is only half the problem. The equally important other half is adequate funding for their processing and resettlement. If additional funding is not found by next month, refugees will be turned back, left to languish in Rome at great cost in care and maintenance, and the voluntary agencies involved in the program will be forced to close down.

We are introducing a bill to deal with this crisis by drawing on already appropriated funds that the administration proposes to rescind. The fund is the State legalization impact assistance grants created and funded by the Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1986. The administration proposes to rescind $300 million of this fund in fiscal year 1990 and again in fiscal year 1991. Furthermore, for fiscal year 1989, of the $665 million available under the SLIAG Program, CBO reports that less than $70 million will probably be actually spent.

We propose to shift $150 million of these available funds to support the processing and resettlement of an additional 25,000 Soviet Jews and other refugees—the number estimated that will be moving through the end of this fiscal year. This will cover the costs of their processing and resettlement by the voluntary agencies, as well as State and local costs.

Clearly, longer term solutions must be found to deal with Soviet migration. But if we do not respond now to this emergency, we will be turning our backs to our longstanding commitment to assist Soviet refugees.

Mr. President, in introducing this legislation, it is not my intent to hamper the efforts of States to assist beneficiaries of the recent immigration amnesty through the State Legalization Impact Assistance Grant Program. State expenses reimbursed by the program to date have been so low that the President has proposed a $300 million rescission in each of the next 2 years.

It is my intent to make it easier—not harder—for States to have access to the SLIAG Program for the legitimate expenses. And I am committed to making the adjustments to the program which many States are currently seeking, as well as to pursuing for the future any additional funding to States as a result of our emergency response to Soviet emigration.

To this end, I am introducing today separate legislation as a starting point for discussions regarding needed changes in the SLIAG Program.

Let me also note that this emergency response is the result of a healthy partnership between the Federal Government and the private sector. Organizations involved in the resettlement of refugees from the Soviet Union have launched tremendous fund-raising efforts of their own to match the funds we propose to appropriate to the program.

Mr. President, I ask that the text of the bill be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 489

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) of the unobligated funds appropriated by section 204(a)(1) of the Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1986 (relating to State Legalization Impact Assistance Grants)—

(1) $50,000,000 are hereby transferred to the Director of the Office of Refugee Resettlement of the Department of Health and Human Services for use only for grants under the "Voluntary Agency Programs" and for grants to States authorized by section 412 of the Immigration and Nationality Act (relating to domestic resettlement of and assistance to refugees) and for such other assistance authorized by such section as the Director may deem necessary; and

(2) $150,000,000 are hereby transferred to the account under the Department of State entitled "United States Emergency Refugee and Migration Assistance Fund".

(b) Amounts transferred under subsection (a)—

(1) shall be administered in accordance with all the laws, rules, and regulations applicable to the accounts to which the funds were transferred, except that the dollar limitation on appropriated funds contained in the second sentence of section 2(c)(2) of the Migration and Refugee Assistance Act of 1962 shall not apply; and

(2) shall remain available for obligation and expenditure for the same period of time for which funds are available under the accounts to which the funds were transferred.●

● Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, I am pleased to join with Senators KENNEDY, KASTEN, and others as an original cosponsor of this bill which proposes funding for the processing and resettlement of the unexpectedly large number of Soviet refugees being permitted to leave the Soviet Union this year. Without this money, funding will soon run out and the admissions program for Soviet refugees will come to a halt within a matter of weeks.

Earlier this year, I, along with 53 other Senators wrote to the administration to urge them to address this serious problem, and I ask that a copy of this letter be inserted in the RECORD following my remarks.

The bill draws on already appropriated funds that the administration proposes to rescind. The funds being drawn upon are the State legalization impact assistance grants [SLIAG] created and funded by the Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1986. The administration proposes to rescind $300 million of this fund in fiscal year 1990 and again in fiscal year 1991.

For fiscal year 1989, of the $665 million available under the SLIAG Program, CBO reports that less than $70 million will probably actually be spent. This bill will shift $150 million of these available funds to support the processing and resettlement of an additional 25,000 Soviet Jews and other refugees—the number estimated that will be moving through the end of this fiscal year. This will cover the costs of their processing and resettlement by the voluntary agencies, as well as State and local costs.

Why do we need this money? It is needed to address the refugee emergency that has developed in the flow of Jewish refugees and others from the Soviet Union. The number of Soviet Jews allowed to leave the Soviet Union has nearly doubled since last year. It will be 50 percent more than was budgeted or planned for this fiscal year.

Last year, refugee admissions were set at 18,000 for the Soviet Union, and that was increased to 25,000 in December following emergency consultations with Congress. But, given the current rate at which Soviet refugees are seeking to enter this country, those numbers will be exhausted by the end of this month. No funding for these refugees will be available and the Refugee Program will come to a halt with respect to these people. The Judiciary Committee is prepared to use the emergency consultation provisions of the Refugee Act to provide the additional admission numbers. But additional numbers are only half the battle. There must be more funding, which this bill provides.

We must respond to this emergency. It would be ironic indeed that just at the time that the United States human rights policies have met with a good deal of success, especially in the area of freedom of emigration from the Soviet Union, our own lack of commitment to funding would impede the departure, migration, and resettlement of those the Soviets are permitting to leave.

Our actions must not send the wrong signals to freedom-loving people around the world. The United States has always been a beacon of hope to those struggling for fundamental human rights. Now, when our efforts have begun to bear fruit, and the Soviet Union has begun to grant thousands of citizens long-awaited exit visas, we must not be the cause of delaying these refugees' journey to freedom any more.

This bill makes sure that we don't. I urge my colleagues to swiftly pass it.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Hon. JAMES BAKER,
Secretary of State,
Washington, DC.
Hon. RICHARD THORNBURGH,
U.S. Attorney General,
Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY AND MR. ATTORNEY GENERAL: We are writing to express our concern about the problems that have arisen regarding the emigration and resettlement of Soviet refugees.

Our major concern is that, as of the end of January, over 500 Soviet Jews have been denied refugee status in Rome, a departure from the longstanding U.S. practice of considering all Soviet Jews to be refugees. Our second concern is that Soviet emigres seeking visas in Moscow have been told to expect delays of a year or more in processing their applications. Personnel ceilings notwithstanding, is there not a way to deal with this backlog so that the U.S. government does not replace the Soviet government as the obstacle to departure?

We realize that the substantial and unexpected increase in Soviet emigration has placed new strains on our agencies' ability to process and resettle refugees. It is ironic, however, that just at the time that the United States' human rights policies have met with a good deal of success, especially in regard to freedom of emigration from the Soviet Union, it is our own bureaucratic difficulties that are impeding the departure, migration and resettlement of those the Soviets are permitting to leave. Resolution of these problems must be found quickly.

The attempts being made by the State Department to find additional numbers and dollars and the initiative it took to work with the Office of Refugee Resettlement (ORR) at HHS are appreciated. We are all aware of the pressure created by the budget deficit and the need to exercise fiscal restraint.

It is disturbing, however, that the Department has chosen to open one door by closing another. We refer to the decision to reallocate 6,500 refugee slots from Southeast Asia to the Soviet Union. This decision sends a very negative message to the Vietnamese government and to the families of thousands of Indo-Chinese people who are already approved for the Orderly Departure Program or who are in first asylum countries.

In the spirit of bipartisanship and cooperation, we make the following suggestions for dealing with these problems in the short term.

First, the Refugee Act of 1980 specifies a procedure for dealing with unexpected increases in the refugee population, the emergency midyear consultation. We urge you to call for such a consultation so that the Administration and Congress can together determine the appropriate ceiling, funding levels and funding sources to accommodate the projected Soviet refugee flow in FY 1989. The private sector is already preparing a major campaign to raise additional private funds to supplement its annual fundraising efforts which raise millions for the resettlement of Soviet Jews in this country.

Second, there is a need for additional Immigration and Naturalization Service officers, particularly Russian speaking officers in Rome, to help speed up processing. Since this problem first arose, there has been a reduction in waiting time for interviews with INS. However, additional officers could shorten the stay in Rome even more, at significant savings for both the federal government and the private sector agencies.

Third, we call on the new Administration to reverse its departure from its longstanding practice of considering all Soviet Jews as refugees. This policy is founded on a long history of discrimination, anti-Semitism, ant-Zionism, and restricted opportunities for Jews in the Soviet Union. The reforms initiated by President Gorbachev are encouraging, but have yet to take hold in the daily lives of Soviet Jews and other religious minorities. In fact, one byproduct of glasnost is that extremist groups, including virulent anti-Semites, are growing increasingly outspoken. The United States should not modify its position on such a sensitive issue as refugee status until real change has taken root in the Soviet Union.

Our actions must not send the wrong signals to freedom-loving people around the world. The United States has always been a beacon of hope to those struggling for fundamental human rights. For years, we have fought for the right of Soviet citizens to emigrate. Time and again, our leaders have insisted that Soviet barriers to emigration are a major obstacle to improved relations between our two countries.

Now, when our efforts have begun to bear fruit and the Soviet Union has begun to grant thousands of citizens long-awaited exit visas, we cannot be the cause of delaying these refugees' journey to freedom any longer.

Finally, as we begin to work on the budget for FY 1990, we hope that we will project next year's refugee flow with as much accuracy as is possible in this changing area so that we do not find ourselves in this very difficult position a year from now. While this may mean increases in funding, and a readiness on the part of all involved federal agencies to share the financial burden, it is better to budget realistically in the beginning than have to try to find additional funds late in the year.

We appreciate your cooperation on this most urgent matter, and look forward to hearing from you as soon as possible. We also look forward to meeting with representatives of your Administration to discuss our suggestions.

● Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, we must do something about the emergency which has resulted from an increased flow of Soviet refugees, and from the shortage of funds for programs designed to help those refugees.

The legislation which I am introducing today with Senators KENNEDY, LEAHY, and others is one answer to this problem. This proposal provides necessary funding for the increased number of refugees both in the Domestic Resettlement Program and for the international part of the program. We recommend that funding for the program be secured by transfer from funds which have heretofore been made available for State legalization impact assistance grants—funding which the administration has recommended for rescission.

Mr. President, my colleagues and I, while anxious to solve this problem as quickly as possible, are open to any suggestions which Members or the administration may have about how to proceed. I emphasize this point because there are some who may have specific concerns with respect to the State legalization impact assistance grants. If there are better sources of funding, we welcome suggestions in that vein—however, I believe all of us agree that something must be done, and soon, to relieve the pressure created by this dramatic increase in Soviet refugees.

Mr. President, even with the adoption of this legislation, there remains much to be done in this arena. Senator LEAHY and I, as the chairman and ranking member of the Foreign Operations Appropriations Subcommittee are looking at a fiscal year 1990 budget request for these programs. We believe there will be between a $100 million and $150 million shortage of the funds needed to adequately take care of Indochinese, Soviet, and other refugees, as well as assistance programs under those accounts.

Mr. President, I want to compliment Senators KENNEDY and LEAHY for their continuing leadership on this issue and I look forward to working with them on this and related matters in the future. It is our hope that our colleagues will join us in this effort by cosponsoring this legislation.●

● Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my distinguished colleagues, Senators KENNEDY and KASTEN in offering this bill to relieve a growing human tragedy in Rome. Unprecedented numbers of Soviet refugees are arriving for processing and resettlement, and we face a serious funding shortfall in helping them move on to their new homes. This bill will require the executive branch to use up to $150 million in unexpended funds appropriated to States for immigration assistance under the authorization of the Immigration Reform and Control Act. Without this legislation, the administration proposes to seek a recission of those unexpended funds.

I would point out, Mr. President, that this measure, urgent as it is, is only a short term solution. After many years of demands by United States administrations, Republican and Democratic, that the Soviet Union allow freedom of emigration, refugees are being allowed to leave the Soviet Union in numbers far exceeding what anyone anticipated a year ago. I have heard estimates that we could see as many as 40,000 or more in fiscal 1990. However, the administration's foreign operations budget request for the coming fiscal year seeks a funding level of $371 million, sufficient only to process and resettle 25,000 Soviet refugees, within an overall total of 84,000 for refugees worldwide.

This request is totally inadequate to the needs. It may be as much as $100 to $150 million too low. I look forward to working with my good friend and ranking member of the Foreign Operations Subcommittee, Senator KASTEN, in finding solutions to this shortfall.

I applaud the intention of the distinguished chairman of the Judiciary Subcommittee on Immigration and Refugee Affairs to seek an emergency consultation with the administration on how to find sufficient immigration admission numbers to deal with this growing backlog. Several of us have written the administration urging such a consultation.

I urge all Senators to join us in support of this measure.●

By Mr. LAUTENBERG:

S. 490. A bill to amend the Occupational Safety and Health Act of 1977 to increase the civil penalties imposed for certain violations of such act, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

INCREASING CIVIL PENALTIES FOR CERTAIN VIOLATIONS OF THE OCCUPATIONAL SAFETY AND HEALTH ACT

● Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation, the OSHA Civil Penalty Inflation Adjustment Act of 1989, to increase the maximum authorized civil penalties under the Occupational Safety and Health Act to account for inflation.

Mr. President, the Occupational Safety and Health Act [OSHA] was enacted in 1970 to assure safe and healthful working conditions for all working Americans. Yet since the OSHA was enacted, more than 100,000 workers have lost their lives because of unsafe working conditions. Each year, an estimated 7,000 to 11,000 more are killed on the job. Thousands of others die from the long-term effects of occupational illnesses.

The OSHA gives the Occupational Safety and Health Administration [OSHA] broad authority to establish health and safety standards. Under the law, OSHA is responsible for inspecting worksites and identifying unsafe practices and equipment. Those who violate OSHA safety and health standards may be prosecuted criminally, or they may be assessed civil penalties.

The sanction of criminal prosecution, in practice, has apparently been an inadequate tool for protecting worker safety. A 1988 report by the House Committee on Government Operations found that since OSHA was created in 1970, there have been a mere 14 criminal prosecutions under the act and only 10 convictions. No one has ever spent a day in jail for violating OSHA. Not surprisingly, the committee concluded that—

> The criminal penalty provisions of the OSHA, as presently written and as enforced by OSHA, provides (sic) no deterrent to employers violating the statute.

The failure of criminal sanctions to deter violators highlights the importance of the other available sanction—civil penalties—in protecting worker safety. Unlike criminal sanctions, OSHA can directly assess civil penalties without having to rely on the Department of Justice, whose prosecutional resources are severely strained.

Civil penalties have the potential to provide a significant deterrent to those who would violate worker safety and health standards. However, their effectiveness as a deterrent has been severely limited because inflation has dramatically reduced their real value.

In 1970, when OSHA was enacted, the Consumer Price Index was at 38.8. By December 1988, that figure had increased to 120.5. That's an increase of over 210 percent. As a result, the existing civil penalties are worth less than one-third of their original value.

This bill would increase all OSHA civil penalties to account for inflation since they were originally enacted. Currently, violators are subject to penalties of up to $1,000 per violation, or up to $10,000 for each "willful or repeated" violation. Under this bill, the $1,000 maximum would be increased to $3,000 and the $10,000 maximum would be increased to $30,000.

In addition, the bill establishes a mechanism for periodically increasing the level of OSHA civil penalties to account for inflation. Every 5 years the Secretary of Labor would revise the maximum allowable level of penalties to account for price increases—as measured by the Consumer Price Index—over the previous 5-year period. The adjusted penalty maximums would be published in the Federal Register at least 30 days prior to their effective date.

Mr. President, maintaining the deterrent effect of OSHA penalties is important to protect worker safety. But it is also important to protect honest, law-abiding businesses.

The fact is, meeting OSHA's requirements for a safe workplace often involves a substantial investment. And honest businesses are making that investment. Sometimes, though, their competitors aren't. And with weak sanctions, they're getting away with it.

Mr. President, as a society, we have an obligation to the honest business. An obligation to make sure that its competitors can't exploit weakened sanctions to gain an unfair competitive advantage. This bill will help us meet that obligation.

Mr. President, indexing OSHA penalties will provide another important benefit: it will help reduce the budget deficit. The Congressional Budget Office has estimated that the proposed increases could produce as much as $20 million annually in additional revenue.

Some may argue that indexing put the level of worker safety sanctions on automatic pilot. Yet this misses the key point—penalties are already on automatic pilot—an arbitrary, unpredictable pilot called inflation. This bill will take policy off this unstable automatic pilot and keep it on the course set by Congress.

Congress has enough to do without having to repeatedly reaffirm existing policy and maintain the value of penalties. Each year we struggle to adopt a budget and pass the necessary appropriations bills. Also, even if legislation to adjust penalties reaches the Senate or House floor, a small minority in the Congress—or the President—can effectively block legislation. It thus makes sense to ensure the maintenance of penalty values without the need for repeated congressional action.

The fact that OSHA penalty values have been allowed to deteriorate so substantially reflects a general governmentwide problem. We in Congress like to talk tough when we set penalties for violating laws. But all too often, once we enact penalties, we forget about them. They get lost in the thick volumes of the United States Code, never to be seen or heard from again.

Many of these penalties are designed to meet important public needs: To keep our air and water clean, our children protected from dangerous products, our transportation systems safe. The problem is that as these penalties sit on the shelf, inflation dramatically erodes their deterrent effect.

It simply doesn't make sense that consumers must pay higher prices for everything from food to health care—but those who break the law do not.

I will be introducing separate legislation, as I have in the past, to establish a mechanism under which all penalties could be raised periodically to account for inflation. My bill, the Federal Civil Penalty Inflation Adjustment Act, would require the President to provide Congress every 5 years with a list of all civil penalties and the levels to which they should be increased for inflation. The bill was the subject of hearings last February, at which time then Deputy OMB Director Joseph Wright called it "a good piece of legislation that should be passed." The AFL-CIO's Building and Construction Trades Department and several consumer and environmental groups also expressed support for the bill.

The Civil Penalty Inflation Adjustment Act establishes a reporting mechanism; it does not raise penalty levels. However, rather than waiting for the comprehensive list of penalty adjustments that the proposal would require, I believe Congress should act promptly to increase particularly important civil penalties, such as those that protect worker safety.

Mr. President, the OSHA Civil Penalty Inflation Adjustment Act of 1989 would bring OSHA penalties up to date and strengthen protections for our Nation's workers. It also would keep those protections strong in the future. If enacted, many lives would be saved—and many families would be spared needless grief and hardship.

I urge my colleagues to support the bill and ask unanimous consent that a copy of the bill be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 490

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of American in Congress assembled,

By Mr. CRANSTON:

S.J. Res. 69. Joint resolution designating, April 8, 1989, as "Chief Justice Earl Warren Day"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

CHIEF JUSTICE EARL WARREN DAY

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, today I am introducing a resolution that would proclaim April 8, 1989, as "Chief Justice Earl Warren Day." This year marks the 20th anniversary of Chief Justice Warren's retirement from the Supreme Court, and it seems appropriate that we should take this opportunity to recognize the special contributions which he has made to our country.

Chief Justice Warren was clearly one of the outstanding public servants of the 20th century. He began his remarkable career as a deputy city attorney for the city of Oakland, and ended his days in California as Governor. However, it was not until President Dwight Eisenhower tapped Earl Warren for Chief Justice of the Supreme Court that his real impact on the entire Nation was felt.

Under his leadership, the Warren Court set the United States on a new course of racial equality. Chief Justice Warren and his colleagues presided over the most dramatic and important civil rights cases this country has ever known. Warren's commitment to equal rights was firmly set in his decision of Brown versus Board of Education. It was Earl Warren and his Court that ended legal discrimination in America. Warren was also the primary force in protecting the rights of the accused. In the case of Miranda versus Arizona, the Court ruled that individuals were innocent until proven guilty and that they deserved the same rights as all other citizens.

On April 8 and 9, 1989, many distinguished members of the public and private sectors will be meeting in San Francisco to honor Earl Warren on the 20th anniversary of his retirement from the Supreme Court. This commemorative weekend will include a dinner where the first public screening of the PBS documentary, "Superchief: The Life and Legacy of Earl Warren" will be shown. Also, a symposium on the legacy of the Warren Court will be held to debate the merits of the man and his Court.

Mr. President, I believe that we too should participate in this event by passing this resolution which I am introducing today. It's clear that Chief Justice Warren has made a significant contribution to our country by his service on the Court as well as in public office. This resolution I am introducing today is our statement of gratitude to Chief Justice Warren, and I urge my colleagues to support it. Identical legislation is being introduced in the House of Representatives today by Congressmen MATSUI and LOWERY.

Mr. President I ask that the text of the resolution be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the Joint Resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 69

Whereas Chief Justice Earl Warren was a dedicated servant to the public for over 50 years;

Whereas Chief Justice Warren extended the principles of the Bill of Rights to every United States citizen;

Whereas Chief Justice Warren strove for equality for the poor and underprivileged:

Whereas Chief Justice Warren embodied the pursuit for equal rights for all United States citizens regardless of race, color, or creed;

Whereas Chief Justice Warren fought for the promise of an equal voice in government for all United States citizens;

Whereas Chief Justice Warren worked for the guarantee of a fair trial; and

Whereas Chief Justice Warren committed himself to these ideals and began a new era of true equal justice under the law: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled; That April 8, 1989, is designated as "Chief Justice Earl Warren Day", and the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe such day with appropriate ceremonies and activities.

ADDITIONAL COSPONSORS

At the request of Mr. CRANSTON, the name of the Senator from Hawaii [Mr. INOUYE] was added as a cosponsor of S. 14, a bill to provide for a grant program to assist eligible consortia in providing services to individuals with acquired immunodeficiency syndrome or AIDS-related complex.

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 16—RELATING TO THE RELEASE OF POLITICAL PRISONERS BY THE GOVERNMENT OF VIETNAM

Mr. BOSCHWITZ submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

S. CON. RES. 16

Whereas, fourteen years have passed since the end of the Vietnam conflict;

Whereas, despite the release of some political prisoners over the past year, many remain imprisoned in Vietnamese reeducation camps, and thousands of families do not know the fate of their loved ones;

Whereas, the Socialist Republic of Vietnam has signed an agreement with the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees to assist in the reunification of families;

Whereas, despite General Secretary Nguyen Van Linh's public assertion that released prisoners who wish to leave Vietnam would be free to do so, only very few have been allowed to leave;

Whereas, the United States has made it clear that it is willing to accept these prisoners; and

Whereas, the Vietnamese Foreign Minister Nguyen Co Thach has previously accepted a United States proposal to discuss this resetttlement of Vietnamese released from reeducation camps: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Congress calls on the Government of Vietnam—

(1) to make public the names of all political prisoners held in reeducation camps;

(2) to release immediately all political prisoners still held;

(3) to honor its commitment to allow the emigration of all political prisoners; and

(4) to implement resettlement of political prisoners promptly and efficiently by establishing a special program for processing the cases of those released from reeducation camps as was done in the case of the American children.

SENATE RESOLUTION 73—RELATIVE TO AVAILABILITY OF FUNDS FOR STATE LEGALIZATION IMPACT ASSISTANCE GRANTS

Mr. KENNEDY submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

S. RES. 73

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that—

(1) funds appropriated by section 204(a)(1) of the Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1986 (relating to State Legalization Impact Assistance Grants) should not be rescinded or deferred; and

(2) every effort should be made to improve the efficiency and accessibility of such funds to assist State and local governments in their efforts on behalf of newly legalized aliens.

● Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I am introducing today a resolution which is a brief beginning to what I believe will be an important initiative to help State and local communities cope with the impact of immigration.

This resolution opposes the administration's decision to rescind funds made available to States in the Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1986—the so-called State Legalization Impact Assistance Grant [SLIAG] Program. The President's budget recommends a $600 million reduction in this program over the next 2 fiscal years.

This grant program was an important element of the 1986 act. It was designed to assist States and localities over a 4-year period with expenses incurred as a result of the recent immigration "amnesty" program.

Mr. President, it is my intention to use the resolution as a starting point for considering any adjustments which may be advisable in the SLIAG Program. We developed the program as part of the 1986 act with little concept of precisely who would be legalized and how many. Now that the amnesty doors are closed and all the applications are in, we have a better sense of the kinds of activities that should be supported under the SLIAG Program.

As chairman of the Subcommittee on Immigration and Refugee Affairs, I will be exercising our oversight responsibilities over the coming weeks to examine this and other aspects of the 1986 act. There are a number of issues for the subcommittee to pursue, and it is my hope to complete this process soon.

In the meantime, this resolution is a starting point. Much of substance on the use of these funds will likely be added in the days ahead. But I believe it is important to get the process going.●

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

LIMIT THE USE OF BROKERED DEPOSITS

● Mr. MURKOWSKI. Mr. President, on February 9, 1989, I introduced S. 398, a bill to limit the use of federally insured brokered deposits by financially troubled banks and savings and loan institutions. As I stated then, the use of brokered deposits, which are federally insured certificates of deposit that are marketed nationwide by financial institutions through the use of a broker, has greatly contributed to the severity of this Nation's deposit insurance crisis. Brokered deposits, when used by financially unsound institutions, drain the FSLIC and FDIC insurance funds, inflate banking costs, and encourage funds to flow to poorly managed institutions.

Mr. President, it pleases me to see that Chairman Seidman of the FDIC, in testimony yesterday before the Senate Banking Committee, recognized the need to curb the use of brokered deposits. Chairman Seidman undoubtedly recognizes that troubled institutions frequently take excessive risks with their use of brokered deposits and leave the taxpayers to suffer the consequences.

In fact, Mr. President, an article in today's Wall Street Journal vividly highlights the excesses of brokered deposits. The article states that of the eight thrifts currently paying the highest rates on 6 months, $100,000 certificates of deposit, seven carry the lowest thrift-quality ranking.

Mr. President, I ask that the entire article be printed in the RECORD and that this body join me in putting an end to the reckless use of brokered deposits.

The article follows:

[From the Wall Street Journal]

LIMITS PLANNED ON BROKERED DEPOSITS' USE

FDIC'S CHIEF, CRITICS CITE SUCH DEPOSITS IN BANKS THAT FAIL AND S&L CRISIS

(By Paulette Thomas)

WASHINGTON.—Banks are likely to see new limits placed on the use of brokered deposits—huge deposits that gravitate toward premiums in market interest rates—said William Seidman, chairman of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corp.

Industry experts have criticized the use of brokered deposits for contributing to the chaos in the savings and loan industry. Some institutions use them to expand their deposit base exponentially in a matter of months, and then invest in risky, high yielding ventures to fund the interest on the $100,000 blocks of government-insured deposits.

In the past, brokered deposits have also been a serious problem for banks. "In banks that failed we discovered big levels of brokered deposits," an FDIC spokesman said.

Mr. Seidman, during questioning before the Senate Banking Committee, said he expects interest rates paid by banks and thrifts to continue climbing, because they are rising generally. But he said the FDIC will propose a rule to require banks that plan to expand their deposit base through the high-rate brokered deposits to notify the FDIC in advance for approval.

Banks must currently report their level of brokered deposits, if they exceed 5% of deposits, the FDIC spokesman said.

The competition for the deposits, brokered by institutions such as Merrill Lynch & Co. and Charles Schwab & Co., continues to drive up rates, particularly for weak institutions seeking liquidity. Of the eight thrifts paying the highest rates on six-month, $100,000 certificates of deposit, seven carry the lowest thrift-quality ranking, according to 100 Highest Yields, a weekly newsletter monitoring interest rates paid by financial institutions.

The Bush administration savings-and-loan overhaul plan being considered in Congress would also give the FDIC the authority to restrict brokered deposits in thrifts, Mr. Seidman said, because the FDIC would administer the thrift insurance fund.

An announcement yesterday by Mr. Seidman's FDIC and the thrifts' Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corp. illustrated that brokered deposits can be abused. The agencies said they received a $10.4 million settlement in a lawsuit against former New York money broker Mario Renda, who testified before Congress as an expert witness in 1984 about money brokerage. Under the settlement, Mr. Renda, his wife and 14 corporations they controlled admitted to defrauding banks and pension funds.

Aside from the $10.4 million civil settlement, much of it in real estate holdings, Mr. Renda also agreed to a $9.9 million judgment as restitution to the FDIC in criminal proceedings, the agencies said. Mr. Renda couldn't be reached for comment.

Mr. Seidman also recommended three specific changes in the administration plan, while also urging Congress to approve it as quickly as possible. Mr. Seidman singled out, for example, the bill's provision to allow the president to appoint and remove the chairman and vice chairman of the new FDIC. The FDIC "could be controlled by the administration," he said, and become subject to political winds. Currently, the FDIC board elects the chairman, and there is no vice chairman.

He also said specific limits should be imposed on the amount of debt and other obligations the FDIC could issue. Mr. Seidman proposed a $7 billion limit, and a restriction against committing to more than it had resources to pay. The FDIC has about $6 billion in obligations. He also said quarterly FDIC reports should be issued only to the Treasury, instead of other agencies as well, to ease paperwork requirements.

ARCTIC COASTAL PLAIN PUBLIC LANDS LEASING ACT OF 1989

● Mr. MURKOWSKI. Mr. President, yesterday, Senator STEVENS and I introduced the Arctic Coastal Plain Public Lands Leasing Act of 1989.

AUTHORIZES ENVIRONMENTALLY COMPATIBLE LEASING OF COASTAL PLAIN

The purpose of the bill is reflected in its title. It authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to competitively lease the public lands on the coastal plain of the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge for environmentally sound oil and gas exploration, development and production.

ANWR IS LARGE—19 MILLION ACRES—SIZE OF SOUTH CAROLINA

Mr. President, for those Members who may have forgotten, the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge—ANWR—is located in the extreme northeast corner of my home State of Alaska. It is the Nation's second largest wildlife refuge: Comprised of some 19 million acres; 17 million acres of the refuge lie in the east portion of the Brooks Mountain Range. The remaining 2 million acres lie on the coastal plain—between the north face of the Brooks Range and the Beaufort Sea.

EIGHT MILLION ACRES OF WILDERNESS

Nearly 45 percent of the refuge—8 million acres—has been designated by Congress as wilderness. There are more than 7.5 million acres of wilderness in the mountains and nearly 500,000 acres in the coastal plain.

ONE AND A HALF MILLION ACRES NOT IN WILDERNESS TO BE LEASED

The only area subject to leasing by our legislation is the 1.5 million acres of the coastal plain that is not in wilderness. The remaining 17.5 million acres of the refuge would be off-limits to leasing.

IDENTICAL TO S. 1217 INTRODUCED BY SENATOR STEVENS AND ME LAST YEAR

The legislation we are introducing today is identical to S. 1217, the ANWR leasing bill introduced by Senator STEVENS and me last year and the foundation for S. 2214, the ANWR leasing bill reported favorably by the Energy and Natural Resources Committee in the 100th Congress. S. 2214 was developed after nine comprehensive hearings and numerous markup sessions.

The Parliamentarian has advised that a bill similar to S. 2214 would be referred to the Environment and Public Works Committee. Although I have great respect for my colleagues on that committee, I want to take full advantage of the knowledge gained through the Energy Committee hearing process last Congress. I am confident that the Energy Committee, with its collective wisdom and experience on this issue, will favorably report an ANWR leasing bill that encourages environmentally sound development, just as they did last year.

Since S. 1217 was referred to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources last Congress, the bill we are introducing today will also be referred to the Energy Committee.

ANWR LEASING HAS BEEN DEBATED FOR 15 YEARS

The issue of leasing the coastal plain of ANWR has been debated for more than 15 years. It was a major issue during the years of congressional debate preceding passage of the Alaska National Interest Lands Conservation Act [ANILCA]. Volumes of data on the pros and con of oil and gas leasing were researched, written, presented, and studied during those years. The result? A compromise directing the Department of the Interior to study the issue for another 5 to 10 years.

The Department carried out its mandate for additional study and, 8 years after ANILCA was enacted, recommended to the Congress that oil and gas leasing be authorized on the coastal plain.

TIME IS RIGHT TO AUTHORIZE LEASING

Mr. President, the truth is, we have studied and debated this issue long enough. It is now time to make the decision. It is time to authorize environmentally compatible leasing in the most promising oil and gas prospect in North America.

LEASING OPPONENTS HAVE BEEN WRONG BEFORE

Those opposed to environmentally sound leasing of the coastal plain belong to the same groups that, 15 to 20 years ago, predicted dire environmental consequences if the Trans-Alaska pipeline were constructed. Yet Congress, by 1 vote in the Senate, decided to expeditiously move forward on that project. Today, TAPS carries 2 million barrels of crude oil per day—one-quarter of our domestic production from the North Slope of Alaska to Tidewater where it is loaded on tankers bound for the Continental United States. It has transported nearly 6 billion barrels of crude oil over the last 12 years. And, the predicted dire environmental disasters have not occurred.

One should ask, Mr. President, what our energy security situation would be today, if TAPS had not been constructed?

ENDICOTT SHOWS ABILITY FOR ENVIRONMENTALLY SOUND DEVELOPMENT

In deciding this issue, we do not need to limit ourselves to estimating the probable impacts of oil and gas leasing in ANWR. We have a real life demonstration next door to ANWR at Prudhoe Bay that we can learn from. Last February the Endicott Field at Prudhoe Bay came on line as the ninth largest oil field in the United States. That field produces more than 100,000 barrels of crude oil per day from two islands with a total surface of 55 acres.

FULL DEVELOPMENT OF ANWR NO LARGER THAN DULLES AIRPORT

Mr. President, under current technology, if the entire 1½ million acres of the coastal plain were brought into full production—a highly unlikely event—the total area directly impacted by roads, pipelines, and facilities would be less than 12,500 acres. To put this in perspective, the entire refuge is four-fifths the size of the State of Virginia. The Dulles International Airport complex covers more than 10,000 acres of Virginia countryside. Envision Dulles Airport as the only presence of man in the eastern 80 percent of Virginia and you can begin to appreciate the minimal impact full leasing would have on ANWR.

LEASING ANWR MUST BE PART OF ANY NATIONAL ENERGY POLICY

We are also told that we ought to enact a national energy policy before deciding to lease ANWR. The opponents of leasing in ANWR claim that such a policy would demonstrate that the potential oil and gas reserves of ANWR are not needed; that we can achieve the same amount of energy through other means, such as conservation.

NO ENERGY POLICY CAN IGNORE FUTURE NEED FOR OIL AND GAS RESOURCES

Mr. President, I have in the past and will continue to support the efforts to require and encourage conservation and the use of alternative energies in America. I also, however, support the environmentally sound development of our domestic oil and gas reserves. I am not robbing Peter to pay Paul, I am supporting a balanced energy policy for our country. As unsavory as it may seem to the environmental organizations, we are a nation dependent on petroleum products. We are trying to change that; but until we do, we need oil and we must make realistic choices now to provide it in the future for the sake of our economic well-being and our national security.

OIL IMPORTS NOW EXCEED DOMESTIC PRODUCTION; EXCEED 50 PERCENT OF CONSUMPTION

In December 1988, for the first time in history, the amount of oil we imported exceeded 50 percent of the amount of oil consumed in the United States. If we refuse to provide supplies of oil from domestic sources, we will be forced to depend upon foreign sources for greater and greater amounts of petroleum—perhaps as much as 60 percent by the mid-1990's.

ANWR MAY OFFSET EXCESSIVE RELIANCE ON IMPORTED OIL

It is inconceivable that we would eliminate the most promising oil and gas prospect in North America as an option before we even know the extent of its reserves.

ANWR DECISION CONCERNS APPROPRIATE USE OF PUBLIC LANDS

The real issue in the ANWR debate is not about energy policy. Any rational energy policy would encourage the sound exploration and production of ANWR. Nor is the issue about impact on the environment. Our experience at Prudhoe Bay, Endicott and TAP's has laid that issue to rest.

Mr. President, the real issue is whether this 1½ million acres of public lands should be opened for true multiple use, including environmentally sensitive development of potential oil and gas resources; or whether we should declare this area wilderness and prohibit any utilization of its hydrocarbon resources.

When you add up the 15 years of study and debate, the experience of Prudhoe Bay, the ever increasing rate of oil imports, and the 10- to 15-year leadtime to bring an arctic oil field into production, you can reach no other conclusion. Now is the time to authorize oil and gas leasing in the coastal plain of ANWR.

PRESIDENT BUSH SUPPORTS ENVIRONMENTALLY SOUND LEASING IN ANWR

President Bush has examined the merits of oil and gas leasing on the coastal plain of ANWR and has concluded that it is in our national interest to proceed with environmentally sensitive exploration and development of this area. I am confident that most of my colleagues will reach the same conclusion as the Senate debates this issue in the 101st Congress.●

THE EXPANDED CHILD CARE OPPORTUNITIES ACT OF 1989

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I am pleased to join Senator PACKWOOD, Senator MOYNIHAN, and others in sponsoring the Expanded Child Care Opportunities Act, S. 412.

Many Members of the Senate share a commitment to easing the child care crisis affecting millions of American families. Senator HATCH and Senator DODD have also introduced child care bills—the Family Earned Income Tax Credit Act and the Act for Better Child Care Services. I was pleased to join them in cosponsoring these bills.

With so much dedication and so many creative ideas, I am confident that the Senate will be able to reach a compromise on how to address the child care dilemma.

The Expanded Child Care Opportunities Act offers some excellent ways to assist low- and middle-income families. Increasing the existing child care tax credit would give parents direct financial assistance. This would also allow parents flexibility in selecting care for their children. Increasing social service block grants to the States to improve and expand child care services is also a good approach. This would allow each State to respond to its individual needs.

I support the worthy goal of effective child care legislation. There is perhaps no greater priority than the very important investment we make in the care and education of our children.

I look forward to working with Senators PACKWOOD and MOYNIHAN and others on the Labor and Finance Committees on child care legislation during the 101st Congress.●

THE FAMILY EARNED INCOME TAX CREDIT ACT

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my colleagues, Senator HATCH, Senator DODD, and others in cosponsoring S. 450, the Family Earned Income Tax Credit Act of 1989.

Senators HATCH and DODD established themselves as leaders on the child care issue in the 100th Congress. Both Senators offered an approach to easing the emerging child care crisis facing so many American families. Last year time ran out before the Senate was able to reach a compromise on the issue.

A bipartisan commitment to devising effective child care legislation is evident this year. I have joined Senator HATCH and others in cosponsoring Senator DODD's act for better child care services. During the 101st Congress, I am confident that the Senate will be able to craft a legislative solution to the child care dilemma. We must keep in mind that fewer than 10 percent of families are what was once considered the "typical American family," with the mother staying at home and the father working.

In the Family Earned Income Tax Credit Act, Senator HATCH offers an excellent approach to assisting low and middle income families with child care expenses. I look forward to working with Senator HATCH, Senator DODD, and other members of the Labor and Finance Committees on child care legislation.

The goal of effective child care legislation is a worthy one. Our Nation's children will come of age in the 21st century. Our investment in their care and education is an investment in our Nation's future.●

LEGISLATION TO CHANGE FREDDIE MAC'S BOARD

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today in support of legislation which promotes a fundamental value of this Nation—home ownership. As ranking member of the Housing Subcommittee, I am pleased to join the chairman of this subcommittee, Senator CRANSTON, in preserving the integrity and soundness of the Federal Home Loan Mortgage Corporation [Freddie Mac].

In the broad discussion about the FSLIC crisis, a number of proposals are being discussed which alter the Federal Home Loan Bank Board. Although I support the efforts of the Bank Board and the Treasury to resolve this issue, I am also concerned about the impact that they will have on the governing of Freddie Mac.

Currently, the Directors of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board are the Board of Directors of Freddie Mac. If the Bank Board is eliminated or adjusted, the Board of Directors of Freddie Mac may be affected. Because the market has shown that Freddie Mac and Fannie Mae are invaluable tools for providing efficient mortgage financing, I want to be sure that the management of Freddie Mac is not adversely affected in the process of making adjustments for the FSLIC crisis.

The Board of Directors of Freddie Mac must continue to enhance the housing mission that was initially given to Freddie Mac. A Board adversely affecting this purpose may undermine the management and the stock value of the Freddie Mac Corporation. Ultimately, the home buyer will pay if we steer Freddie Mac off course.

As many of my colleagues know, I initiated a move to lift the restrictions on the Freddie Mac preferred stock in June 1988. Since that time, the stock has over tripled in value. The stock has been trading without restrictions since January. The lifting of restrictions accomplished two purposes: It provided a needed boost within the industry, and it broadened the ownership of the Freddie Mac stock. Currently, only 25 percent of the stock is held by savings institutions.

The broader ownership and increasing value of the stock are clear indications that the market believes in the effectiveness of Freddie Mac in providing an efficient source of mortgage financing. In establishing a Board of Directors for Freddie Mac, we must send a signal to the market that builds on this faith and trust.

The legislation that Senator CRANSTON and I are introducing today will enhance the mission of Freddie Mac, building on the healthy competition which exists between Freddie Mac and Fannie Mae. This competition has been a key factor in the development of an efficient mortgage financing system.

Specifically, our legislation establishes a new Board of Directors for Freddie Mac. This new Board will look identical to that of Fannie Mae. The Board will contain 18 members. Five of these members will be appointed by the President. This structure, first, puts Freddie Mac and Fannie Mae on the exact same par for competing; and second, sends a signal to the market that Freddie Mac's mission will continue to be one of providing sound mortgage financing to home buyers around the Nation.

In the interim, our legislation establishes a transition Board of Directors. This Board consists of the Chairman of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board, the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development, and the President of the Federal Home Loan Mortgage Corporation.

Freddie Mac has proven to be an integral part of a mortgage financing system that ensures that the lowest cost mortgage credit is always accessible to America's home buyers. I am pleased to work with Senator CRANSTON to ensure that this institution continues its mission, enhancing affordable housing opportunities for citizens across the country.●

ONONDAGA LAKE RESTORATION ACT, S. 27

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today as a cosponsor of S. 27, the Onondaga Lake Restoration Act.

Onondaga Lake is a 4.5-square-mile lake located in Syracuse. It has been claimed that the lake is the most polluted inland body of water in the United States. It got that way after decades of abuse as untreated sewage was discharged on a regular basis into the lake. Pollution in the lake is so bad that fish containing mercury have been declared by the U.S. Food and Drug Administration to be unfit for human consumption.

It is time to restore Onondaga Lake to its former beauty. It is almost hard to believe that at the turn of the century the lake's shoreline was sprinkled with all the traps of a tourist spot: hotels, amusement parks, beaches, and restaurants. While there have been improvements to water quality by upgrading some of the waste treatment facilities and by the closure of the Allied Chemical plant, there is much to be done.

The city of Syracuse is embarking on an ambitious project which will revitalize the waterfront area of the city. A mammoth shopping mall is currently under construction on the banks of the lake.

Federal funding is desperately needed to help in efforts to clean the lake. S. 27 not only authorizes these funds, it also establishes a lake management conference to be comprised of representatives of the U.S. EPA, the Army Corps of Engineers, the State of New York, Onondaga County, the city of Syracuse, a citizen's advisory committee and a technical advisory committee. This lake management committee will be responsible for recommending a course of action to clean the lake and will also identify other sources of funding.

The restoration of Onondaga Lake will surely be a centerpiece in the efforts to rectify the decades of abuse suffered by hundreds of other lakes across the country. Cleaning the environment should be a major priority as we enter the 1990's. I urge my colleagues to act on this legislation.●

THE TRENTON BUSINESS & PROFESSIONAL WOMEN'S CLUB, INC., CELEBRATES 75 YEARS

● Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, I rise to honor the Trenton Business & Professional Women's Club which is celebrating its 75th anniversary March 10, 1989. Since its founding in 1914, it has strived to promote the rights of women in the workplace and community. It has played an active role diligently working with all levels of government to set goals and make positive changes for women.

The club evolved from the Phyllis Club of the Young Women's Christian Association. It was founded by Emma Dillion and Roselle Bucknum, individuals who wanted to help preserve opportunities that had opened up for women by World War I; 1914 marked its founding and in 1916 its constitution was adopted.

In 1919 representatives of the New Jersey clubs founded the New Jersey State Federation of Business & Professional Women's Clubs. That same year, the Trenton club played an active role in forming the National Federation of Business and Professional Women.

The women's suffrage movement in 1920 emphasized women's awareness of issues and laws affecting them. The Trenton BPW's goal was to raise standards and to be a voice for working women. These goals were carried through with efforts by the State federation and the Trenton club's founder Emma Dillion.

The club has been a leading force in the struggle for equality and instrumental in supporting women's rights. In 1919 it supported the first national survey of working women, in 1920 the 19th amendment for women's suffrage, in 1937 along with the State and national federation the equal rights amendment for the first time, and in 1946 it began a political promotion project to support women in political office.

Since its founding, Trenton BPW has dedicated itself to elevating standards for working women. It has done so by stressing areas where a significant difference could be made; in legislation, education, and personal growth. Trenton BPW continues to actively participate in these areas through career advancement seminars, scholarships, and workshops. I commend Trenton BPW for the significant accomplishments achieved during its rich 75-year history and for continuing to confront the many challenges facing women today.

Several members will be honored the evening of March 10 for 50 years service to this outstanding organization. I applaud Eva R. Blake of Trenton, Lillian Miller of Hamilton Township, Mary G. Roebling of Trenton, and Helen Higgins of Yardley, PA, who will receive a Lifetime Member Award. These individuals have dedicated themselves to the goals of BPW for half a century. They have faced many challenges and have seen many changes.

I extend congratulations to all of you as you celebrate the Trenton Business & Professional Women's Club's diamond anniversary. May your good work continue for many years to come.●

PAN AM 103

● Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, news that Pan Am flight 103 had crashed in Lockerbie, Scotland, sent a shock wave through the world's public. That so great a disaster could occur, so close to Christmastime, was an idea which was both deeply disturbing and tragic.

For many, Pan Am 103 has become a memory. It is something that happened. We do not know who did it, and we may never know. It is a chapter of history, and history must move on.

But we cannot move on, we cannot fail to address the troubling issues raised by the crash. Who learned that a threat was made against a Pan Am flight originating in Frankfurt? Who evaluated that threat? Who was told? Why were others not told? How was such a powerful bomb smuggled on board an aircraft, and what prevents a similar bomb from being smuggled aboard another aircraft tomorrow?

There are questions on a more human scale as well. How did the Governments of the United States and Great Britain assist family members of the victims following the crash? Why have no personal effects recovered from the crash site been returned to the family members? These are serious questions. These are unanswered questions.

Mr. President, most of us need not live with these questions nagging us day and night. We may go home to our families, grateful that it was not our loved ones who were killed in the crash. Hundreds of families are not so lucky. As they confront their grief, they compel this body and other organs of the Government to confront the issues raised by the downing of Pan Am 103.

The Committee on Foreign Relations plans hearings on this subject, and I understand that other committees will hold hearings as well. Hard questions will be asked. They will demand answers.

Mr. President, I ask that a statement by family members of the vicitms of Pan Am 103 be placed in the RECORD immediately following my remarks.

The statement follows:

GENERAL STATEMENT ISSUED BY FLIGHT 103 VICTIM FAMILY MEMBERS ATTENDING PRESS CONFERENCE, GRAND HYATT HOTEL, NEW YORK CITY, FEBRUARY 6, 1989

We are relatives of some of those innocent persons murdered in this wanton attack on Pan Am Flight 103, the most massive terrorist attack in history aimed at American civilians. During the past six difficult weeks, not only have we had to accept the senseless death of our loved ones, we were forced to confront the bureaucracy to have the remains of our loved ones returned, we have arranged for funerals, and attended along with over 160,000 others, numerous memorial services in Syracuse, New York City, and Lockerbie, Scotland, and scores of other cities and towns in the United States. We have had the support and sympathy from grieving relatives, friends, members of our communities, and individual airline employees. We have collectively received several hundred thousand cards and letters of condolence. The outpouring of sharing has been a great comfort to us.

However, there has been one quarter from which the response has been utter silence. We have received no condolences from the top officials of Pan Am nor the leaders of our national government. Unlike the British Government leaders, our President, Vice President, Secretary of State, and Secretary of Transportation have not attended any of the memorial services that were held. Not even 2nd level U.S. officials have been present. But most disturbing to us has been the utter silence of our national leaders over the past 6 weeks. Our numerous letters are not answered, we see no sign of action, we are not being informed of any events which would lead to answers to the many questions that remain. The question must be asked: Can it be that the U.S. Government policy is to ignore the Flight 103 bombing by doing little or nothing?

In the immediate aftermath of the Flight 103 bombing we were shocked to learn that the FAA (Federal Aviation Agency) had issued written alerts of a terrorist threat to bomb a Pan Am flight originating in Frankfurt during the pre-Christmas holiday period. These warnings had apparently been sent to U.S. embassies, the airline, British officials, and the U.S. military personnel in Frankfurt, however, the warning alert was not available to passengers or crew of Flight 103. President Reagan when asked about this policy of keeping warnings, even high level alerts secret from the public, asserted that so many threats are received that to make them available to the public could stop all air traffic. The FAA's own reports, however, show a relatively small number of threats to aircraft (400–500 per year out of 6 million flights) and a very small number of high level threats (variously reported at 22 to 24 in all of 1988). The threat to Pan Am flight 103 after December 5th was apparently classified as such a high level threat. While the number of people who knew of the FAA terrorist alert is not known at present, the approximately 168 vacant seats on this usually crowded pre-Christmas flight indicates the distinct possibility that the alert was more widely known than has yet been reported.

Both the State Department, and the Transportation Department promised in late December a "review" of the policy on warnings, but the policy (or lack of policy) apparently remains intact and nothing further has been heard of this "review."

We believe the present defacto policy of issuing warnings of terrorist threats to government agency employees while withholding such alerts from the flying public and the flight crews is both immoral and possibly criminal and it must be roundly condemned. We call on U.S. Transportation Secretary Skinner to disavow this FAA and airline policy forthwith, and to make available upon request to any perspective international air passenger a current summary of FAA alerts or reported threats to aircraft and to require notification of flight crews.

The anger felt by many of us about suppressed warnings has been heightened by revelation that airline security measures cannot generally detect plastic bombs in the checked baggage. While the FAA and the airline have apparently known of this massive security gap since 1986 and the FAA has ordered new equipment to detect such bombs, no interim measures to detect such bombs were undertaken, apparently for reasons of commercial convenience.

Many questions need answers—How could warnings or alerts be suppressed when the FAA and airlines knew that their security measures were ineffective? By what right, and on whose authority, was the information on ineffective security measures and specific terrorist bomb threats kept from the public and flight crews? Why has the FAA and Pan Am still refused to institute effective security measures to detect plastic bombs in luggage compartments? (The FAA regulations issued on December 28, 1988 following the Flight 103 bombing call merely for X-rays of all luggage, which cannot with current equipment detect plastic bombs.)

We would like now to turn to some sensitive matters of direct concern to most relatives: The handling of the remains of unidentified victims and the indefinite delay in return of the personal effects of property. (Personal effects refer to very personal things removed from a body or found in the immediate vicinity of a body.)

A funeral service was held last week in Scotland for a number of victims whose bodies had not been fully recovered or identified. Unfortunately, only short notice or no notice was given to a number of American next of kin.

While family members were originally told in the week after the crash that personal effects would be returned to the next of kin with the bodily remains, and other property would be identified and returned by Pan Am, Scottish authorities subsequently ruled that they would handle these matters. Scottish authorities have stated that personal effects and property of Americans will be turned over to the U.S. State Department rather than released directly to the next of kin. Despite our request, no personal effects or property has been returned to the next of kin on the grounds that these items may be needed in the criminal investigation of future criminal cases. While we appreciate that there may be good cause to hold some luggage found near the bomb blast, we believe the personal effects removed from the identified bodies should be returned to the victim families within the next week. Other victim property which is stored in a large factory warehouse in Lockerbie, should also be identified and returned. To date, despite several requests, no lost luggage forms have been sent to victim family members to accomplish this task. We call on the Scottish authorities, especially Scottish Home Secretary Malcolm Rifkind and the Scottish Lord Advocate, Lord Cameron of Lochbroom, to promptly authorize the release of victim personal effects and expedite the identification and return of other property.

In conclusion, we call on President Bush to act on the ideals he has championed. Please, Mr. President, break your silence and exercise your leadership to redouble the efforts of the Federal Government to identify and apprehend the perpetrators of this, the worst terrorist attack in history of American civilians. Use your power to restore genuine security for Americans travelling on American international air carriers. End the Government's present immoral policy of providing selective warnings and alerts to certain favored persons while keeping the public and airline employees whose lives are at risk in ignorance.

To the Congress which will decide the degree to which it will investigate the Flight 103 bombing over the next several weeks, we urge you to conduct a full and complete investigation.●

SAVINGS AND LOAN CRISIS

● Mr. DASCHLE. Mr. President, one of the most serious problems we face today, aside from the national budget deficit, is the crumbling savings and loan industry. The one aspect of this crisis that concerns me the most is the extensive evidence of fraud and misconduct engaged in by savings and loan executives and insiders. I rise today to urge my colleagues to adopt strict enforcement measures as part of the comprehensive S&L crisis legislation that we will undoubtedly consider in the near future.

According to the General Accounting Office, an investigative arm of Congress, there have been "extensive, repeated, and often blatant violations of law and regulations" among the failed thrifts. In many of them, there have been "astoundingly egregious" conflicts of interest, self-dealing, deceit and bogus accounting. The American people have every right to be incensed when they read about thrift executives and insiders who used skimmed profits to buy jets, vacation homes, race horses, and jewelry, and to give lavish parties.

Estimates vary on the number of thrift failures that have involved fraud. In a recent study, the House Government Operations subcommittee concluded that three-quarters of more than 500 S&L insolvencies appear to be linked to fraud and misconduct.

The U.S. Attorney General gives a more conservative estimate of 25 to 30 percent. Either way, this situation is simply intolerable. The U.S. Attorney General further estimates that losses in savings and loan cases involving fraud and embezzlement amounted to over $2 billion in 1988, alone.

It is an unfortunate fact that many of the illegally obtained funds have been spent in ways that preclude their recovery. That does not mean, however, that we should cease efforts to vigorously prosecute the individuals responsible, if only to deter future acts of fraud and mismanagement. We cannot allow these cases to sit unprosecuted or to settle suits in such a fashion that subsequent criminal prosecution is undermined.

It may be costly to prosecute, but statistics from 1987 and 1988 show that we can, at least, recover approximately $2.40 for every $1 spent in enforcement. The more we recover, the less taxpayers will have to pay to bail out the thrifts that these irresponsible individuals ran into the ground.

I sincerely hope that my colleagues will not lose sight of these very important facts as we consider a comprehensive approach to resolving the thrift crisis in the months ahead.●

RECESS FROM 9:45 A.M. UNTIL 12 NOON

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I further ask unanimous consent that at 9:45 a.m. the Senate stand in recess until 12 noon tomorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. MITCHELL. I further ask unanimous consent that at 12 noon there be a period for morning business not to extend beyond 12:30 p.m., with Senators permitted to speak therein for up to 5 minutes each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. MITCHELL. I further ask unanimous consent that at 12:30 p.m. the Senate go into executive session to consider the nomination of Senator John Tower to be Secretary of Defense.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

JOINT MEETING OF THE CONGRESS

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, earlier today I indicated that at 10 o'clock a.m. on Thursday, tomorrow, there would be a joint meeting of Congress to commemorate the 200th anniversary of Congress' first meeting. The Senate will recess at 9:45 a.m. in order to accommodate the joint meeting.

Mr. President, do I understand that my colleague from Maine wishes time to speak?

Mr. COHEN. No more than 5 minutes.

Mr. MITCHELL. Perhaps I could yield to the distinguished Republican leader.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Republican leader is recognized.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, the majority leader indicated what the schedule will be tomorrow. We will begin the Tower nomination at 12:30. I am not certain at this point how long that nomination may take. I assume that we will be in session on Friday and will be on the Tower nomination, if not completed tomorrow.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is my intention.

Mr. DOLE. Do we know how late on Friday? Is there any indication how late we might go?

Mr. MITCHELL. I have made no determination on that yet, and would consult with the Republican leader before making a decision in that regard.

Mr. DOLE. I think in accordance with the prior discussion, in the event that the Derwinski nomination might be available say late tomorrow, it could be taken up; if not, maybe next week. The only other nomination remaining would be the nomination of Mr. Pickering to be Ambassador to the United Nations, and the majority leader has indicated he is prepared to move on that at any time.

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes. As soon as the relevant committees act and the nominations are cleared, we will move to them promptly.

Mr. DOLE. I would just say for the record that we have had a number of discussions this afternoon, the Republican members of the Armed Services Committee and part of the leadership, on the Tower nomination. I have had a number of discussions with the Chief of Staff of the White House. And it will be our intention to have a full discussion of not only the reports filed by both the majority and the minority, but a full debate of the Tower nomination. And I would say, again hopefully, we hope to focus on the merits of John Tower, not the demerits of anyone else.

It is going to be our effort as I have said in the past to try to get this back on a bipartisan track. It is still a nomination of great importance to the President. I met with the President last night. He feels strongly about it. He is willing to do whatever he might be able to do to bring about a successful conclusion—additional meetings with Senators, additional meetings with Senators and John Tower. Whatever the President can do he wishes to do because this is a matter of historic importance to the President.

It is early in his term. It would be the first time in history that a nominee was rejected at this point in a President's first term.

So this is a matter of great concern to the President, to John Tower, to the Republican leadership, and I would say, as I have said every time I have stood on this floor to discuss the Tower nomination, that we hope the door is not closed on the other side. And we are still optimistic that there would be some—if not persuaded now, at least we are going to hold their fire, keep their counsel who remain uncommitted until we have had a chance to get into the discussion of the facts.

I think that is where it is. We are prepared to discuss this at length or until we can persuade enough Senators, and if we cannot, certainly we will let the majority leader know at the earliest time when we may have a vote but it would probably be sometime next week. That would be my guess.

Mr. MITCHELL. I thank the distinguished Republican leader.

Mr. President, I understand that my colleague, the senior Senator from Maine, wishes 5 minutes.

Therefore I would like to ask unanimous consent that the senior Senator from Maine, Mr. COHEN, be permitted to address the Senate for 5 minutes, and immediately upon the conclusion of his remarks that the Senate stand in recess under the previous order until 9:15 a.m. on tomorrow, Thursday, March 2, 1989.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Under that understanding the Senator from Maine is recognized for 5 minutes.

THE TOWER NOMINATION

Mr. COHEN. Mr. President, I shared in that leadership meeting with the minority leader this afternoon. A lot of questions were raised as to how we proceed from this point, how we bring the measure to the floor, and how we conduct our deliberations on the floor in the debate.

I can only reassure my colleagues that we intend to have a rather vigorous debate because that is what is required in this Chamber. Something far more than John Tower's nomination is at stake in my judgment—although it is important to me that he be confirmed. What takes place here in this Chamber, what happens to the Senate as an institution, what rules are to be applied, what standards are to be raised, what compliance will be insisted upon, and whether it will be a double standard for us and those in the executive branch are issues that must be addressed. I was asked today whether or not there is a higher duty, a higher standard of behavior for those who serve in the executive branch, particularly the Secretary of Defense, and apparently Senator Tower indicated during his speech at the National Press Club today that he believed there was.

Perhaps so. But there also ought to be some uniformity of conduct. There ought not to be a situation in which we can cast stones through these glass walls of ours at a nominee and say that his conduct is unbecoming, and that he is not worthy of support by either the President or indeed this body.

There will be extensive debate about what the standards ought to be for our own behavior as well as that of the nominees for the executive branch.

I say this by way of reference to a speech that John Tower gave at the National Press Club this afternoon. It is an important speech. It talks about substance. It deals with the most important aspect of his nomination. That is his qualifications, his intellectual capability, his experience, his vast experience in the field of defense and foreign policy issues. These characteristics have been clouded by a host of allegations, rumors, inspired innuendo, false accusations, all of which have been reprinted or televised over the evening news to his great detriment.

This speech attempts to put things back on track; to talk about substance, to talk about the kind of choices that are facing the Defense Department, and the kind of leadership that John Tower would hope to bring to the position of Secretary of Defense.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in full in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit No. 1.)

Mr. COHEN. I would like to offer a couple of comments about the report that has been filed on behalf of the majority.

In my judgment, it is a very obvious brief for the prosecution as such. It is very precise in the use of language and remarkably vague in factual support of some of the allegations contained in the document.

One of the issues that is most troubling to me is the notion that John Tower somehow must be disqualified from being Secretary of Defense because of the appearance issue. I do not believe there is any room here for a double standard. In this particular case, I think it is very difficult for any Member of the U.S. Senate to disqualify John Tower based upon an appearance of conflict. We have to weigh the appearance against the actuality. If we start disqualifying people based upon appearance of conflict, I would respectfully suggest that we may have to disqualify most of the Members of this body from ever passing upon legislative matters, because we have not only solicited but received contributions from the various sources over which we have legislative jurisdiction and indeed pass, on an annual basis, upon the merits or demerits of their respective claims. I do not believe there is any room in this particular case for having a double standard, and that appears to be the case. We are judging upon appearances of conflict as opposed to the actual facts.

During the course of the next day or several days I believe we will be able to make a very persuasive case that the chance for an appearance of a conflict with John Tower is much less than that of ourselves. There are few checks against our excesses and many against potential ones in the executive branch. I think we will have a great deal to talk about in weighing the evidence.

I also want to say one other thing. All of the members of the Armed Services Committee—and we draw upon our experience—have said publicly that they have never seen John Tower under the influence, drunk, or conducting himself in any way that would bring disrespect to himself or his office. This is our actual experience. Yet, we are now asked to weigh that experience against something contained in the FBI reports. Most of the public does not understand what constitutes an FBI report. They assume it carries some notion of sanctity, of its accuracy, of truthfulness of what is being said in those reports, when, in fact, it is simply a giant vacuum cleaner that sucks in all of the information and statements that people make, whether based in fact or fiction or fantasy, or the product of a bizarre imagination. All of this information goes into the FBI report. It is not digested. It is not scrutinized, and it is not criticized. It simply goes in.

So we weigh our experience against allegations contained in the FBI report, and I think that it raises a serious issue as to how we go about conducting confirmation hearings in the future. If we are going to reject a nominee based upon the FBI files rather than our own experience or that which is taken in open and public session, I think we have to seriously reexamine the process itself.

That bears upon not only John Tower but also the future and integrity of the process before the U.S. Senate.

EXHIBIT No. 1

REMARKS BY JOHN TOWER BEFORE THE NATIONAL PRESS CLUB, MARCH 1, 1989

I would like to speak today about problems of a broad scope and long-term significance; in short I would like to talk about the questions that normally occupy the mind of a nominee for Secretary of Defense.

It is clear that a majority of the American people lack confidence in the way the Pentagon is managing their defense dollars. The President is very concerned about this attitude and has charged me with restoring public and congressional confidence by renovating the Pentagon's massive management structure and conducting a fresh review of our forces.

The primary responsibility of the Secretary of Defense is to ensure that our military forces are prepared and the policies that guide them will ensure the security of the Nation. His advice to the President and his proposals to Congress need not be popular, but they must be right. For in no other agency lies the responsibility for the security of this country and the lives of so many men and women serving voluntarily throughout the world.

The overall military force we have planned for is not the force we can afford. It is imperative that the Secretary of Defense wring out every ounce of efficiency he can find in the Department and insure that fewer dollars are spent wisely. It is really as simple as that.

Significant and painful cuts will be made; cuts that are prudent—yes; cuts that do not endanger our security—certainly; cuts that reflect a thoroughly worked out strategic design—absolutely; but cuts that will create a storm of debate both inside and outside the Pentagon. But then we are prepared to face such storms.

We all understand the current budget crunch. The reductions President Bush and I have agreed upon are both necessary and significant. We have already determined that in order to meet the Gramm-Rudman target, $6.3 billion will be taken from the fiscal year 1990 budget. These cuts come on top of 4 straight years of defense decline, in which our military budget dropped 11 percent in real dollars. We must make certain that in making these cuts, efficiencies are enhanced and our security insured.

We should be proud of the significant and necessary resurgency of our military power under Ronald Reagan. I make no apology for my support of that effort, and I look back with considerable satisfaction to the deep bipartisan support that helped America regain her credibility in the eyes of the world.

But the 1980's are behind us. We do not disparage the real achievements of the Reagan administration when we note that the 1990's offer us some distinctly different challenges and threats—and that our response to new situations will not be to fall back on old ideas.

That is why I have spent much of the past month in the midst of two important initiatives mandated by President Bush. First, a comprehensive review of America's national defense strategy; and second, the development of a plan for implementing sorely needed reforms of Defense Department Management and Procurement Practices.

Our review of the stragetic options open to President Bush has gone virtually unnoticed in the General Clamor surrounding my nomination. It has been in the works for many weeks, and it is a serious undertaking.

Given the choices and cuts that lie before us, it only makes sense to begin the administration by stepping back from our current situation to see the world as a whole—and by assessing the trends and uncertainties that will affect global politics in the 1990's and beyond. Nothing would be more dangerous than to enter into an exhaustive reworking of our budgets and programs without first attempting to understand the threats and challenges that are likely to shape that future world. Moreover, we cannot risk a dangerous mismatch between resources and strategy. Our review will insure that that does not happen.

In assessing our strategy, we must first look at dominant trends. Some are encouraging:

Our friends and allies have grown in economic strength and self confidence.

The Soviet Union seems to be undergoing unprecedented reform and has told us of a "new thinking" in foreign and military affairs.

In Latin America and Asia, the forces of democracy and the free market appear to be boldly on the march.

But this is not the whole picture. The future of Secretary General Gorbachev's reforms is cloudy—not only because their success is in doubt, but because we cannot be certain what his reforms really mean for Soviet foreign policy until we see more concrete action. Moreover, Libya and other hostile states are procuring ever more lethal weapons that seriously threaten world peace. The sobering truth is that even if the Soviets become less of a threat, the world will remain a dangerous place indeed.

The defense strategy review has several aspects:

The review will analyze how current trends and uncertainties affect the appropriateness and effectiveness of our national defense strategy for the 1990's. It will identify those elements that should continue to guide our strategy and those elements that should be reexamined.

The review will address specific force posture issues in light of the reexamined national defense strategy and current budget constraints. The goal will be a military force that provides the most effective deterrent while offering the greatest competitive leverage for our defense investment.

The review will examine how arms control can be used to enhance our national security objectives. It will examine the basic premises underlying our approach to current and prospective negotiations and insure that they are consistent with our defense strategy and force posture.

The issues that we will confront in this defense strategy review are some of the most difficult in Government. We face critical choices in both strategic and general purpose forces—ICBM modernization; SDI; the manning and composition of our land, air, and naval forces; and the mix of active and reserve components. We must make sound judgments about what national security demands and what budget constraints permit.

We must also take a dispassionate look at our arms control policies. As we all know, arms control is not a disembodied program, but rather one vital element of national security policy. We must be clear on the role arms control should play. Arms control agreements must enhance the security of the United States and her allies. In the Bush administration, arms reductions negotiations will complement our overall strategic design, not the other way around.

Of course, as we review our defense strategy and capabilities, we must remember one critical point. Rebuiliding our military strength over the past 8 years was critical to our foreign policy successes. And maintaining that strength in the 1990's will be no less so. It would be shortsighted indeed to conclude that because we now seem to face a more peaceful world, we can neglect a critical reason for current global stability—America's military power. The world still holds serious threats to the free world. While there are hopeful signs, there is still more promise than performance. The challenge of our strategy review is to assess how, with limited resources, we can preserve our strength, and our alliances, and meet our commitments around the world.

As our defense strategy review will mold the forces of the decade ahead, so too will it frame the most immediate concern of the Secretary of Defense—reforming the way the Department does business.

I have said plainly and repeatedly—before the Republican Platform Committee in July 1988, during my time with the Bush campaign, in my meetings with the President and his key advisors, and most recently in my testimony to the Senate Committee—that the Defense Department must take a cold hard look at its Management and Procurement Practices. This is something to which the President and I assign urgent priority. At the President's direction, we are well into an extensive management review of the Department. Over 2 years ago, the Packard Commission reported on the ways and means to reform our system of buying weapons. The President and I embrace the Commission's recommendations and they will be implemented with the utmost urgency they require.

Over the years literally mountains of paper and seas of ink have been given over to management reform reports. The Bush administration has no intention of adding yet another hollow call for change.

The President wishes us to build on the best from the past, to take account of current realities and to give him by May a course of action for fundamental reform. We will detail specific actions that need to be taken to implement changes in four key areas: people and organization, defense planning, acquisition practices and procedures, and government-industry accountability.

We know that our system for buying weapons is encumbered by too many people and too many layers of bureaucracy. There must be cuts.

We know that running the Department demands a highly skilled and professional military and civilian workforce. Here, there must be improvements.

We know that the system is choked by a thicket of laws and unspeakably ponderous regulations, which cost time and money. Congress and the administration must address the problem.

We know that there are buying practices and procedures—identified by the Packard Commission and a host of other experts—that can give us better weapon systems, in less time and for less money. We must make the bureaucracy dance to a different tune.

Allegations of corruption and abuse are all too common fare. The public's trust in the Pentagon must be restored. It must be made crystal clear that we have zero tolerance of abuses and abusers.

The Department of Defense sometimes moves like an arthritic turtle and can find the most innovative ways to maintain business as usual. That has got to stop. The defense bureaucracy can be reshaped, but only if people can be mobilized into action. Leadership can energize the individual initiative of every man and woman in the Department, and shift the course of events.

In managing the Department, subordinates must have the authority and the backing to do their jobs effectively. They should be held strictly accountable for the results of their decisions. The issue here, of course, is one of competence and integrity. These attributes are not lacking in the Pentagon, and they need only be tapped by an aggressive and hard-nose Secretary.

The same high standard of accountability should extend to the private sector as well. We cannot tolerate people in Government or industry who fail in their responsibilities to the men and women of our Armed Forces. Our military depends on nuts and bolts and sheet metal. We cannot be satisfied with anything but the best. Our attitude must be one of zero tolerance of abuses of the system. The guilty will bear the full brunt of the law.

These efforts cannot take second place in the Secretary's mind. They must sit at the center of his desk, they must be his day-to-day concern. I have no illusions that the way the Department should be handled will make the Secretary a universally loved individual. Popularity, as you may have gathered, has never been my strong suit. That in itself should be a powerful recommendation.

As some of you have suggested in your news reports, I've spent a great deal of time thinking about what I might do as Secretary of Defense. I have shared my philosophy with the President; now let me address this larger audience.

Secretary of Defense is a profound responsibility in terms of the global scope of his concerns. In a narrower sense, however, a Secretary makes decisions that, taken together, determine whether our Nation has the wherewithal to act when we must. Defense decisions can have no criterion save the preparedness of our military forces. There can be no favorite weapons—only effective weapons. Each service must understand that the Secretary of Defense is a person who can—and frequently does—say no. And under current conditions, "no" is a word that must slip easily off the Secretary's tongue. There can be no favored contractor—only effective and honest ones. Defense contractors, by their performance, earn the responsibility—yes, the responsibility—to craft America's weapons.

A Secretary of Defense must select and lead top-notch subordinates to fulfill his mandate. Indicative of the leaders the Bush administration will recruit is candidate for our Deputy Secretary—Donald Atwood. A proven General Motors leader with extensive engineering and managerial experience, Mr. Atwood exemplifies the high standard we will demand in our defense appointees. And let me note that one of the things that recommend Don Atwood is his experience with defense industry. In his position, as in others, ignorance of the defense industry is no virtue.

Ultimately, however, the Secretary of Defense is in charge. He will be the person who must ensure that the President's vision and sound principles are brought to bear in defense decisions. He must ensure that the hard choices are faced, that the necessary cuts are made, that the necessary reforms are carried out. And he will accept responsibility for the results of his stewardship.

A Secretary, of course, cannot escape controversy. But if he makes sound choices, Congress and the American people will be the first to applaud. When billions had to be backed out of the defense budget, Frank Carlucci decisively cut programs and force structure, and Congress properly praised him for eschewing "business as usual."

A "business as usual" Secretary is not good enough. I want it said: "Tower never flinched." Major and expensive systems will not survive the defense strategy review. I cannot give you a "cut list" of weapons, because such cuts should follow, not precede our strategy review. But in making those cuts, I will not succumb to the temptation of stretch outs and postponing the tough decisions. Nor will I assume that any weapon, or any force structure is, sacrosanct.

With clear policy direction and consistent oversight, the personnel of the Defense Department should be given the chance to do their jobs to the best of their ability. We have over 2 million willing, capable and dedicated people in the Department who, if given the chance, can play a major role in providing for a strong and fiscally sound national defense. I intend to give them that opportunity—and to hold them, as I ask you to hold me, accountable for the results.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

ECONOMIC IMPACT OF THEATER AND THE ARTS ON BUSINESS

HON. BILL RICHARDSON

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 1, 1989

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, one of my constituents, Arlene Markinson, producer of Santa Fe Spirit Co., gave an outstanding speech entitled "Economic Impact of Theater and the Arts on Business." I commend it to my colleagues. It makes a lot of sense about the theater and the arts and its possible impact on economic development.

ECONOMIC IMPACT OF THEATER AND THE ARTS ON BUSINESS

(By Arlene Markinson)

I've come here today to talk to you about the arts being good business. My husband and I own the Helen Hayes Theatre on Broadway in New York City and also produce shows outside of our theatre. Upon moving to Santa Fe 2½ years ago, I met many talented people. I also have been very attracted to the richness of the history in this area. Last year I had a desire to produce a show that celebrates the human spirit, the beauty, the grandeur of New Mexico focused on Santa Fe. Even though I am a newcomer to New Mexico, my heart and soul is here. Although my theatrical contacts are in New York, I am committed only to employing New Mexicans. I believe there can be a surge of economic development through the arts in the 1990's here in New Mexico. As an entrepreneur I am willing to risk investment, work hard and guide those who are interested in learning about profitable theatre.

I found an artistic director, Irene Oliver-Lewis from Albuquerque and offered her a partnership in "Santa Fe Spirit". We then proceeded to find a writer who could create a musical embracing the ethnic diversity of the tri-cultures emphasizing the ability to co-exist. An important example for the world to see today. We chose E.A. "Tony" Mares, a well-known historian who's respected by all three cultures. From there we combed the theatrical community for the creative staff and auditioned many to find the very best. This musical extravaganza is new for almost everyone involved, and with the appropriate guidance we know they will surpass expectations. We are all in the midst of making history. We are the role-model for the state in private investment and just the beginning of what economic development in the arts can mean to New Mexico in terms of creating new jobs, increasing tax revenues and strengthening the economy of the state. The arts as business are no longer the sole province of big cities.

We will open June 5th and run until September 10th, four performances a week at the James A. Little Theatre. We intend to run the show annually and as the tourist industry continues to grow, we will extend the length of the show to accommodate the demand. With your continued enthusiasm and support, our intention in the fall of 1990 is to take "Santa Fe Spirit" on an international tour.

I would now like to share with you some important facts about the arts. While we are not creating "Santa Fe Spirit" as an economic tool, it does serve as an economy energizer. The benefits of theatre and the other arts in the United States and throughout the world have far exceeded their big box office receipts. The arts is a growing force that not only has the ability to lift the human spirit, but also enough drawing power to create employment, revitalize neighborhoods, boost local economics and motivate corporations to donate large sums in sponsorship money.

The impact is more than just the direct amount we are spending in conjuction with the event such as renting office and performing spaces, production studios, storage areas, training centers, research libraries, audio and video studios, museums, advertising and public relations agencies, printing plants, artist-run spaces, etc. For every dollar spent on the arts, the impact on the economy is roughly three fold. This is called the "multiplier effect".

I would like to step you through a cross section of second-tier cities from Boston in the east to San Diego in the west and other states. Each impact study show time and time again when economic developmental program officials pay attention to the roll of cultural resources in a city, the results are remarkable among all sectors of the community including government and business as well as arts organizations.

In 1980 in Princeton, New Jersey, the McCarter, a local, regional theatre set out to learn how much money it and its theatregoers spend in the community. They found its economic impact on the state exceeded more thatn $10 million a year. A similiar study was made for the Guthrie Theatre in Minneapolis and their's was more than $22 million a year.

In March, 1985 Iowa showed that the arts contributed over $110 million and found that government support for the arts acts as a magnet for additional private contributions.

In May, 1985, Michigan contributed over $195 million in direct and indirect spending into the state's economy annually and returned over $2 million in income, admission and other taxes collected.

San Francisco's Bay area in 1985/86 showed their direct economic impact of the arts to be $150 million annually. They found over 50% of the arts income is earned by arts groups themselves through admission receipts. For 1986 the total economic impact of the arts on San Francisco ranged from $208 to $240 million.

In 1986, Texas found their multiplier to be 3.35 and their total statewide impact was valued at $1.7 billion. The direct impact was worth at least $510 million. Business support of the arts in Texas reached over the billion dollar mark in 1987.

In Boston, the arts industry is the city's largest non-governmental employer. The arts accounted for $500 million of the city's overall economy in 1986. Arts attracted 7.6 million people in Boston to their events that year. It was more than double the attendance that went to professional sports events. And that percentage holds true to other large cities with major sporting events.

In San Diego with its world class threatre company which has produced plays that went to Broadway with acclaim and to the Kennedy Center in Washington, DC, impact of the arts and cultural organizations exceeded $90 million in 1987 and expected to grow to $96 million in 1988. Nearly $45 million in revenues were accumulated in 1987. Attendance at San Diego arts and cultural programs were estimated to be nearly 6 million people.

In New York City, the Broadway theatre district in the 1987/88 season stimulated expenditures totaling $845 million and with its national tours, $2.468 billion annually toward the economy of the United States. I remind you that this does not include any production that are off-Broadway and off-off-Broadway. The Broadway theatre's industry gross income exceeded $253 million and directly contributed to the economy of New York City through expenditures of producers and theatre owners for salaries, rents, advertising, royalties, sets, costumes and direct tax payments. Additionally, theatregoers annually spend $275 million on restaurants, taxis and parking. 15.6% of visitors who come to New York attending theatre and other cultural events extend their stay by an average of 2 days to enjoy further cultural events.

Industries in New York that most benefit from this $845 million activity in order of importance are: real estate, business and professional services, wholesale and retail trade, eating and drinking establishments, hotel and personnel services, utilities, transportation, medical and educational services, finance and insurance.

The arts in New York are a larger industry than advertising or hotel and motel operations, management consulting or computer and data processing services.

New York may be the most dramatic example, but any city of almost any size gains economically with theatres in town. Attendees spend more on hotel accommodations, meals, drinks, other entertainment, transportation, books, gifts, clothing, souvenirs and other purchases, generating a great deal of taxes going to the city and state.

The arts draw large numbers of people from the surrounding areas as well as tourists, whose spending supports local business and land development. An example is Lincoln Center in New York City. It was built in a depressed neighborhood. Fourteen years later, the Center was surrounded by $1 billion in new office buildings, apartments and restaurants. Another example is found in Dallas, Texas where property values surrounding the new arts district has risen 733% following completion of the art museum there.

The arts increase the element of excitement and variety that is the key to city life. Government and the private sector now recognize the role of artists as dynamic city builders. Many companies relocate according to amenities available in a given community to attract scarce, highly trained workers. Companies and communities must offer an increasingly attractive quality of life that includes the arts.

The arts revitalize urban centers through "artist colonies", concentration of artists living in a given neighborhood, such as SOHO in New York City. The rezoning of SOHO and now NOHO and TRIBECA districts of Manhattan permit artists to live and work in industrial zones. We see these artists colonies here in Santa Fe on Canyon Road and developing in the Sanbusco area, the newly renovated Dorothy Brett and Nicholai Fechine houses in Taos and in the area surrounding the Kimo Theatre in Albuquerque.

Interestingly, performing artists make up only 24% of the arts industry labor force. Other arts-related occupations such as technicians make up 18%, art administrators 8% and support personnel 50%. Surveys show that artists jobs provide "meaningful employment" in that workers receive a high degree of job satisfaction. Artistic workers also exhibit strong career commitment despite it being a low paid occupation. Professional artists are highly educated. They are an important part of the country's highly qualified people and contribute much to our evolvement.

Portland, Louisville, St. Louis, Cleveland, Pittsburgh, Winston Salem and Seattle are among the successful art development centers resulting from the wonderful collaboration with all the sectors of the community whose expectation is to revitalize downtown areas, provide employment and add billions of dollars to the city's tax base.

An example of what a city can do for itself is San Antonio. It has developed what is perhaps the most comprehensive ambitious programs for attracting high-tech investment of any major city in the country. At the core of this strategy are education and the arts. San Antonio: Target 1990. The city's development strategy document contains a number of objectives that would shock the traditional industrial developer:

1. Making San Antonio's Symphony one of the ten best in the country.

2. Enacting long-term plans to make the city museums interpreters of the regions cultural and historical attributes.

3. Establishing San Antonio as the nations leading center for Hispanic music, visual and performing arts.

4. Making the San Antonio Festival, the city's annual 23 day long celebration of itself, an international attraction.

5. Developing a first class ballet company.

Cities such as San Antonio view encouragement of the arts as being as important to economic development as improving access to freeways for manufacturing firms.

The cultural consumer represents the fastest growing, richest market of the post-modern economy. On a national level, in 1983, Canadians spent $6.4 billion out of pocket on arts-related activities including movies and other commercial cultural activities, such as museums, art galleries, live dance, music, theatre, opera and private tuition for painting, music, dance and other classes. Americans spend at least $64 billion a year on arts-related activities. Compared with manufacturing industries, the arts industry in Canada is the largest employer, the 6th largest with respect to salaries and wages and the 9th largest with respect to revenue.

Theatre and the arts is a people magnet, drawing tourist and tourist dollars. A visitor's dollar is worth as much to the local economy as one earned from exporting manufactured goods, and in recent years, tourist dollars have been increasing much more rapidly than manufacturing dollars.

A working coalition between the arts and the travel industry, two of the fastest growing segments of the economy can be mutually reinforcing. One sign of the increasing recognition and the arts institution was a conference held in Toronto in 1980 called, "Arts and Tourism: A Profit Partnership". Over 300 experts from the travel field and the arts investigated developing stronger economic links through coordination of planning and marketing to produce mutual financial gain. It was noted that a city's quality of life as reflected by availability of diverse cultural attractions is an effective tool in promoting the favorable reputation required by a city hoping to attract tourists and/or new businesses as well as conventions, and other meetings which have positive economic side effects.

Building the tourist-arts industry could be the fastest and cheapest way to create jobs, increase tax revenues, and strengthen the economy of the state. I am sure that in the minds of both the tourism and economic development communities is the issue of the seasonal nature of tourism. The arts may be the strongest asset capable of addressing the travel industry's desire to promote year round tourism. To date, most attempts to promote joint arts and tourism efforts have focused on festivals, generally summer festivals. Cities should be encouraged to extend the marketing of their major cultural programs and year round resources as well as their summer attractions. This would convert part-time to year round employment and generating expanded sources of revenues.

Theatre and the arts is multifaceted with lots of benefits. Individuals look to the arts for inspiration, excitement and enjoyment, corporations count on the arts to enrich the quality of life for their employees, and state and local government rely on the arts to bring tourists, conventions, new businesses and residents to the state.

The arts industry is unique—it produces a product which can be exported and yet draws millions of people from all over the world to participate in or partake of these artistic activities. It is also a quality of life and economic development issue, not just a luxury or a recreational issue. Convincing business and government leaders of the importance of the arts and culture is not enough, the public needs to be informed as well. There can be development without destroying the ancient past, our source of pride. With careful planning we do not have to be engulfed by overgrowth. Supporting the arts is not totally just something "nice to do". It is also self-enlightenment and self-interest for all sectors.

I invite you all to see "Santa Fe Spirit". Every New Mexican will be proud of this production and their own "Santa Fe Spirit."

TRIBUTE TO FRANK SOUSA

HON. BARBARA BOXER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 1, 1989

Mrs. BOXER. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in order to acknowledge and pay tribute to an outstanding Californian, Mr. Frank Sousa. Frank has been one of labor's leaders as the directing business representative of District Lodge 190 of the International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, AFL–CIO, and has been a constant source of pride for both his fellow machinists and the community at large.

The machinists will be honoring Frank, as he retired effective February 1, at a testimonial dinner in San Francisco on April 8, but I would like to take this opportunity to honor him here. Frank was initiated into the machinists union on August 26, 1953, and he has served as the directing business representative of District Lodge 190 since 1977.

Frank has compiled an impressive list of positions both inside and outside the union. When he retired from active service he held such positions as machinists delegate to the national AFL–CIO, chairman of the Western States Trucking Committee for the National Auto Transporters, chairman for the Sea Land west coast negotiating committee as well as vice president of the California Labor Federation for the AFL–CIO.

It is not just his accomplishments in the field of labor that make Frank stand out, though. Frank is one of the wonderful people that I have come in contact with in all of my years of public service. He is warm and intelligent and a true inspiration.

Mr. Speaker, I consider it a privilege to be able to speak on behalf of Mr. Sousa, and it fills me with great pride to join his colleagues in the machinists union in honoring this appreciated and respected citizen.

THE GUN LOBBY IS RUNNING OUT OF AMMO

HON. LAWRENCE J. SMITH

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 1, 1989

Mr. SMITH of Florida. Mr. Speaker, as a proud supporter of the Brady amendment, the cosponsor of legislation to regulate assault rifles, and the sponsor of a bill to put an end to "Saturday Night Specials," I direct my colleagues' attention to an article from the February 13, 1989, Christian Science Monitor, by Ms. Mary L. Grow.

Her arguments are concise, precise, and irrefutable.

THE GUN LOBBY IS RUNNING OUT OF AMMO

(By Mary L. Grow)

Every time a madman enters a school yard and sprays children with bullets, we see affirmation of the unfettered right to bear arms—the principle for which the National Rifle Association spends millions each year to influence votes in Congress.

In response to those who are appalled at the ease with which even mentally unstable criminals like Patrick Edward Purdy can obtain arms (including military assault weapons), advocates of gun ownership trot out the old saw: "When guns are outlawed, only outlaws will have guns."

Of course, laws will always be violated. But the imperfection of human nature gives society no excuse for failing to create laws that reflect the behaviors we aspire to.

The National Rifle Association (NRA) puts forward three arguments against gun control: The first is constitutional, the second based on the perceived need to defend home and family, and the third political. None holds up to scrutiny.

THE CONSTITUTIONAL ARGUMENT

In a 1939 case involving the use of a sawed-off shotgun, the Supreme Court declared unanimously: "In the absence of any evidence showing that possession or use of [the sawed-off shotgun] has some reasonable relationship to the preservation or efficiency of a well regulated militia, we cannot say that the Second Amendment guarantees the right to keep and bear such an instrument." Constitutional scholars point to this as the clearest statement the court has made on the meaning of the Second Amendment.

Former U.S. Supreme Court Justice Lewis F. Powell Jr., a moderate (who also happens to be rifle-owning hunter), gave a speech in August to the Criminal Justice Section of the American Bar Association. "Much scholarly debate," he said, "has centered on the extent to which the Second Amendment applies to private ownership of arms, or is restricted to the need for a 'well regulated militia.' With respect to handguns, however—as opposed to sporting rifles and shotguns—it is not easy to understand why the Second Amendment, or the notion of liberty, would be viewed as creating a right to own and carry a weapon that contributes so directly to the shocking number of murders in our country."

THE SELF-PROTECTION ARGUMENT

The medical community has begun to see Americans' high rate of gun-related deaths as a public health issue. The New England Journal of Medicine last spring published an article comparing how often a gun was used successfully in slaying an intruder with how often a privately owned gun was responsible for suicides, accidents, or murders among family members and acquaintances. The findings: A gun in the home is 43 times more likely to be used to kill or injure the homeowner or a family member than it is to kill an intruder.

THE POLITICAL ARGUMENT

For decades, conventional wisdom has held that it is political suicide for a politician to support gun control. This belief grew out of several well publicized political defeats, engineered and financed by the NRA. Sen. Joseph Tydings of Maryland was a notable example, forever held up, of the inevitable defeat awaiting any politician who took on the NRA.

But, though the myth lives on, it no longer corresponds to reality. The NRA has suffered a number of defeats around the country during the last year or so. Although it spent $6 million to the opposition's $500,000, the NRA lost in its effort to repeal the new Maryland law banning the sale and manufacture of Saturday night specials. In Minnesota, some courageous legislators drew on strong citizen opposition to turn what looked like certain NRA victory on a "right-to-bear-arms" amendment to the state constitution into defeat.

A Minnesota poll of one year ago highlighted the fact that 80 percent of Minnesotans, including 77 percent of gun owners, support stronger gun control. A recent Gallop Poll showed that 91 percent of all Americans favor a seven-day waiting period for handgun purchases, and 84 percent favor federal licensing of gun owners. It would hardly take political courage to support gun control in today's climate.

Politicians often follow public opinion rather than lead it. My seatmate on a recent flight was a young military intelligence officer with a shirt full of ribbons and, above them, a combat infantryman's badge. In the course of a wide-ranging conversation, he told me that he used to belong to the NRA but had quit in disgust over its irresponsible positions on gun control. When will our politicians begin to catch up with such wisdom?

In the wake of yet another schoolyard slaughter, I feel outrage at those who say that their right to shoot at targets is greater than the right of small children to live free from the perils that result from our lack of safeguards over who may own guns and how they may be used. I feel outrage at the politicians who fail to prohibit the sale of assault weapons and at those who voted against the Brady Amendment, which would have mandated a seven-day waiting period before any handgun purchase. And I feel outrage at the NRA for equating God, the Constitution, apple pie, and freedom with the unregulated ownership of firearms.

I believe that every politician whose vote has been influenced by fear of the NRA or indebtedness to huge NRA campaign contributions must take some responsibility for the tragedy in Stockton, Calif.

THE NORTHEAST-MIDWEST CONGRESSIONAL COALITION TAKES AIM ON ENERGY AND NATURAL RESOURCES

HON. CLAUDINE SCHNEIDER

OF RHODE ISLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 1, 1989

Ms. SCHNEIDER. Mr. Speaker, the 101st Congress faces an array of critical challenges that profoundly impact the economy and quality of life throughout Northeastern and Midwestern States. The Northeast-Midwest Coalition has outlined its regional policy agenda for the 101st Congress in our biweekly newsletter, the Northeast-Midwest Economic Review. As a member of the coalition's executive committee I would like to share the following excerpt from the Economic Review with my colleagues and I encourage coalition members to become involved in advancing the regional agenda.

[From the Northeast-Midwest Economic Review, Vol. 2, No. 1]

ENERGY AND NATURAL RESOURCES

HAZARDOUS WASTE REDUCTION

With two-thirds of the nation's Superfund sites, the Northeast-Midwest region has reason to be concerned about the proliferation of hazardous wastes that create environmental risks and economic costs. A 1985 National Academy of Sciences' report found that toxic contamination of the Great Lakes exposed inhabitants of the Midwest to serious health risk, and pointed out that such pollution was derived from numerous sources, including air emissions, wastewater discharges, leaking landfills, and nonpoint runoff.

Proper management of hazardous materials must be undertaken on a multi-media basis, and industrialists and environmentalists are beginning to realize that wastes should be reduced at their source, curtailing the pollutants before they become a problem. Case studies show that multi-media waste reduction programs have saved industries money in processing, raw materials, and waste-handling costs.

In 1987, Reps. Howard Wolpe (D-Mich). Claudine Schneider (R-RI), Dennis Eckart (D-Ohio), Sherwood Boehlert (R-NY) and Sen. Frank Lautenberg (D-NJ) introduced the Hazardous Waste Reduction Act (H.R. 2800 and S. 1439), based on work by the Northeast-Midwest organizations. The bills would promote voluntary multi-media waste reduction, establish a high-level office at EPA, and create a clearinghouse for information on innovative waste reduction programs that would be accessible to industries and others seeking assistance. They also would establish a program of grants to states that provide technical assistance to small businesses seeking help in reducing their waste management costs. Although slightly different versions of this legislation passed the House and the Senate at the close of the 100th Congress, the two measures could not be reconciled prior to adjournment. Throughout 1989, the Northeast-Midwest organizations will continue to aggressively promote hazardous waste reduction.

SOLID WASTE

Garbage and ash barges—some roaming across the oceans for more than two years in search of a dumping site—vividly display the inability of local officals to manage the waste generated within their borders. Landfills, particularly in the Northeast, are running out of room. In five years, 27 states will deplete their landfill capacity.

As with the hazardous waste problem, garbage can best be managed by reducing its production. Several state and local governments have recently taken actions to support source reduction and recycling, but Washington must play an expanded role in establishing minimum standards, promoting market incentives, and fostering research and technology transfer.

The 101st Congress will consider solid waste management as it reauthorizes the Resource Conservation and Recovery Act (RCRA). The Coalitions plan to play an active role in the legislative debate. The Institute, meantime, will develop several papers that review the problem and policy options.

GREAT LAKES

The Great Lakes, the world's largest supply of surface freshwater, binds much of the Northeast-Midwest region. The history of the Great Lakes states is one of struggle to balance the needs of a dymanic, highly industrializedd society with those of its natural environment. Toxic pollution today threatens to tip that balance. Activities to preserve this natural resource have evolved from relatively simple early programs to upgrade sewage treatment plants, to more complex efforts to contain the enormous flow of toxic contaminants entering the watershed every day.

The Coalitions' Great Lakes Water Resources Task Forces—co-chaired by Representatives James Oberstar (D-MN), Carl Pursell (R-MI), Henry Nowak (D-NY), and Fred Upton (R-MI) in the House and Senators John Glenn (D-OH) and David Durenberger (R-MN) in the Senate—will continue to support the full authorized funding for the Great Lakes programs. In 1988, Members worked to include provisions within the Clean Water Act amendments to expand the Great Lakes National Program Office's responsibilities; they also increased its budget by $11 million.

The Institute will pay particular attention to the cleanup of the 42 "areas of concern" around the Great Lakes where contamination is so bad that use of the area has been curtailed. A report on funding options for the cleanup will be distributed in early 1989. To coincide with activities by other Great Lakes groups, the Task Forces will organize a hearing on regional issues in March. The groups also hope to organize two tours—one for U.S. Representatives and Canadian Parlimentarians and one for members of the media—to examine first-hand air toxics, contaminated sediments, and other environmental problems throughout the lakes.

GROUNDWATER

Leaking underground storage tanks are serious threats to the region's groundwater. In response, the Institute has published several papers drawing attention to the issue, and the Coalition helped establish a Trust Fund that should provide approximately $500 million over a four-year period to assist states in clean-up operations.

The Institute has issued a paper on how land-use controls can be designed to protect groundwater, as well as Groundwater Protection: Obstacles and Legislative Solutions, a report on policy options to preserve the region's precious groundwater resource. In 1989, the groups hope to promote full funding for Trust Fund activities and to survey state uses of those funds.

WATER SUBSIDIES

One of the most egregious regional budget inequities is the Bureau of Reclamation's (BuRec) generous subsidies for irrigation and industrial and urban water supply projects throughout the 17 western states. The fiscal 1986 irrigation subsidy totaled $534 million, and analysts estimate total support throughout the century has surpassed $20 billion. Ironically, 38 percent of the acreage irrigated by BuRec is used to produce surplus crop that receive additional USDA price and income supports totaling some $730 million annually.

Rep. Sam Gejdenson (D-CT) has introduced legislation to require farmers using Reclamation water for the production of surplus crops to pay the full cost of that water. Sen. John Heinz (R-PA) will introduce a companion measure in the 101st Congress.

LOW-INCOME ENERGY ASSISTANCE

Because the nation's poor should not face the choice between food and fuel, Congress approved the Low-Income Home Energy Assistance Program (LIHEAP) to provide vital federal assistance to poor families facing high household energy costs. Unfortunately, that program has been severely cut, causing real pain for poor people in the colder northern states.

The average U.S. household spent about 4 to 5 percent of its income on energy in 1986, but poor families must pay a hefty 14 to 15 percent of their income. In 1980, the LIHEAP program paid about 40 percent of low-income families' home energy costs. By 1987, that support had declined to 19.5 percent.

In February 1988, Representative Wolpe (D-MI) and Senator Heinz (R-PA) released an Institute report, Narrowing the Gap: The Energy Needs of the Poor and Federal Funding, which graphically demonstrates the growing gas between energy cost and the poor's ability to pay. Previously, Representatives Jim Jeffords (R-VT) and Charles Hayes (D-IL) released other Institute papers and testified for the Coalition before the Appropriations Committee.

As budget battles become more fierce, the Northeast-Midwest Coalitions will seek broader support for higher LIHEAP funding levels.

ENERGY EFFICIENCY

The Northeast-Midwest region—which pays the nation's highest energy prices and produces less than one-third of the energy it consumes—has a particular concern for energy programs that increase efficiency, promote local renewable resources, and make clean coal use a viable alternative to gas and oil use.

The region has become more efficient since the 1973 oil embargo, using little more energy today than we did 15 years ago but producing almost 40 percent more goods and services. Despite this progress, the United States still uses twice as much energy per unit of industrial output as its competitors in Japan and West Germany. The new administration and Congress can improve U.S. economic viability by creating partnerships with industries and universities to advance research and development of energy efficient technologies.

In November 1988, the Institute sponsored a conference in Boston to identify policy initiatives that advance energy efficiency. Throughout the next two years, it will distribute issue papers and organize Hill briefings that focus on specific measures. The Coalitions, meanwhile, will advocate cost-effective research as well as low-cost conservation incentives.

PATIENT IDENTIFYING INFORMATION CONFIDENTIALITY ACT OF 1989

HON. JIM LIGHTFOOT

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 1, 1989

Mr. LIGHTFOOT. Mr. Speaker, today I introduce legislation, the Patient Identifying Information Confidentiality Act of 1989, which seeks to protect the privacy of individuals who participate in research or treatment programs conducted, supported, or regulated by the Public Health Service [PHS]. This legislation would require the Secretary of the Department of Health and Human Services [HHS] to delete patient identifying information, such as name, Social Security number, and address, from any medical or treatment record acquired or created by the PHS before disclosing that record to Congress. The Secretary would be required to establish by rule a system to identify records without using patient identifying information for the purposes of cross-referencing the records.

This legislation is necessary because currently the Secretary of HHS lacks the authority to restrict congressional access to patient identifying information, even if the patient explicitly requests anonymity. If Congress requests to review complete PHS records, such as adverse drug reaction reports from the Food and Drug Administration or clinical trial records from the National Institutes of Health, and those records contain individual names, addresses, telephone numbers and other identifiable information, then HHS must submit those records to Congress without being able to remove a person's identity from the records.

Enabling the HHS Secretary to delete patient identifying information from treatment and medical records acquired, created, or maintained by the Public Health Service is important for many reasons. For example, it retains the traditional provider/patient relationship of strict confidentiality of a person's participation in a health survey, in a clinical trial, or in a data gathering activity, such as a drug report. Health care providers, public health officials, and researchers could assure patients that their identities would be safeguarded and would remain confidential. Without having this guarantee of strict confidentiality, many individuals would be reluctant to participate in these activities, such as drug trials, if there was a chance that their identities could be revealed.

Furthermore, permitting congressional access to this information is an intrusion into an individual's personal privacy. It denies that person the fundamental right guaranteed by the U.S. Constitution of a right to privacy. Many individuals consider their participation in medical surveys, studies, and trials as sensitive information that they would not like revealed to others, especially to Congress.

The intent of this legislation is not to restrict Congress' legitimate oversight responsibilities over public health programs. Congress has a constitutional right to review the programs and activities of the Public Health Service and to request access to PHS documents and records. This legislation recognizes this right and establishes a mechanism to permit congressional access to treatment and research records containing patient identifying information, while at the same time protecting the confidentiality of individuals whose identities are revealed in the records.

This legislation is similar to a bill I introduced during the 100th Congress, H.R. 5293, which received the strong support of the Department of Health and Human Services and the American Medical Records Association. I plan to seek additional support for this bill during the coming weeks, and hope that my colleagues will join me in this effort.

INCONSISTENCY IN ESTATE TAX LAW

HON. RICHARD T. SCHULZE

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 1, 1989

Mr. SCHULZE. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased today to introduce legislation with my colleagues Congresswoman BOGGS, and Congressmen MURTHA and ANTHONY, to correct an inconsistency in estate tax law. A basic policy since the estate tax was first enacted has been to allow an executor of a decedent who possessed a vested remainder or reversion interest—usually in trust, but also in a life estate—to defer paying the tax on his decedent's possession of the underlying property after all invening income interests have ended. The potential hardship we address, is that the remainder interest gives rise to estate tax on the death of the remainderman before all intervening income interests have ended, but the remainderman's executor is not in possession of assets that can be converted into cash to pay the tax.

In a typical case, a decedent was the vested remainderman of a trust and not entitled to the enjoyment of the trust corpus until the income beneficiary dies. When the income beneficiary later dies, the executor finally has a right to the funds and to use them to pay the remainderman's estate tax plus interest. This longstanding provision—section 6163 of the code—is absolutely essential so that the remainderman's executor is able to meet obligations to the remainderman's beneficiaries while only paying the tax on the remainder interest at the later time when the remainder assets become available.

This provision fails to generate much interest because vested remainders and reversions are relatively rare outside of Louisiana. In most jurisdictions, remainders are usually made conditional on the remainderman surviving the life beneficiary so there is no taxable event when a contingent remainderman predeceases the income beneficiary. The major exception is Louisiana which does not recognize contingent remainders. But this does not excuse failure by Congress to correct an error that arises all the time in Louisiana, and some of the time in other States.

When the remainderman's estate contains assets other than the remainder interest, there often is an urgent need to use these to support his surviving family members. However, the executor is taking a risk when he applies assets to the needs of the remainderman's beneficiaries and defers the tax on the remainder interest. Under stable conditions a deferral would be prudent because the tax is computed on the current value of the remainder, reflecting the deferral for the life expectancy of the income beneficiary. Since the current interest rate is determined very similarly to the way the discount rate is determined, the total tax and interest will proximate the burden if there were no deferral. Assuming a 50-percent estate tax rate, the remainderman's executor would anticipate receiving assets double the tax plus interest burden.

However, in 1975 Congress changed the rule so that the interest burden became completely unpredictable. The interest now changes quarterly with current conditions. This has meant that when a valuation was made on, for example, the 4-percent discount rate that was used for over 30 years, the interest rate might be at the current 10-percent rate or higher. In current terms, the present discount rate is 10 percent but current interest rates might be replaced by an interest rate greatly in excess of 10 percent. The result is that the tax plus interest can greatly exceed the value of the property when it finally comes into possession.

This chance that an election could have extremely adverse results has caused executors to be reluctant to take advantage of the provision whenever there are enough assets in the remainderman's estate to allow them this freedom; fiduciaries are expected not to assume avoidable risks. The result has been that unjustified hardships are imposed on the beneficiaries—the family of the decedent remainderman—because of the risk of a long-term deferral is not acceptable.

The use of the fluctuating interest rate in the case of the typical problem posed by lack of liquidity in other types of estates is very different. In those circumstances, the executor should have an incentive to use due diligence in liquidating the estate assets and in effect, the estate has a series of short-term loans. However, if the decedent has a vested remainder or a reversion, there frequently isn't any option to waiting until the period expires or the income beneficiary dies, and once the assets other than the remainder are distributed, the executor can only wait. There is in effect a loan for the total term of deferral during the period that elapses before termination of the intervening income interests.

The result is that executors who must make the election to defer because the vested remainder interest is the major part of the estate are assuming risks that are both unreasonable and unavoidable. In addition, even an executor who has possession of other assets has a difficult balance between the rights of the decedent's beneficiaries and the risk entailed in the variable interest rates, being asked to accept an unreasonable risk if he relies—or is forced by circumstances to rely—on the latter.

Our legislation will restore the historic relationship between the discount rate and the interest rate. When the discount rate is low, the tax is high but interest rates are low. When the discount rate is high the tax is low but the interest rate should be high.

The bill also closes a loophole in present law when the interest rate subsequently falls so that an executor with adequate other assets turns out to have unfairly reduced the tax burden by making the deferral election. If interest rates go down, deferral is continued and the estate has a lower total burden than if the tax had not been deferred. On the other hand, if interest rates go up, the disaster that is a potential for other executors is avoided by then paying the tax and accrued interest. In effect the executor has a no-lose option.

The bill applies to interest that is deferred on taxes on a vested remainder interest under section 6163(a) on the date it is introduced. Some severe hardships have resulted from taxes based on the 4-percent discount rate in effect before 1976 and interest rates that have risen as high as 20 percent. The bill does not change the existing rule for hardship deferrals.

This effort to make the tax law more equitable is essential for Louisiana trusts or usufructs, and also is consistent with our continuing efforts for the country as a whole to provide needed revenues without arbitrary and capricious rules.

CENTRAL AMERICA: GUARANTEEING A SOVIET BEACHHEAD

HON. HENRY J. HYDE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 1, 1989

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Speaker, among the myriad reasons that the Reagan policy in Central America fell on such hard times is that the administration failed to sustain an effective public diplomacy program to tell the American people what it was attempting to accomplish. At one time there was an Office of Public Diplomacy in the State Department that had the mission of telling the administration's story. It sent speakers throughout the country to explain and debate the issue, wrote and distributed publications, and galvanized the entire Government to educate the public about a complex issue. It pushed the bureaucracy to have more intelligence released so that the American people could learn how our security was indeed being threatened by the Soviet advances in the region through Moscow's long-time surrogate, Cuba, and its new-found clients, the Sandinistas in Nicaragua.

One of the most effective members of the Public Diplomacy Office was Col. Larry Tracy, a U.S. Army officer loaned to the State Department because of his indepth knowledge of Latin America and exceptional communication skills. His mission was to speak and write on Central America as a means of providing the public the facts about the region, and what the administration was doing there. He authored the administration's two most respected publications on the region, "The Soviet-Cuban Connection in Central America and the Caribbean" and "The Challenge to Democracy in Central America." He also gave some 400 speeches and debates throughout the country. He retired from the Army in 1986, but continues to speak and write on the issue as the senior policy consultant for Americans for Democracy in Latin America [ADLA], a nonprofit educational project based in Portland, OR.

Earlier this month, Colonel Tracy's article "Central America: Guaranteeing a Soviet Beachhead" appeared in The American Legion magazine whose 2.8 million readers have an avid interest in matters impacting on the security of the United States. I believe this article contains such sage advice on what the Bush administration and the Congress should do to avoid the dilemma of either a Communist Central America or sending young Americans to fight and die there that I am submitting the article for inclusion in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

GUARANTEEING A SOVIET BEACHHEAD

(By Col. Lawrence L. Tracy)

The 41st U.S. President inherits an expanding economy, improved relations with the Soviet Union, and a world in which "peace is breaking out all over." But storm clouds are gathering over the administration as it begins.

The darkest cloud looms over Central America, which may soon, in the words of Zbigniew Brzezinski, former presidential security adviser, become the nation's "most preoccupying challenge . . . the most urgent foreign priority."

Even when Ronald Reagan took office in 1981, the region gave cause for alarm. Two years earlier, the Soviet Union and Cuba had gained new clients in Nicaragua and Grenada, and military aid to keep the new regimes in power was pouring in from the communist-bloc. In El Salvador, guerrillas were trying to blast their way into power with U.S. weapons captured in Vietnam and sent covertly to El Salvador from Hanoi, via Cuba and Nicaragua.

The new administration was eager to respond to the Soviet challenge. The Central America-Caribbean area was perceived as the perfect place to disprove the Brezhnev Doctrine that communism was "irreversible." The strategic importance of the region derives from its geographic location and the fact that half the imported petroleum and U.S. commerce, and more than half of NATO resupplies, pass through the waters of the Caribbean and the Gulf of Mexico.

U.S. prestige had suffered in Vietnam; the administration believed it could be restored by stemming communist expansion in Central America with a blend of political, economic and military aid to encourage the formation of a democratic center, giving the people an alternative to right- and left-wing extremists. The objective was to prevent another Cuba and avoid another Vietnam.

The result of this policy was the emergence of elected governments in the region, a decline in support for communist guerrillas, and a U.S. rescue operation in Grenada, which was overwhelmingly supported by the people of that island. In Nicaragua, the revolution showed signs of wilting, as an insurgent movement emerged—dubbed the "Contras" by the beleaguered Sandinistas—and received arms and training from the U.S. government. The Reagan Doctrine appeared to be on track, despite the fact that Moscow was giving Cuba and Nicaragua eight times more economic and military aid than the United States was giving the entire region.

Now, as a new administration takes over, the democratic movement in Central America is in trouble. The Contras have been defeated, not by the Sandinistas, but by the U.S. Congress. In El Salvador, showcase of the democratic experiment, the reformist Duarte government is faltering, and key members in Congress are threatening a military aid cutoff if the conservative ARENA Party wins the presidency in March. Time now appears to be on the side of the communist guerrillas who once were teetering on the brink of defeat.

The future of democracy in Central America, so promising a short time ago, is in jeopardy because of the lack of U.S. resolve, misguided congressional policies, and the failure of the past administration to enunciate its policy well enough to gain the understanding and support of the American people.

The President of the United States has the responsibility to use his office to educate the public to the national security threats he perceives and the necessary action he must take. If Congress opposes him, he must force a national debate on the issue to allow the people to decide. Despite his unequaled skill as a communicator, the President failed to convince the American people of the danger mushrooming in Central America, and was thus unable to force accountability on Congress, especially the House of Representatives.

If the new administration is to avoid a catastrophe in the region, it must do what the previous administration could not: forge a bipartisan consensus on Central America. It will not be easy. The confrontations on the issue with Congress have left a lot of blood on the floor, and the bitter 1988 presidential campaign may exacerbate partisan hostility. Moreover, the new administration's decision not to make Central America a key issue of the election campaign seems to dispute any argument that its overwhelming victory at the polls signals a mandate for intensifying the Reagan policy.

To turn things around, this administration must follow a two-track, persuasion-and-pressure policy aimed at developing a positive relationship with Congress and respecting its foreign policy prerogatives, while protecting the constitutional power of the presidency. Simultaneously, it must build grass-roots support in all 50 states as a means to pressure Congress into responding to the crisis facing the country.

The persuasion track requires cooperation and communication with Congress, ending the adversarial attitude that prevailed on Central America during the Reagan years. Excluding Congress from consultation, or intentionally misleading it, is not only legally questionable, it is dumb politics. Our new President must make it clear he wants to work with Congress on Central America, but be ready to demand a public debate if agreement is not reached, forcing an "up-or-down" vote on the issue to achieve accountability.

Bipartisan consensus already has been achieved on U.S.-Soviet relations; it can be reached on Central America if, in the words of the late Sen. Arthur Vandenberg, partisan differences "stop at the water's edge." Few members of Congress now hold any sympathy for the Sandinistas. What support Managua had enjoyed has been squandered by its blatant abuse of human rights, close ties to Moscow, and unprovoked military aggression against its neighbors, a fact attested to by some of the most outspoken congressional foes of the past administration's policy.

However, Congress has tried to have it both ways. Many Democrats, and some Republicans, have rattled the sabers of U.S. military power to demonstrate their anti-communist position, but then cast votes to end Contra aid and limit assistance to the democracies in the region. Future historians may view such hypocrisy as guaranteeing the Soviet beachhead these same congressmen have said is unacceptable.

Congressional opponents of Contra aid have taken political cover behind the Arias Peace Plan. To support it, Congress ended all military aid to the Contras in February 1988. The Soviets showed no such restraint rushing in almost $500 million in military aid since the pact was signed in August 1987—more than twice the total amount the United States has provided the Contras in seven years.

President Oscar Arias knows he is not "taking a chance for peace," by requesting Washington to disarm the Contras. Arias has stated he expects the United States to protect Costa Rica if it is threatened by the Sandinistas.

Ambivalence over Central America makes Congress vulnerable to an administration pressure campaign designed to inform the American people about the administration's policy in Central America and the need for congressional support.

The policy itself should have as its long-term goal economic growth and the creation of jobs by developing free-market economies that contribute to democracy and deprive communism of the grievances upon which it feeds. But this pressure track must also emphasize that the current security crisis, if not resolved, could result in sending America's sons to Central America later because Congress would not send guns now.

Abraham Lincoln said. "Give the people the facts, and the Republic will be safe." The new administration and Congress must work together and give Americans the facts on Central America, and then listen to the people's voice.

H.R. 135, CONCERNING PRODUCT LIABILITY RECORD RETENTION

HON. CARDISS COLLINS

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 1, 1989

Mrs. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, many companies are regularly feeding documents into shredders today in the name of "document reduction" programs. In reality, they are eliminating documents which could be crucial to the merits of a plaintiff's product liability claim! Such business practices must universally be condemned as intolerable.

This issue arises in a variety of contexts in product liability suits. The documents obtained during the discovery process help the plaintiff's lawyer to verity the statements of witnesses, refresh the memory of those who have forgotten key details of design and safety, and fill in the gaps from witnesses who have died, disappeared or are beyond the court's jurisdiction. Where a particularly long statute of limitations or repose is involved, the manufacturer's documents are especially important due to the difficulty in remembering details from so many years before. Most significantly, on matters where the plaintiff carries the burden of proof, they must have fair access to the evidence necessary to present their case.

The importance of providing plaintiffs with access to a manufacturer-defendant's documents is illustrated in a recent book describing the Dalkon Shield tragedy. As the author describes:

Thousands of documents sought by lawyers for victims . . . sank from sight in suspicious circumstances. A few were hidden for a decade in a home basement in Tulsa, Oklahoma. Other records were destroyed in a city dump in Columbus, Indiana, and some allegedly in an A.H. Robins furnace.

This is not an isolated case. After an American Airlines DC–10 crashed in Chicago in 1979, one of the most serious aircraft crashes in history, the airline's lawyer instructed the author of an in-house report on the accident to destroy all notes, memoranda, and other data. Many believe that this material could have established the fact that the airline knew of a crack in the engine bulkhead before the accident occured.

To prohibit these practices, in January, I introduced H.R. 135, which would require manufacturers to retain for 25 years their documents and other data which directly relate to the elements of a product liability action. Materials concerning design specifications, warranties, warnings, and general product safety would thus be retained and available for use at trial.

Strong civil penalties would be imposed by this bill in instances where evidence has been destroyed or concealed. If a court found that a litigant wilfully destroyed or altered any key evidence, it could conclude that the facts at issue did, in fact, exist as contended by the innocent party. Monetary penalties would also be assessed, as they are a tried and true method for encouraging compliance with the law. A rebuttable presumption would apply where the documents were negligently removed or where the documents were nonwilfully eliminated in some other way.

H.R. 135 is needed for a number of reasons. Its utility focuses primarily on the availability of evidence necessary for making a product liability claim, as discussed earlier. Additionally, record retention will facilitate and expedite justice. The benefits here include saving time which decreases the backlog in the courts; saving unnecessary attorney's fees, which would otherwise limit claimants to those who could afford to bring a suit; fairer and more consistent verdicts, due to cases being decided from the original sources of evidence; and enhanced prospects for out-of-court settlements, which, once again, would decrease judicial backlogs. At the very least, it would encourage manufacturers to rethink the wisdom of destroying, altering or hiding vital documents. Under the best of circumstances, it may get companies to act responsibly and take safety precautions or correct defective products where records warn of such hazards. After all, greater product safety remains the bottom line.

In spite of these laudatory benefits, some will object to this proposal. They will argue that it imposes burdensome recordkeeping requirements on companies. My bill only requires companies to keep papers which, gain, directly relate to the elements of a product liability claim as defined by this bill—nothing more.

Others will argue that it is punitive to allow an adverse inference to be drawn against a party failing to produce a document, especially those who don't intentionally destroy papers with a malicious intent. However, ever since the 17th century in England, and continuing throughout our history, it has been a well-established premise of law to do so. Even still, my bill would merely give the court discretion to apply a rebuttable presumption, as opposed to requiring that anything be conclusively established. Thus, my bill treats these circumstances with moderation.

As for those who negligently mishandle documents, we need a procedure that will discourage the systematic destruction of vital records, no matter what the intent. According to an American Bar Association survey taken several years ago, more than 50 percent of those polled said that they often or always encounter programs reducing documents which relate to product liability issues.

Furthermore, "accidental" destruction of documents is often illusory. For example, a defendant may claim that a clerk changed offices and disposed of some loose papers which turned out to be documents related to product design. Those documents have been "willfully," yet not "maliciously," destroyed. But the entire premise of such an allegation is falacious. Critical documents concerning design, performance, and safety are not kept randomly in the desks of lower echelon clerks. They are treated with the importance that they do carry and are retained in vaults, computers, or other safeguarding devices. And even if they were, in fact, kept in the clerk's desk, it is possible that such an unorthodox practice had "losing" the document as a prime motivation. This example illustrates the need to address the never-ending permutations of creative and seemingly innocent methods of document elimination.

Opponents will also contend that this will duplicate existing laws on record retention. Many laws do exist to help Government officials enforce compliance with regulations or help develop information for potential rulemaking. But they do not apply to the same types of records that this bill would apply to. Although there would be occasional overlap, the existing record retention laws generally apply to records which pertain to regulatory concerns. My bill would apply to documents pertaining to product liability concerns. Other laws relate to specific products as opposed to all those capable of causing injury. Finally, there is no consistency among record retention laws in the method of enforcement, penalties for noncompliance, the types of documents that must be stored and the length of time they must be kept. Most importantly, they don't provide a private right of enforcement.

In addition, court-imposed penalties apply where documents are destroyed in anticipation of litigation. This amendment would also apply where documents are routinely destroyed as business practice. Thus, existing law needs to be supplemented.

Mr. Speaker, if anyone doubts the importance of record retention, they should consider two situations. First, what recourse would asbestos victims have had if someone did not locate the Johns Manville memo showing that the company knew of the health hazards of its product as early as 1930? And second, what compensation would have been awarded to the Grimshaw family if the cost-benefit analysis done by Ford in its Pinto accident cases had not "come to light"? The answer in both instances is little, if anything, and the victims would have been unjustly uncompensated.

A TRIBUTE TO THE JOHN MARSHALL HIGH SCHOOL BARRISTERS

HON. HENRY A. WAXMAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 1, 1989

Mr. WAXMAN. Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to bring to the attention of my colleagues an outstanding group of students—the John Marshall High School Barristers who recently won their second Los Angeles County Mock Trial Competition.

Ana Liza Fulay, Arisa Mattson, and Sean Williams served as lawyers and Carlos Brooks and Jessica Bernstein handled the pre-trial/law in motion duties for the Marshall team. Carlo won the county prize for best pre-trial lawyering.

Marshall students Lola Moon Glaudini, Jane Gyllenhammar, Shira Myrow, Eli Keltner, Neora Myrow, and Jessica Bernstein served as trial witnesses. Other Marshall students on the winning team were Heidi Kubota, Bearin Santos, Amanda Wallace, and Norma Villalon.

Claire Goldblum and David Tokofsky, teachers at Marshall High, directed the team. Los Angeles City attorney Diane Wentworth and Riverside County district attorney Robert Spira provided legal training. The students were supported and encouraged by many other Marshall High teachers.

In order to even qualify for the final round of the competition, each team must win five previous trial contests. All trials were heard by superior and municipal court judges at the Los Angeles Superior Court House. Volunteer attorneys from the District and City Attorneys' offices, the Public Defender's Office, and the private sector scored the trials along with the judges.

The Marshall team performed so well that many attorneys and judges involved in the competition praised the students' performance as better than that of many university law students. The Marshall team ranges in age from 15 to 18 years old.

Mr. Speaker, I am quite proud of the impressive accomplishments of this exceptional group of students. I wish the team the best of luck in the State finals next month where I am sure they will give their usual, excellent performance.

CORRECTION OF H.R. 1092, A BILL TO PROHIBIT OPEN ALCOHOL CONTAINERS IN VEHICLES

HON. BYRON L. DORGAN

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 1, 1989

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, on February 23, 1989, I introduced H.R. 1092, legislation to prohibit open alcohol containers in vehicles, which contained an inadvertent error in the short title. The Extension of Remarks on page E 507 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for Thursday, February 23, 1989, explains the bill accurately. However, the short title of H.R. 1092 that appears on page H 381 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for Thursday, February 23, 1989, is incorrect. The proper title and text should read as follows:

H.R. 1092

ST. JOSEPH'S R.C. CHURCH, BAYONNE CELEBRATES CENTENNIAL

HON. FRANK J. GUARINI

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 1, 1989

Mr. GUARINI. Mr. Speaker, I would like to share with the Members of this body the celebration of the 100th anniversary of St. Joseph's Church, one of the oldest Slovak parishes in the East and the second Roman Catholic Church to be founded in Bayonne.

The year-long celebration began on December 12, 1987 with a Mass celebrated by the Most Reverend Jerome A. Pechillo, regional bishop of Hudson County and auxiliary to the Archbishop of Newark, assisted by Rev. Andrew J. Frye, administrator of St. Joseph's Parish; Rev. Msgr. Clement A. Ockay, pastor emeritus; Rev. John E. Komar, associate pastor; and Rev. Msgr. Michael A. Komar. Parishioners and friends attended a cocktail hour and banquet held at the parish auditorium.

On Sunday, March 5, 1989, the people of St. Joseph's Slovak R.C. Church will observe the 50th anniversary of the founding of the Slovak Republic with the celebration of Mass offered for the people of Slovakia at 12 noon at St. Joseph's Church, 317 Avenue E, Bayonne, NJ. After the Mass, at 2 p.m. a brief program will be conducted in the Bayonne Municipal Chambers, 630 Avenue C. The observance will concude with the raising of the Slovak flag in front of the municipal building.

The history of the parish dates back to 1888 when Rev. Joseph Kosalko founded the church in the Constable Hook section. Father Kosalko, the first priest mentioned in the annals of St. Joseph's Church, had wandered about to scattered colonies of Slovak immigrants, exhorting them to cherish and preserve their faith and administering the sacraments.

In the course of his ministrations to the people of Bayonne, Father Kosalko noted that a Lutheran Church in Constable Hook was for sale. He proceeded to get permission from Bishop Winand M. Wigger, of Newark, to establish St. Joseph's Parish. Later that year, with a committee composed of John Gottko, John Merkovsky, and Andrew Porubsky, the doors of the newly purchased edifice were opened as the Slovak Roman Catholic Church.

St. Joseph was unanimously chosen as patron of the new congregation.

The first appointed pastor was Rev. Samuel Bella who came to Bayonne in 1889 and worked with the congregation until 1895.

After Rev. John A. Hlebik and Rev. Francis J. Simonik had administered the parish, Rev. Emery F. Richtarsik came to St. Joseph's in 1899. By that time the parish had been in existence for 11 years and the congregation had spread to other parts of Bayonne. Father Richtartsik then purchased the site of the present church builidng at 25th Street and Avenue E.

Succeeding Father Richtartsik, Rev. George Szikora then began building a new church in 1906 and on July 4, 1908, Rt. Rev. Msgr. Charles J. Kelly blessed and set the cornerstone of the building. On Palm Sunday, April 4, 1909, services were held in the new church for the first time.

Father Szikora also founded the parochial school. He obtained the Sisters of St. Dominic from Newburgh, NY. The first principal when the school opened in 1909 was Sister M. Augusta.

Following a 3-month interim administration by Rev. Andrew Liktor and Rev. Honorat Rogovsky, O.F.M., Rev. Andrew L. Adzima then became pastor of St. Joseph's Church in 1915. In 1921 he had the present school built and later the new rectory. Father Adzima also organized the Holy Name Society, the Children of Mary Sodality, the Altar Rosary Society, and the Catholic War Veterans.

The growth of the parish eventually made a curate imperative, and on May 21, 1921, Rev. Joseph A. Chmely became curate and spiritual director of the Children of Mary Sodality, mixed choir and League of Catholic Action.

Rev. William A. Hornak, a son of St. Joseph's parish, was appointed as curate in 1932, and because of his interest in sports was assigned to the directorship of young men in the parish.

Father Adzima was elevated to the rank of right reverend monsignor in May 1941. He continued among the parishioners until March 1947, when he passed away.

Father Chmely then became pastor of St. Joseph's. He continued his work for the future of the parish and in 1952 began his program to renovate the church.

On January 3, 1960, Father Chmely was elevated by Archbishop Thomas Boland at Sacred Heart Cathedral, Newark, as a right reverend monsignor.

Upon the death of Monsignor Chmely, Rev. Clement A. Ockay, also a son of St. Joseph's parish, became pastor of St. Joseph's Church on February 18, 1968, and also had responsibility for St. Joseph's school. On May 21, 1986 Father Ockay was elevated by Archibishop Peter L. Gerety at Sacred Heart Cathedral, Newark, to the rank of monsignor. Monsignor Ockay was instrumental in making many improvements in St. Joseph's Church and church property as well as demonstrating a forceful stand to avoid closing our school. He was active in Slovak affairs and is past chaplain of the Slovak Catholic Federation's eastern region.

In 1956 when Father Andrew J. Frye was ordained to the priesthood for the Archdiocese of Newark, his first assignment was to St. Joseph's R.C. Slovak Church in Bayonne, NJ, where he served until 1960 under the pastorate of Msgr. Joseph A. Chmely. Father Frye returned to St. Joseph's as administrator, following the retirement from the pastorate of Msgr. Clement A. Ockay.

Father Frye was appointed pastor of St. Joseph's, December 1, 1987, and installed by Bishop Pechillo on January 31, 1988. Father Frye passed away October 13, 1988.

The following priests have served as curates of St. Joseph's: Rev. George Hresko, Rev. George Senderak, Rev. Michael Hudak, Rev. Michael Simko, Rev. Andrew Frye, Rev. Eugene Boneski, Rev. Francis Burla, Rev. Thomas Onacilla, Rev. James McKenna, Rev. Andrew Kalafsky, Rev. John Hopkins, Rev. Michael German, Rev. Edward Matash, and Rev. John Komar.

Many special events were held during the centennial year. The year-long anniversary ended on Saturday, December 11, 1988, with a Mass of Thanksgiving celebrated by Archbishop Theodore E. McCarrick at St. Joseph's Church, with a gala banquet held at the Hi Hat.

Archbishop McCarrick named Rev. Theodore W. Osbahr, pastor of St. Joseph's, Bayonne, effective January 14, 1989, succeeding Father Frye, and the new pastor was installed on Sunday February 19, 1989, by the Most Reverend Jerome A. Pechillo, regional bishop of Hudson County.

The contributions of Slovak Americans to the development of America have been momentous. In war and peace they have stood shoulder to shoulder with all good Americans for the defense and development of our great Nation. The history of Slovak Americans for the past 50 years is well known. The trials and tribulations of those who are still residing in Europe make us appreciate the freedom America has provided.

I wish to commend Madeline Hoppey and Bayonne City Councilman Joseph Makowski, who are cochairpersons of the Slovak Independence Day program on March 5. The program they have arranged is of deep social and historical significance and the good people of Bayonne will be joined by visitors from other areas at the events planned from the noonday Mass at St. Joseph's to the flag raising in front of the Bayonne City Hall at 2 p.m.

I am certain that my colleagues wish to join me today in this tribute to a courageous group of brothers and sisters who believe in freedom and dignity for all individuals.

NATIONAL DIGESTIVE DISEASE AWARENESS MONTH

HON. CLAUDE PEPPER

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 1, 1989

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, for 5 consecutive years, I introduced a House joint resolution to designate 1 week of the year "National Digestive Disease Awareness Week." For the last 2 years, to give this area of concern the attention it merits, legislation was passed naming May "National Digestive Disease Awareness Month." To continue our successful effort to enhance the awareness of the American public, the Congress and the administration through this effort, I am introducing today a bill designating May 1989 "National Digestive Disease Awareness Month."

Digestive diseases are more widespread than many imagine. More than 20 million Americans suffer from chronic diseases of the digestive system. Over 14 million cases of acute digestive diseases are treated in this country annually, and one-third of all malignancies are digestive related.

Digestive diseases rank third among illnesses in total cost in the United States. Digestive diseases necessitate 25 percent of all surgical operations. These illnesses represent one of the Nation's most serious health problems in terms of discomfort and pain, personal expenditures for treatment, working hours lost, and mortality.

The cost of digestive disease is estimated at $17 billion per year in direct health care costs, and figuring for working hours lost and other losses, the total annual economic burden for digestive disease is close to $50 million annually. Of course, these diseases also take their toll in ways that cannot be measured in dollars.

The bill I introduce today is a response to these high costs, in financial terms and human terms. It calls for a unified national effort to increase awareness and to combat digestive disease.

I urge my colleagues to join me in cosponsoring this initiative, as so many have done in the past.

A TRIBUTE TO ABRAM L. SACHAR

HON. STEPHEN J. SOLARZ

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 1, 1989

Mr. SOLARZ. Mr. Speaker, I rise to pay tribute to Abram L. Sachar, who recently celebrated his 90th birthday. A scholar in the field of Jewish history and one of the most prominent figures in the American educational community, Dr. Sachar is best known as the founding president of Brandeis University.

Abram Sachar was born in 1899 in St. Louis, MO. He received his B.A. and M.A. degrees from Washington University, and then continued his studies at Harvard and Camridge, receiving his Ph.D. degree from the latter in 1923. Dr. Sachar taught history at the University of Illinois for 6 years, and then became the director of the first Hillel Foundation in the United States. In 1933, he was named national director of B'nai B'rith Hillel Foundations, which under his leadership flowered into the principal Jewish student group on American and Canadian campuses. In 1948, Dr. Sachar was tapped as the first president of the newly founded Brandeis University in Waltham, MA. The first nonsectarian Jewish-sponsored university in the United States, Brandeis flourished under Dr. Sachar's guidance. During his presidency, Brandeis developed an excellent academic reputation and saw the establishment of a graduate school of arts and sciences and the Florence Heller School for Advanced Studies in Social Welfare. Upon his retirement from the presidency in 1968, Dr. Sachar was named chancellor of Brandeis. As a 1962 Brandeis graduate, I am proud to have studied during his presidency.

Dr. Sachar is the author of numerous books, including the renowned "A History of the Jews" (1930) and "A Host at Last" (1976), the latter a delightful chronicle of his Brandeis years. Dr. Sachar also hosted the popular public television series "The Course of Our Times" in 1970–71. A brilliant speaker, he has lectured throughout the United States and abroad, and has been the recipient of countless awards as well as honorary degrees from some twenty-five colleges and universities. In 1986, Dr. Sachar received the American Jewish Committee's prestigious Akiba Award, which honors an individual or institution for outstanding contributions to the enrichment of Jewish life through scholarship, leadership, and community service. The award was presented to Dr. Sachar for "his innovative educational leadership, which has made the single Jewish-sponsored university in the United States one of the outstanding institutions of higher learning in the Nation." The Akiba Award was especially appropriate for Abram Sachar, for in the Jewish world, Rabbi Akiba has long been the paradigm of the ideal Jewish leader, the man of learning who was also a man of action.

Dr. Abram Sachar is most certainly a wonder. At age 90 he still displays an uncanny liveliness. His leadership is unparalleled in the Jewish community and in the American community at large. I and his legions of friends around the world wish him a most happy birthday.

CONTINUING HUMAN RIGHTS ABUSES IN HAITI

HON. MAJOR R. OWENS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 1, 1989

Mr. OWENS of New York. Mr. Speaker, a recent report on continuing human rights abuses in Haiti confirms my worst suspicions about the military government headed by Gen. Prosper Avril, who assumed power through a coup last September.

On Saturday, February 24, three human rights groups, Americas Watch, the National Coalition for Haitian Refugees, and Caribbean Rights, a Barbados-based group, issued a report which says that in the 5 months since General Avril came to power, Haiti is "no closer to an elected, lawful government" than it was 3 years ago, after the Duvalier family dictatorship that ruled for 30 years was overthrown.

The report, entitled "The More Things Change * * *" says that while General Avril has set himself apart from those who ruled Haiti in the interim following the Duvalier's fall by meeting with Haitian human rights spokespersons and opposition leaders, his government has nonetheless "countenanced violence against critics." It says the general has "halted significant efforts to disband the paramilitary forces" of the Tonton Macoute, the Duvalier's terrorist secret police which according to the report "have been behind the most violent episodes in Haiti's recent past." Additionally, says the report, "Neither the Avril Government nor its predecessors have made any headway in bringing to justice the perpetrators of the many political killings and other abuses that have continued to plague Haiti since the fall of Duvalier. To the contrary, at the end of December 1988, the Avril Government issued a safe conduct out of the country to former Colonel Franck Romain," a close friend of the man General Avril ousted as President, Lt. Gen. Henri Namphy.

Romain, who became the mayor of Haiti's capitol of Port-au-Prince through fraudulent elections held January 17, 1988, was permitted to leave Haiti and live elsewhere in exile, despite his being implicated as the mastermind of a massacre of 52 unarmed worshippers by gunmen last September at the St. Jean Bosco Church, where popular opposition activist Father Jean-Bertrand Aristide was saying Mass.

Mr. Speaker, late last year the Reagan administration released economic aid funds to Haiti which were "already in the pipeline" but had been held up as the administration attempted to determine if the new Avril government would make good on its promises for democracy and respect for human rights. This report indicates that the new regime is no better than its predecessors, and that the release of the funds was unjustified.

The Bush administration has been silent about what its foreign policy on Haiti will be. I strongly urge the administration to withhold United States funds to Haiti and sever diplomatic relations until the Avril government holds immediate free and fair elections for a civilian administration and a national assembly—rather than wait 2½ years, as Avril proposes, because he feels the people "aren't ready" for elections—disbands the Tonton Macoute, and arrests, tries, and imprisons all those who are involved in human rights abuses, brutality and intimidation.

I would like to submit for publication in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a recent New York Times article concerning the human rights report on Haiti. I am also including a chronology of events in Haiti since the fall of the Duvaliers and my comments on those events.

THREE RIGHTS GROUPS SAY HAITI REGIME BREAKS COMMITMENT TO DEMOCRACY

(By Howard W. French)

Three human rights organizations have charged that the Haitian Government has flouted its commitment to democratic change by failing to stop widespread political violence and intimidation by the army and private paramilitary bands.

The charges were made in a report jointly published Saturday by two New York-based human rights groups, Americas Watch and the National Coalition for Haitian Refugees, and by Caribbean Rights, a human rights group based in Barbados. It asserted that in the five months since Gen. Prosper Avril came to power, Haiti is "no closer to an elected, lawful government" than it was three years ago, after the overthrow of the Duvalier family dictatorship that ruled the country for 30 years.

Throughout this period, the report said, Haiti has been ruled by a succession of military-dominated governments that have pledged "to usher in democracy and respect for human rights," but have instead "mocked these vows with their actions."

"Behind the rotating governments, the changing facades and the competing military factions," in post-Duvalier Haiti, the report said, "lies an unwavering refusal by the army to relinquish its grip on power, together with the opportunities for corruption which that has implied."

The Duvalier dictatorship was ended in February 1986, when Jean-Claude Duvalier was forced into exile in France by a popular uprising against a regime that was widely considered violently repressive and corrupt.

HOPES SEEN AS DISAPPOINTED

Popular hopes for democratic change soared in the wake of the Duvalier overthrow, but the report, titled "The More Things Change . . .," said the net result for ordinary Haitians "has been ongoing political violence and serious human rights abuses."

General Avril took power in September in a coup led by non-commissioned officers of the Presidential Guard. The report said that although he had distinguished himself from his predecessors by pursuing dialogue with democratic opposition groups, his Government had nonetheless "countenanced violence against critics."

The report said General Avril had "halted significant efforts to disband the paramilitary forces," known as the Tonton Macoute, that it said "have been behind the most violent episodes in Haiti's recent past."

"Neither the Avril Government nor its predecessors have made any headway in bringing to justice the perpetrators of the many political killings and other abuses that have continued to plague Haiti since the fall of Duvalier," the report said.

"To the contrary," it said, "at the end of December 1988, the Avril Government issued a safe conduct out of the country to former Col. Franck Romain." He was a close associate of the ousted President, Lieut. Gen. Henri Namphy.

CHURCH MASSACRE CITED

Mr. Romain, who was elected Mayor of the capital, Port-au-Prince, in the internationally discredited elections of Jan. 17, 1988, was locally reported to have engineered the massacre of 53 worshipers by armed thugs at the St. Jean Bosco Church, where a popular priest, Jean-Bertrand Aristside, was saying Mass.

The church massacre, on Sept. 11, 1988, was repeatedly cited by the young officers who overthrew the Namphy regime days later as the one event that drove them to rebellion.

After a brief period of popular support for the new Government, inspired by discussions between General Avril and opposition groups, and the routing by junior officers of commanders they said were venal and murderous, the report said, a climate of cautious optimism among Haitian democrats and human rights observers gave way to deepening disappointment.

A month after coming to power, it said, 15 participants in the September coup, junior officers in the Presidential Guard, were arrested and held for over two months without trial "on unsubstantiated allegations of plotting a coup."

CHRONOLOGY OF CONGRESSMAN MAJOR OWEN'S POSITIONS ON HAITI

February 19, 1986: Congressman Owens charges that the military junta governing Haiti in the wake of Jean-Claude Duvalier's departure is just as brutal and repressive as the previous regimes. He introduces H. Res. 379 which declares the support of the House for free and open elections in Haiti within six months.

February 27, 1986: Congressman Owens urges the establishment of a civilian caretaker government in Haiti, as reports of human rights abuses under the CNG proliferate.

March 5, 1986: Congressman Owens asserts in a House floor speech that Haiti's military junta is following the same antidemocratic policies as the previous Duvalier regime.

March 20, 1986: Congressman Owens cites more incidents of repression by Haiti's ruling military junta, which was appointed by former Haitian President Duvalier.

April 29, 1986: Congressman Owens urges Haiti to set date for free elections.

July 17, 1986: Congressman Owens inserts schedule on election of a new government and the ratification of a new constitution in Haiti in the Congressional Record, and calls for democracy for the island nation.

August 1, 1986: Congressman Owens urges increased U.S. support for Haiti to promote economic reconstruction following the flight of former President Jean-Claude Duvalier.

August 7, 1987: Congressman Owens introduces H. Con. Res. 181, condemning violations of human rights in Haiti. The measure urged President Reagan to immediately suspend all military assistance and all nonemergency economic assistance to the CNG, and to use every means at this disposal, including provision of technical and financial assistance to the Electoral Council in Haiti, to ensure that upcoming national and local elections there would be free and fair. It also called for international organizations (such as the Organization of American States) to make resources and expertise available to the Electoral Council.

September 16, 1987: Congressman Owens calls for peaceful U.S. intervention in Haiti to ensure freedom of scheduled local and national elections there, by providing technical assistance and expertise to the Electoral Council.

October 14, 1987: Congressman Owens supports U.S. participation in ending the reign of terror and in establishing a democratic society in Haiti. Owens denounces the shooting death of Haitian Presidential candidate Yves Volel as Volel was making a speech about human rights abuses in Haiti in front of police headquarters in Port-au-Prince.

October 20, 1987: Congressman Owens charges the CNG, which was handpicked by Jean-Claude Duvalier before his February 1986 departure, with establishing a reign of terror in Haiti, which threatens scheduled elections. He calls on the United Nations and the Organization of American States to "saturate" Haiti with observers of the civil process leading up to the elections, and says the U.S. should do everything possible to ensure the elections take place as scheduled.

October 21, 1987: Congressman Owens, in a House floor speech, notes that many Haitians are afraid to register to vote in the upcoming elections, and that many candidates are fraid to file applications to run in the elections, because their lives are being threatened. He urges the U.S. State Department, the Reagan Administration, the Organization of American States and the United Nations to act immediately to guarantee fair elections in Haiti.

October 28, 1987: Congressman Owens applauds former President Carter's visit to Haiti to inspect human rights conditions, and says that human rights observers are needed prior to the November elections in Haiti to make sure that voters and candidates aren't being threatened and intimidated.

November 3, 1987: Congressman Owens denounces the destruction of the Electoral Council's Port-au-Prince headquarters by arson, and another arsonist's attack on a business owned by an Electoral Council member. He stresses that peaceful intervention by the U.N., the O.A.S. and the U.S. government would end such violence, and ensure that the elections would take place.

November 5, 1987: Congressman Owens charges Haiti's ruling military junta, the CNG, with being responsible for the systematic organized terror in Haiti. On the morning of November 5, the Electoral Council's printing office which produced elections materials was set on fire, and an electoral office was ransacked.

November 9, 1987: Congressman Owens announces in House floor speech that the offices of two Haitian centrist Presidential candidates were fired upon, and a third Presidential candidate was shot at by unknown assailants. Owens says Haitians are in for more of the same unless the U.S. government intervenes peacefully.

November 17, 1987: Congressman Owens warns about a new threat to human rights in Haiti, "rogue taxicabs," or Tonton Macoute terrorists disguised as cab drivers who pick up unwitting passengers and take them away, never to be heard from again. Owens also cites a letter from Amnesty International, the human rights monitoring group, which says the CNG has not introduced any effective safeguards to protect Haitians from arbitrary arrests, killings, and "disappearances."

December 1, 1987: Congressman Owens denounces the November 29 violence that resulted in the cancellation of Haiti's national elections, and the CNG's illegally dissolving the Electoral Council and naming its own elections panel. Owens calls on the U.S. State Department to pressure the CNG to reinstitute the disbanded Electoral Council, and give the Council the authority to call upon whatever outside forces it needs to assist it in running new elections.

December 2, 1987: Congressman Owens leads Congressional Black Caucus colloquy regarding the situation in Haiti. Owens denounces the CNG for allowing the November 29 violence to take place, and repeats his call for the U.S. government to provide maximum assistance to the Haitian people so that they may have free and fair elections.

December 3, 1987: Congressman Owens arranges Washington, D.C. meeting between 40-member delegation of New York Haitian-American leaders and representatives of the U.S. State Department and the Agency for International Development.

December 3, 1987: Congressman Owens and Haitian-American leaders from New York hold Capitol Hill news conference in which they call for the CNG to resign, for the disbanded Electoral Council to be reformed and to replace the CNG, and for the U.S. to provide maximum assistance to the people of Haiti so that they may have free and fair elections. Owens and the Haitian-American leaders caution that such assistance would not include U.S. military intervention.

December 8, 1987: Congressman Owens calls on U.S. to support general strike in Haiti protesting November 29 violence that resulted in the cancellation of the elections. He says the U.S. must also support all other efforts in opposition to the brutality of the CNG, and to guarantee that any newly called elections will be free and fair.

December 9, 1987: Congressman Owens cites a Time Magazine article which indicates that CNG head General Henri Namphy never intended for the November 29 elections to go forward, and that he had fooled the U.S. Government in that regard. The article said Namphy prepared a decree calling for the dissolution of the Electoral Council five days before the election. Owens called on the U.S. State Department to denounce the CNG and to join the Haitian people in calling for a new government which represents the people and would abide by the Haitian Constitution.

December 15, 1987: Congressman Owens denounces the CNG's hand-picked Electoral Council, which consists of political unknowns who could be easily manipulated by the CNG. Owens cites yet another incidence of violence, a gunfire and Molotov cocktail attack on the home of an independent candidate for Haiti's Senate.

December 18, 1987: Congressman Owens says the U.S. State Department's response to the Haiti crisis is "shameful," and cites newspaper article which says the State Department blames both the CNG and the Electoral Council for the November 29 violence. Owens reads the names of some of the victims of that violence, who were friends or relatives of Haitian-American residents in his 12th Congressional District during a House floor speech.

February 9, 1988: Congressman Owens denounces the fraudulent national election in Haiti, and the presence of the U.S. Ambassador to Haiti at the swearing-in of Haiti's new President Leslie Maingat.

February 17, 1988: Congressman Owens calls attention to the fact that Haiti is a major supplier of cocaine to the southern portion of the United States, and that one of its chief distributors, Colonel Jean-Claude Paul, was facing indictment by a U.S. District Court in Miami for drug trafficking. The Congressman noted that Colonel Paul was also implicated in the November, 1987 massacre of Haitian voters, and called for a continued U.S. cutoff of aid to Haiti due to its drug trade.

September 13, 1988: Congressman Owens decries the massacre of Catholic Mass celebrants in Reverend Jean-Bertrand Aristide's St. Jean Bosco Church in Port-au-Prince by gunmen and others who hacked parishoners to death with machetes. He calls for an immediate end to all U.S. government support for the regime of Lieutenant General Henri Namphy, who ousted the quasi-civilian government of Leslie Manigat in a June, 1988 coup.

January 4, 1989: Congressman Owens notes that $25 million in U.S. aid funds, which had been held up by the Reagan Administration following Namphy's ouster in a September, 1988 coup by General Prosper Avril, had been released. He points out that General Avril would not permit elections for a democratically elected civilian government for 2½ years, and that while he forcibly "retired" many corrupt army officers, many more remain in power. The Congressman asks the U.S. State Department to not accept cosmetic "reforms" and that it should monitor how the aid funds are being spent and whether signficant steps toward democracy and respect for human rights are taking place in Haiti.

A TRIBUTE TO AN EXCHANGE OF A DIFFERENT SORT

HON. CHARLES E. SCHUMER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 1, 1989

Mr. SCHUMER. Mr. Speaker, today I call my colleagues' attention to a cultural exchange of a different sort. Seventh to ninth graders at John Wilson Junior High School in Brooklyn will venture to Emerson Junior High School in Pomona, CA.

This trip is the rewarding culmination of a 2-year correspondence between these two schools, a period in which letters, photographs, reports, and even videos were exchanged. Nine students and their teacher, Roberta Weiss, will spend 10 days at their "buddy school" in California attending classes, living with host families, and recording their trip on video.

It is a long way from Brooklyn to Pomona and it is a tribute to the imagination of John Wilson Junior High School and the concern it has for its students, that it is providing them with the opportunity to spend 10 days in a different environment.

John Wilson Junior High School is a 950-student school in the Canarsie section of Brooklyn. Its student body reflects the community's diverse ethnic and economic makeup. The school offers a full range of educational programs including programs for the physically handicapped and for gifted students. John Wilson Junior High School is a magnet school for telecommunications. The school possesses a studio in which it produces a weekly television show, "Next Stop Canarsie." The video the students of the school will film during their trip to Pomona will subsequently be aired on the school's television show.

I am pleased to have this opportunity to extend a warm Brooklyn greeting to the exchange students from Pomona when they arrive in Brooklyn. Although New York is different from California, I am certain that the sights like Seaview Park and Flatlands Avenue that Brooklyn has to offer will not be lost on these young Californians.

Mr. Speaker, while I appreciate that this exchange is not an extraordinary occurrence, in a time when the rhetoric of education and education initiatives are prevalent, it is reaffirming to see a school taking its own initiative to provide a fruitful educational experience for its students.

NATIONAL FREEDOM OF INFORMATION DAY

HON. FRANK HORTON

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 1, 1989

Mr. HORTON. Mr. Speaker, today I introduced legislation to designate March 16, 1989, as "National Freedom of Information Day". As in years past, March 16 has been chosen because it marks the anniversary of the birthday of James Madison, one of America's very earliest advocates of freedom of information.

The first amendment of the Constitution, which guarantees Americans the freedoms of speech and press, is the backbone upon which our great Nation is based. We need only look at the many countries around the world which do not permit freedom of the press to realize how fortunate we are to have this open exchange of ideas.

March 16 is also significant because it was on this date in 1985 that American journalist Terry Anderson was abducted in Beirut by terrorists. I ask that we take time out during the celebration on March 16 to remember the sacrifices which Mr. Anderson and other journalists have made in the furtherance of providing us with information.

Arthur Hays Sulzberger once stated that "a man's judgment cannot be better than the information on which he has based it." I wholeheartedly agree with this sentiment and, thus, consider it an honor to introduce "National Freedom of Information Day."

I urge all my colleagues in the House to join Representatives SIKORSKI, KLECZKA, and me in cosponsoring this important tribute to James Madison and our Constitution's Bill of Rights.

SUPPORT FREEDOM OF INFORMATION ACT ON NATIONAL FREEDOM OF INFORMATION DAY

HON. GERALD D. KLECZKA

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 1, 1989

Mr. KLECZKA. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join my distinguished colleague and ranking minority member on the House Government Operations Committee, the Honorable FRANK HORTON, as an original cosponsor on this joint resolution to designate March 16, 1989, as National Freedom of Information Day.

Unlike many around the world, we in America are fortunate in possessing a broad array of rights, particularly in the realm of expression. Our Constitution allows Americans to speak and to write without fear of persecution or censure.

Our laws also provide Americans with access to Government information as enshrined in the Freedom of Information Act [FOIA]. FOIA has long been a particular concern of mine because it allows citizens oversight of the functioning of our Federal Government and all its agencies. As Mr. HORTON and I both know from our work on the Government Operations Committee, oversight is essential if we are to ensure honesty and efficiency in our Government.

For these reasons, I am not only cosponsoring National Freedom of Information Day but I also am introducing legislation later this year to strengthen FOIA and make it more accessible to the public. In this way, I hope to fortify our already substantial freedoms in this important area.

All Americans should be aware fo their precious rights of expression in our democracy; National Freedom of Information Day will contribute to this essential goal. Thus, I urge my colleagues to join me in cosponsoring this worthy legislation.

AND NOW MEDICARE, NOTCH BABIES!

HON. BILL ARCHER

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 1, 1989

Mr. ARCHER. Mr. Speaker, I include the following paper by Mr. Robert J. Myers. Robert J. Myers, F.S.A., was chief actuary, Social Security Administration, 1947–70, deputy commissioner of Social Security, 1981–82, and executive director of the National Commission on Social Security Reform. He is professor emeritus, Temple University.

AND NOW MEDICARE NOTCH BABIES!

(By Robert J. Myers)

For some years, the complaints of the Social Security notch babies have been heard throughout the land. This group, consisting of those born during 1917–21, complains that their Social Security benfits are lower than those of persons who were born either before them or after them. To a certain extent they are correct, but only in comparison with persons born before 1917 who worked substantially after age 62.

The notch situation is an unfortunate one and is due to a technical flaw in the law, which was not intentional. Regrettably, it was not corrected when discovered shortly after the legislation containing it was enacted in 1977. The problem is not that the notch babies are getting too little—they are receiving equitable and reasonable benefit amounts. Rather, some persons who were born before 1917 (and who worked well beyond age 62) are receiving windfalls and bonanzas. To increase benefits for the notch babies would merely create new inequities and notches as to those born in other years. To decrease benefits for those born before 1917 who are receiving windfalls would be unfair at this point in time.

The new catastrophic Medicare benefits enacted on July 1, 1988 (the Medicare Catastrophic Coverage Act, P.L. 100-360) has produced a notch situation of significant degree. This notch affects not merely a single group of persons born in a particular period, but rather many persons in all future years. Further, it affects not only living persons, but also the survivors of deceased Medicare beneficiaries!

Here is how the Medicare notch occurs. To finance a large portion of the cost for the new benefits, a so-called Supplemental Premium is levied as a surcharge on the income taxes of Medicare eligibles. This surcharge is 15 percent, with a per capital maximum of $800, in 1989. It increases each year until it is 28 percent, with a maximum of $1,050, in 1993. Those with income-tax liability of less than $150 are exempt, as are also those who are Medicare eligible for less than 7 months in the taxable year.

As a result of the latter exception, for 1989 for example, a person who reaches age 65 on June 30 has an added income-tax liability for the Supplemental Premium of as much as $800. Such maximum is applicable to single persons with about $33,000 of taxable income (which generally includes half of the Social Security benefits received). The Supplemental Premium is due within 3½ months after the close of the taxable year and need not be partially paid in advance for 1989 (but must be for subsequent years).

On the other hand, the person who reaches age 65 on July 1, 1989—one day later—has no Supplemental Premium to pay at all! What a notch! The same situation also occurs for persons who receive Social Security disability benefits and have received them for 24 months, at which time they become Medicare eligible. The one who first becomes eligible in June pays the full Supplemental Premium, while the July eligible pays nothing for that year.

This Medicare notch can be solved quite simply—and in a revenue-neutral manner too (in fact, with a small increase in aggregate revenues). What should be done is to make the Supplemental Premium in the first and last years of eligibility be determined on a pro rata basis. Thus, persons first becoming eligible in the last month of the taxable year (i.e., for age-65 attainments, in December normally) would pay no Supplemental Premium. Those becoming eligible in the next-to-last month of the taxable year would pay 1/12 of the Supplemental Premium amount, etc., until those becoming eligible in the first month of the taxable year would pay 11/12 of such amount. The same procedure, but in reverse, would apply for deaths.

This basis would, obviously, result in some persons paying less than under present law, and others paying more. However, it would be equitable and would have relatively smooth transitional results. And no sharp notches would occur as between essentially similar persons. We can well do without having Medicare notch babies!

A TRIBUTE TO MR. ELTON BOVEY

HON. BARBARA BOXER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 1, 1989

Mrs. BOXER. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in order to acknowledge and pay tribute to an outstanding bay area resident, Mr. Elton Bovey. One of labor's true leaders, Elton has been an important part of the Teamsters Union in California since 1941.

The Teamsters will be honoring Elton, as his retirement became effective as of the first of the year, at a very special retirement dinner on March 31. I would like to take this opportunity to honor him here. During his 48 years of employment in and around the newspaper and magazine industries Elton has been a true proponent of the union and its membership since he joined in March of 1941.

Elton served as president and principal officer for local No. 96 since being elected in February of 1955 until a merger last year with Teamsters Local 296. He continued as an officer and business agent of local No. 296, fulfilling his pledge not to retire until the negotiations between the merging unions were complete.

Elton has also distinguished himself outside the union during his lifetime. He enlisted in the U.S. Air Force in October of 1942 with subsequent duty in the 1389th Air Transport Command based in Presque Isle, ME during World War II. Following his honorable discharge he returned to a career in the newspaper and magazine industry working at the Oakland Post Enquirer, San Francisco Examiner, and Oakland Tribune before becoming an officer of local No. 96 of the Teamsters.

Mr. Speaker, Elton has been a true cornerstone of the Teamsters for many years and I consider it an honor to be able to speak on his behalf. It fills me with great pride to join his colleagues in the Teamsters Union in honoring this appreciated and respected citizen.

RABBI ROBERT FRAZIN HONORED BY TEMPLE SOLEL

HON. LAWRENCE J. SMITH

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 1, 1989

Mr. SMITH of Florida. Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure and pride that I bring to your attention a very special individual: Rabbi Robert Frazin. On March 10, 1989, a dinner to celebrate his 25 years as a rabbi and community leader will be held at Temple Solel in Hollywood, FL. Rabbi Frazin has given a quarter of a century of dedication and inspiration to people of all ages and faiths.

As a founding member of Temple Solel, I have been privileged to watch Rabbi Frazin guide our congregation with his characteristic humor and sensitivity. Through the years, the rabbi ensured that Tempel Solel is not just a group of worshipers with a common religion, but a spiritual family, filled with unique warmth and unity. I am proud that Rabbi Frazin presided over my own children's bar and bat mitzvahs, since this means they were blessed by someone who not only has had a real concern for their development into mature adults, but who also has been a wonderful influence on this process. At Temple Solel, we know we can depend on our rabbi to share our joys and ease our sorrows as we would rely on our closest friends. Several generations of Solel are better off for having the rabbi as a role model and friend.

However, Rabbi Frazin has spread his mitzvot among many people, not solely those at Temple Solel. He has taught others the importance of tenderness and social responsibility in the best possible way—through example. Whether working to aid the homeless or expanding mutual respect and understanding as a leader of the interfaith council, Rabbi Frazin has been devoted to apply the tenets of the faith he loves toward helping people of all religions.

Temple Solel has been fortunate to have as our rabbi a man as caring, intelligent, and charming as Rabbi Frazin. Mr. Speaker, I know that you and all of my colleagues in Congress are with me in honoring a person who epitomizes all the qualities one could wish for in a rabbi, a community leader, and a dear friend.

LEGISLATION TO HELP IMPROVE TEACHING AND LEARNING IN OUR SCHOOLS

HON. CLAUDINE SCHNEIDER

OF RHODE ISLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 1, 1989

Ms. SCHNEIDER. Mr. Speaker, today I am re-introducing legislation to help improve teaching and learning in our schools today. Improving the quality of education in this country is the key to our Nation's future competitiveness. Too many students are graduating from high school only to find themselves unemployed. Each year 700,000 students drop out of school. We are all uncomfortably aware that United States students place behind their Japanese and European counterparts on virtually every standardized test of mathematics, science, and geography. Clearly, our educational system needs to examine innovative approaches to teaching. Reducing class size is one of the most effective ways for schools to provide higher quality education.

My legislation will establish demonstration projects to study the effects of class size reduction on student achievement. Education advocates suggest that reducing class size is one way to improve student achievement. Class size reduction has remained out of the reach of most school districts due to the lack of funds. This bill would provide an incentive for school districts to reduce class sizes by providing matching funds for demonstration projects.

Smaller classes mean more attention for each student and an improved atmosphere for both learning and teaching. For a better educated America, our students need more individualized instruction, and more contact with their teachers. For example, if a high school teacher teaches 5 classes of 24 students a day, he or she is directly responsible for 120 students. That teacher would need an additional 20 hours per week just to spend 10 minutes extra with each student. That presents an insurmountable obstacle for many teachers.

The bill I am introducing today will provide incentive grants of $75 million in the first year to school districts that want to reduce class size. Federal funds would be made available to the school district, where they could be used for adding new teachers and new classroom space. These funds would be matched by State and local funds. The class sizes would be 15 pupils per class in grades K–3; and 18 pupils per class for all other grades. Each teacher would be responsible for no more than 80 students. The results of these demonstration projects will be used to examine the effect of class size reduction on student achievement.

Basic education at elementary and secondary level remains the most important place to focus preventive action and attention. Unless a good foundation is laid during the early years in the education system, a college degree becomes impossible. Today, only 22 percent of jobs require college degrees; in 10 years 33 percent will. We cannot afford to shortchange our children's education in an increasingly competitive world. The work force of tomorrow depends on the education of students today.

LEGISLATION TO PROVIDE THE FOOD AND DRUG ADMINISTRATION WITH RECRUITMENT INCENTIVES

HON. JIM LIGHTFOOT

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 1, 1989

Mr. LIGHTFOOT. Mr. Speaker, the legislation I introduce today is designed to assist the Food and Drug Administration [FDA] in recruiting qualified individuals to work for the agency. It is no secret that the Food and Drug Administration has faced a number of challenges during the last several years. The FDA is under constant pressure to approve drugs, medical devices, food and color additives, and other items as quickly as possible.

In order to approve these drugs, devices and other items, FDA personnel must analyze thousands of pages of documents about the composition of the item, how it is made, whether it is safe, and the results of the clinical trials. Needless to say, this process requires a tremendous amount of time and effort on the part of FDA personnel to ensure that the products they regulate are safe and effective. Throughout the years, FDA employees have diligently strived to make sure that the public health is protected from bad products, and they have done a commendable job.

However, with the increased sophistication of products, such as those developed through biotechnology, and with louder calls by some in the public for quicker release of lifesaving drugs, additional demands are being placed on FDA personnel. To meet these growing demands for quicker approval of complex products, it is essential that FDA retain its current highly qualified work force and recruit new individuals as the need arises. To aid in this task, FDA must have at its disposal certain tools to assist in the retention and recruitment of key personnel.

The legislation I offer today provides FDA with some of these tools to ensure that it is able to keep ahead of the demands currently being placed on the agency. First, the bill establishes a Senior Biomedical Scientific Service Corps within the FDA. Members of this Scientific Service Corps would receive compensation at a rate higher than the present general service schedules. FDA would have the flexibility through pay incentives to encourage its senior scientists to continue to work for the agency, and to encourage new individuals to come aboard. This tool attempts to make the FDA more competitive with the salaries offered to top scientists in the private sector.

The second component of this bill authorizes training grants for educational institutions to develop programs to be used to train individuals in the field of regulatory review medicine. Individuals participating in a regulatory review medicine training program could receive financial assistance. In turn, for each month they receive assistance through the training grant, they must commit to work for the FDA for 2 months.

Another feature of the bill creates the Science Training Loan Repayment Program. The Loan Repayment Program would repay the educational loans of students enrolled in programs leading to a degree in medicine, dentistry, pharmacy, venterinary medicine or another health profession program, or students enrolled in a graduate training program in regulatory review medicine who agree to accept employment with the FDA for a period of obligated service.

Finally, the bill establishes the Food and Drug Administration Distinguished Services Science Award. This annual award would be given to dedicated scientists employed by the FDA who have expeditiously approved lifesaving products or who have discovered other ways to protect society from unforeseen health hazards.

This measure should assist FDA in recruiting qualified individuals to work for the agency, which is essential if FDA is to keep pace with the growing demands placed on the agency. Last year, the Presidential Commission on the Human Immunodeficiency Virus Epidemic recommended that FDA develop recruitment tools, such as training grants and a loan repayment program, to aid in attracting qualified individuals to work for FDA. It is time that Congress focus more attention on this critical issue. I urge my colleagues to review this measure and to join me in enhancing the operations of the FDA. Ultimately, the public will benefit by having safer drugs approved more quickly.

WORKER HEALTH BENEFITS PROTECTION ACT OF 1989

HON. RICHARD T. SCHULZE

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 1, 1989

Mr. SCHULZE. Mr. Speaker, retiree health benefits are becoming extinct due to rising health costs, high retiree to worker ratios and new accounting rulings. Today, I am introducing "Worker Health Benefits Protection Act of 1989" to allow companies to continue providing retirement benefits.

My bill contains two major provisions: First, distressed companies may be eligible for Government-guaranteed loans to provide retiree health benefits. The loan would be repaid by tax benefits realized by the corporation from utilization of net operating loss carryovers and alternative minimum tax payments. The principal of these loans may not exceed the amount by which the present value of the unfunded aggregate liability for defined benefit pension plans and retiree health benefits exceed the shareholder equity of the corporation.

Second, it would allow tax-free pension plan reversions to retiree health trusts without requiring plan termination. Studies indicate that reversions of this sort constitute a significant revenue gain to the Treasury. This provision benefits those companies with overfunded pension plans.

This legislation does not mandate benefits, but does provide an avenue for companies that wish to continue to help their employees in retirement. My bill uses a free market approach to providing benefits for employees.

Estimates for retiree health liability range from $200 billion to $2 trillion. These numbers certainly indicate the magnitude of the problem.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to support this legislation and give employers the opportunity to uphold their commitments to their employees.

A TRIBUTE TO MRS. GEORGE S. MAY

HON. HENRY J. HYDE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 1, 1989

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Speaker, I want to extend my heartfelt congratulations to Mrs. George S. May on the occasion of her 90th birthday, Saturday, March 5.

An energetic and thoughtful woman, Alice A. May and her late husband, George, founded a management consulting business in 1925 that remains a vigorous and prosperous business for her, her two daughters, and the many communities it serves.

Mrs. May has never wavered from her obligation to the community of Park Ridge, IL, where she makes her home. She was instrumental in early and continuous support of the Chick Evans Scholarship Foundation, through which much-needed scholarship money is earmarked for Chicago-area college and university students.

Recently, the company, at her direction, completed an indepth management consulting project which included installation of a computer system in a church-sponsored retirement home. She has also directed the company to provide consulting services for the National Association for Downs Syndrome, Special Olympics, and other numerous charitable, religious, and academic projects.

Mrs. May continues to serve on the board of directors of the George S. May International Co., helping assure that its purpose of providing management consulting assistance to medium- and small-sized businesses continues with the highest possible levels of quality.

Her untiring service is indicative of the energies and caring concern Mrs. May continues to bring to both the company and our Nation. Happy birthday, Alice.

H.R. 129, PROHIBITING COURT ORDERS WHICH LIMIT THE AVAILABILITY OF INFORMATION

HON. CARDISS COLLINS

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 1, 1989

Mrs. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, one of the most questionable, if not unethical, practices in product liability suits today is the use of court orders to bar public disclosure of manufacturer's information concerning product safety.

These orders result where, in a claim involving a defective product, the plaintiff's attorney, for example, needs documents and other evidence to establish a claim. Often, the manufacturer-defendant will seek a court order that requires the plaintiff, at the end of the case, to destroy or return to the manufacturer the evidence, without making it public. Since the plaintiff's attorney has a duty to protect the interests of her client—as opposed to those of the public at large—she acquiesces to this request and agrees to seek the court order. The agreements are "blessed" by the court and then the documents are placed under confidential seal. Thus, access to product information comes at a heavy price.

In a recent book describing litigation of asbestos cases, these bargaining tactics and their consequences that are harmful to the public were graphically illustrated. After a Federal judge literally locked the lawyers in a room for 16 hours a day, 5 days a week, for 3 weeks, the parties agreed to a financial settlement of certain worker claims. In exchange, the plaintiffs' attorneys agreed that whatever evidence they obtained from discovery could not be passed along to subsequent claimants. All papers were then sealed by the court.

One of the plaintiff's lawyers, acknowledging he had made a serious mistake in agreeing to the settlement terms, later said of the court's action:

> As a result, the deposition of Richard Gaze (a company physician) which provided powerful evidence of what the Pittsburgh Corning people really knew about asbestos disease, and when they knew it, remained under wraps for the next five and half years.

Indeed, during that time period, the company denied to hundreds of claimants that it had any knowledge of this hazard until the mid-1960's, a contention that plaintiff's lawyers obviously could not rebut.

This is not an isolated case. A serious design defect in the heating systems of Chevy Corvairs, first discovered in the mid-1960's, was not disclosed until 1971 because of a protective order. In another case, involving the crash of several Pan Am 707's, an attorney said that if certain in-house and FAA reports had not been sealed, "no one would have ever gotten on a Pan Am plane again." Similar orders also were entered into in Dalkon Shield cases. The list could go on and on.

It is time we put a halt to these orders! My bill would bar courts from issuing any order which precluded disclosure to a Government agency of relevant product information such as design specifications, warranties, warnings, and other information related to product safety. Disclosure would be restricted to governmental offices with legislative, regulatory, or law enforcement authority over such products. In addition, these documents would be revealed to other attorneys who represent similarly situated claimants and agree to the terms of an applicable court order that limits the disclosure of such information by the initial parties.

The benefits of this proposal are twofold. First, it will promote greater public safety. If repeated litigation demonstrates that a product has a serious design flaw, or contains inadequate warnings, the appropriate regulatory authorities will be appraised of this information and can act accordingly. Similarly, liberal disclosure to appropriate agencies and individuals would put pressure on a manufacturer to correct dangerous aspects of a product which might not be changed if the manufacturer could easily avoid responsibility for its flaws.

This amendment also will streamline the litigation process. Parties and courts involved in the trial of subsequent cases over the safety of a product will no longer face time consuming and costly discovery procedures. They will not have to recreate the same information or relocate identical documents, starting from stratch. Consequently, attorney's fees will be reduced, and the choice of whether or not to bring a product liability claim to court will not be based on the ability to afford one. The backlog of cases often faced by courts would be reduced and fairer and more consistent verdicts may result since juries would have the same facts before them.

Despite these significant benefits, some will argue that this proposal will result in the wrongful disclosure of certain information: for example, trade secrets. However, first, Federal agencies are already prohibited from revealing such materials. Governmental entities will not be allowed to receive information unless they have protections of trade secrets already in place. Similarly, nothing in my bill will restrict the current authority of courts to bar private parties from publicly disclosing evidence. And any future litigants who receive this information would be bound by the court order which applied to the original litigants.

Others may contend that this will impede the swift resolution of cases. In my view, the interests of the public's safety far outweigh any delay that may occur in the first suit on a particular product. Moreover, any time lost in an initial case would be more than made up during subsequent ones on the same product because the settlement process will be enhanced. The great delay in the discovery process will be eliminated. Parties will know much quicker whether the facts support their claims.

Mr. Speaker, this issue's imminence is reflected by the American Bar Association which recommended in 1986 that courts allow disclosure of relevant product information. This bill offers many positive benefits to the public including enhancement of public safety.

A TRIBUTE TO SHERMAN TELLER

HON. HENRY A. WAXMAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 1, 1989

Mr. WAXMAN. Mr. Speaker, on March 11, 1989, The Myasthenia Gravis Foundation, Inc., will present Sherman Teller with its highest honor, the Founder's Award, at its 25th Annual Humanitarian Award Dinner.

Sherman Teller's dedicated service to the foundation has spanned over two decades. Although his primary cause for years has been Myasthenia Gravis, he has also generously donated his time and support to many other philanthropic and cultural organizations. Sherman, and his wife, Fran, are either founding members or active supporters of many charitable groups including City of Hope, ARDRA, the Clare Foundation, DARE, the National Institute for Jewish Hospice, the Los Angeles County Museum of Art, the Music Center, and the American Youth Symphony Affiliates.

Sherman is a senior vice president and executive committee member of Jack Nadel, Inc., an internationally recognized advertising agency. A self-made man, Sherman joined the company in 1953 as a salesman and worked his way up.

Sherman began his career during the Depression, working 12-hour days, 6 days a week—earning only $8 a week—and attending City College of New York at night. Sherman was later drafted and spent 4½ years in the Army, which included service in the South Pacific.

The Tellers, who met in 1942 on a blind date, moved to Los Angeles in 1950. They have one son, Stephen, an attorney specializing in immigration law.

Sherman Teller's dedicated service to his community is inspiring. I am delighted that he is being presented with the much-deserved Myasthenia Gravis Founder's Award. I gladly bring to the attention of my colleagues Sherman's dedicated service and many admirable accomplishments.

FAIR TAX TREATMENT FOR RURAL ELECTRIC AND TELEPHONE COOPERATIVES

HON. BYRON L. DORGAN

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 1, 1989

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation to provide for the fair tax treatment of rural, electric, and telephone cooperatives.

This bill will affect the tax treatment of patronage dividends by correcting what was an inadvertent oversight by the Ways and Means Committee during consideration of the Tax Reform Act of 1986.

Under the Tax Reform Act of 1986, Congress allowed rural farmers cooperatives to exclude allocations in the nature of patronage dividends when determining the cooperative's net book income for purposes of the minimum tax. Rural telephone and electric cooperatives are defined under a separate section of the Internal Revenue Code, and were inadvertently not included in the special exemption for farmers marketing cooperatives.

To subject a portion of the cooperative's patronage credit allocation to taxation is inconsistent with tax policy. The bylaws of the cooperative deem that the amount allocated as patronage dividends is contributed capital by the patrons of the cooperative. It is contrary to tax policy to subject capital to taxation.

To subject a portion of the telephone or electric cooperative's patronage dividend allocation to taxation would exacerbate the special problems and expenses normally encountered in rural areas. To tax patronage credits would have a negative effect on a coop's equity. If patronage dividend allocations are taxed it will be more difficult to provide universal telephone service and electricity to farmers and rural users in an already fragile farm economy.

This legislation simply carries out the intent of Congress by providing telephone and electric cooperatives the same exemption as farmer marketing cooperatives. I ask you to join me as a cosponsor of this bill to assist our rural cooperatives.

The text of the bill follows:

H.R. 1193

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. TECHNICAL CORRECTION RELATING TO TREATMENT OF RURAL ELECTRIC AND TELEPHONE COOPERATIVES UNDER THE BOOK INCOME PREFERENCE.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Subparagraph (E) of section 56(f)(2) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 (relating to special rule for cooperatives) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "In the case of a corporation operating on a cooperative basis and engaged in the furnishing of electric energy, or providing telephone service, to persons in rural areas, the amount determined under subparagraph (A) shall be reduced by any allocation which is in the nature of a patronage dividend."

(b) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendment made by subsection (a) shall take effect as if included in the amendments made by section 701 of the Tax Reform Act of 1986.

FATHER GERARD ALEXANDER PISANI HONORED IN BAYONNE, NJ

HON. FRANK J. GUARINI

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 1, 1989

Mr. GUARINI. Mr. Speaker, Gerard, Jr. was born to Gerard Alexander Pisani, Sr. and Dorothy Louise Klaus in Pompton Lakes, NJ on May 17, 1938. Gerard is the oldest of two children. His sister's name is Ruth Ann.

The Klaus family was a small family of German descent whose ancestry was already in the United States for several generations.

The Pisani family is a large Italian family. Gerard's grandfather, Louis Pisani and his grandmother, Adeline Calzaretta, were both born in Italy. They both came to the United States when they were in their teens—ages 17 and 15 respectively. Louis was also the oldest son in his family and with Adeline became the father of 10 children, of whom Gerard, Sr. was the oldest son.

Until the age of 5, Gerard lived with his parents in Haskell, NJ, across the street from his paternal grandparents. The family then moved to Butler, NJ, where he attended public school through graduation from high school. During school he was on the honor roll and was vice president and president of his junior high classes. In high school Gerard was active in many extra-curricular activities, including the radio club, debating team, and student council. He was especially involved in the music life of the school and was the school accompanist during his junior and senior years, graduating in 1950.

From the age of 7, Gerard played piano and organ in the Midvale Gospel Church where most of his family were members. At the age of 13 he became the organist for the Riverdale Bible Church. He also would accompany his mother who was often engaged as soloist. During most of his high school years he traveled weekly to New York to play for the Protestant Council of Churches program called "Noon Day Chapel" on the Dumont Television Network.

Gerard began his college years at Wheaton College in Wheaton, IL. He then transferred to Taylor University in Upland, IN. He finished his college and theological training at Nyack Missionary College in Nyack, NY. It was during these years that Gerard also traveled extensively with Jack Wyrtzen and the Word of Life Fellowship which had regular nationwide weekly television and radio broadcasts, summer camps in the Adirondack Mountains of New York State and winter camps in San Paulo, Brazil. Gerard not only played the piano and organ for the broadcasts and large rallies, but was active in the production of these programs and the running of the camp ministries. It was toward the end of this period of Gerard's life that, on December 9, 1962, he was ordained to the ministry in the Baptist Church.

It was about this time that Pastor Pisani began a mission work in the Milton/Oak Ridge area of New Jersey called the Milton Bible Church. As the church grew it began to hold services in the Cozy Lake School, changing its name to the Community Church of Jefferson Township. Property was purchased, 11 acres on Milton Road, for the building of a new church and parsonage. Before the church was built, Pastor Pisani announced to his board and congregation that he was applying to become a postulant to the priesthood of the Episcopal Church. Much to his surprise, this raised questions and generated quite a bit of discussion. In less than a year most of the families of the Community Church had decided to join the Episcopal Church. When over 90 families were confirmed and received into membership of the Episcopal Church of the Newark Diocese, the name of the church was changed to Saint Gabriel's.

During this process Pastor Pisani entered the General Theological Seminary in New York City to complete further studies and requirements to become a priest in the Episcopal Church. He was ordained to the deaconate on June 11, 1966 and was ordained to the priesthood on October 15, 1966. He was then appointed the first Vicar of St. Gabriel's Church.

Father Pisani served this new congregation until he went to become the Rector of Christ Church in Pompton Lakes, NJ in 1969. It was from here that he came to Trinity Parish in Bergen Point in November 1974.

Trinity Parish was destroyed by fire in 1972. The congregation was very small and the diocese was reluctant to rebuild the church. When Father Pisani came to Bayonne and saw the enthusiasm of the people and the possibility for future ministry, he led the congregation in their goal to rebuild the church and parish hall. The new church was consecrated in the fall of 1975. While the church's membership is small in comparison to some, it is proud of the outreach ministries it has been able to establish on behalf of the city of Bayonne.

Presently the congregation continues to give space, free of charge, to groups like A.A., Al-Anon, Dignity, and Recovery. It has also taken on the responsibility to sponsor several significant programs, including 'The Windmill' Highways, Musical Arts at Trinity, Scout Troup No. 3, and Sea Explorers Ship No. 3. These programs have grown substantially over the last few years and will be expanded in the near future to provide for housing for its adult handicapped participants of 'The Windmill' and others in need.

In addition to being the pastor of Trinity Parish, Father Pisani is also the chaplain for the Bayonne Fire Department. Over the almost 15 years of his assignment to Bayonne he has served on the Board of Bayonne Mental Health and participated in many other community groups. Presently he serves on the Bio-ethics Committee of the Bayonne Hospital, as a member of the Bayonne Kiwanis Club, as a member of the Cable Franchise Review Committee for the city of Bayonne, and as secretary/treasurer of the Bayonne Interfaith Clergy Association.

Father Pisani is also active in the Diocese of Newark as a member of the Bishop's Council of Advice and a member of the board of Christ Hospital Health Services Corp. by appointment of Bishop Spong.

Father Pisani will be honored by the Sons of Italy at the annual Italian Heritage Award Dinner-Dance at Maddelena's Villa-Nova on March 4, 1989.

A TRIBUTE TO MARILYN AND JEROME SIEGEL

HON. STEPHEN J. SOLARZ

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 1, 1989

Mr. SOLARZ. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to Marilyn and Jerome Siegel, a couple exemplifying the best of what Brooklyn stands for.

Thirty years ago Marilyn and Jerry were confronted with a very special challenge. Clifford, their first child, was born with cerebral palsy. Marilyn and Jerry reacted with characteristic resolve. Instead of turning inward and sidestepping the difficulties Clifford's condition presented to them, the Siegel's chose to open themselves up and embrace the challenge.

Over the last 30 years, Marilyn and Jerome have been strident advocates of the handicapped. Marilyn, who returned to college while her children were in school, eventually received an M.A. from Brooklyn College and now teaches special education at the Hebrew Academy for Special Children. Marilyn Siegel's commitment and single-mindedness has also landed her a seat on the Board of Trustees of the Brooklyn School for Special Children.

Clifford Siegel lives at the Hunter Avenue residence of the Brooklyn School for Special Children and attends the training impaired in useful service [TRIUS] program held on Stillwell Avenue, not too far from my Shorefront district office. Characteristically, Marilyn and Jerome have taken an active interest in their son's ongoing development, as members of the residence committee at Clifford's school.

At a time when increasing interest is being paid to the special needs and concerns of the handicapped, it is important to herald the unique accomplishments of those who have long labored to make life easier for disabled people. Marilyn and Jerome have contributed much to our community; and all of us owe them our admiration, respect, and love.

Marilyn and Jerry Siegel also deserve our congratulations. Their younger son Larry and his beautiful wife Lisa are expecting the birth their first child very soon. I stand here to wish them the greatest health and happiness in the future.

DOMESTIC VOLUNTEER SERVICE ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1989

HON. MAJOR R. OWENS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 1, 1989

Mr. OWENS of New York. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing the Domestic Volunteer Service Act Amendments of 1989, a bill to extend, for 3 years, title I of the Domestic Volunteer Service Act of 1973.

Title I provides for the national antipoverty programs under DVSA including, Volunteers-In-Service-To-America [VISTA], service-learning programs, and special volunteer programs. All of these programs represent an important source of needed services to the disadvantaged and disenfranchised communities across the country.

VISTA is the Federal Government's only full-time domestic volunteer service program. Since its inception in the Economic Opportunities Act of 1964, more than 100,000 Americans of all ages, occupations, ethnic backgrounds, and economic levels have served as VISTA volunteers to those who have been systematically shut out of mainstream America. VISTA volunteers serve on a 1-year, full-time basis, receiving a modest subsistence allowance while in service and they are expected to live in the same communities as the people they serve. Their achievements have been extraordinary. VISTA volunteers work in projects that address and reflect the problems of the community they serve—including hunger, homelessness, unemployment, youth delinquency, and illiteracy. They work with native Americans, migrant farmworkers, Americans with disabilities, immigrants, the very young and the very old. Each volunteer costs the Federal Government about $8,000 per year; however, each VISTA project mobilizes approximately $54,600 in new funds and services that otherwise would not have been available. VISTA volunteers and programs are an empowering factor in helping communities develop the skills and leadership capacity needed to become self-sufficient.

On February 23, 1989, I convened a hearing to commemorate VISTA's achievements over the last quarter century. At that time, we had the pleasure of hearing from a diverse group of outstanding men and women who have been involved with VISTA as volunteers and administrators at various times since 1964. From these witnesses, the subcommittee learned about VISTA and volunteer service over the last 25 years and how they can best be put to use today and in the future.

The reauthorization process will give us the opportunity to more fully explore the reasons for the lack of recognition given to VISTA and the other title I programs at a time when there is such tremendous interest in national service. Because resources are scarce, we in the Federal Government do not have the time nor the money to waste reinventing the wheel.

Current authorization for the Domestic Volunteer Service Act expires September 30, 1989. I am introducing this legislation to authorize title I of this act at such sums as may be necessary for fiscal years 1990, 1991, and 1992. This will give the members of my subcommittee adequate time to determine what changes need to be made to the enabling legislation. When the oversight process is completed, any changes will be incorporated into a longer reauthorization package for committee and floor action later this year.

H.R. —

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. EXTENSION OF AUTHORITY FOR NATIONAL VOLUNTEER ANTIPOVERTY PROGRAMS.

Section 501 of the Domestic Volunteer Service Act (42 U.S.C. 5081) is amended—

(1) in subsection (a)—

(A) in paragraph (1)—

(i) by striking "and"; and

(ii) by inserting before the period the following: ", and such sums as may be necessary for each of the fiscal years 1990, 1991, and 1992";

(B) in paragraph (2)—

(i) by striking "1988, and" and inserting "1988,"; and

(ii) by inserting before the period the following: ", and such sums as may be necessary for each of the fiscal years 1990, 1991, and 1992"; and

(C) in paragraph (3), by inserting before the period the following: ", and such sums as may be necessary for each of the fiscal years 1990, 1991, and 1992";

(2) in subsection (b), by inserting before the period the following: ", and such sums as may be necessary for each of the fiscal years 1990, 1991, and 1992"; and

(3) in subsection (c)—

(A) by inserting before the period at the end of the first sentence the following: ", and such sums as may be necessary for each of the fiscal years 1990, 1991, and 1992"; and

(B) in the third sentence—

(i) by striking "1989, and" and inserting "1989,"; and

(ii) by inserting before the period at the end the following: ", and such sums as may be necessary for the fiscal year 1992".

TRIBUTE TO GEORGE MANTELLO, ONE OF THE UNSUNG HEROES OF THE HOLOCAUST AND WORLD WAR II

HON. CHARLES E. SCHUMER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 1, 1989

Mr. SCHUMER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to call my colleagues' attention to the deeds and valor of one of the great unsung heroes of the Holocaust and World War II on the occasion of his visit to the United States. Mr. George Mantello is perhaps one of the most outstanding examples we have of a single individual standing up and mobilizing the world against the atrocities of Nazi Germany and its death camps.

George Mantello, a Jew who served as El Salvador's Secretary General in Switzerland from 1942 to 1945, saved nearly 30,000 Jews from almost certain death in the Holocaust, and perhaps hundreds of thousands more by the means of two extraordinary feats of rescue.

At a time when the Nazis and their Hungarian collaborators were deporting up to 10,000 Jews a day to Auschwitz, threatening to completely exterminate the Hungarian Jewish population of Budapest, Mantello took action which led directly to a halt in these deportations. Almost singlehandedly, he initiated a press campaign in Switzerland that finally awakened the Western World to the horrors of the Nazi concentration camps, and forced an end to the deportations in Hungary.

At the heart of this remarkable event lies Mantello's disclosure to the press of the Auschwitz protocol. These protocols were a 30-page document that described the ongoing atrocities in the concentration camps, and was based on the testimony of two young escapees from Auschwitz, Josef Lanik and Rudolph Vrba.

With the help of four leading Protestant theologians who supported Mantello's campaign, the Auschwitz protocol was reported in over 400 articles, published in 120 Swiss newspapers, which condemned the mass murders at Auschwitz. The response to the report was quick and stunning. It finally evoked an international outcry from such leaders as President Roosevelt, the Pope, Britain's Anthony Eden, the King of Sweden, the International Red Cross, and the Swiss Government. They demanded that Admiral Horthy, the Regent of Hungary, put an end to the deportations of the remaining Jews in Budapest. Despite the ever increasing pressure from Eichmann to complete the "final solution," on July 18, 1944, Horthy halted the deportations, and the nearly 200,000 Jews still living in Budapest were saved from the gas chambers.

George Mantello's second rescue effort, though not as dramatic, was responsible for saving an equally impressive number of people during the war. He produced and distributed 15,000 Salvadoran citizenship papers to Jews and non-Jews throughout Nazi occupied Europe. These served as "protective papers" for their holders, and over 95 percent of these families survived the Holocaust. While many Latin American consuls made fortunes selling their country's passports, Mantello provided these papers gratis, out of purely humanitarian motives. All this was fully supported by the Government of El Salvador.

In addition to his resuce work, Mantello was extremely helpful to both the American and British intelligence services, while never taking a penny for his services. Using his diplomatic pouch, Mantello slipped millions of dollars of Swiss technical instruments that were necessary for the war effort out of Axis-surrounded Switzerland and into Allied hands.

Mr. Speaker, it is with unspeakable admiration that I bring to my colleagues' attention the remarkable, and until now relatively unrecognized, achievements of Mr. George Mantello. Surely this great humanitarian hero, now 87 years old, deserves our deepest gratitude and the highest praise this body can bestow upon him.

EFFICIENCY STANDARDS FOR PLUMBING PRODUCTS

HON. CHESTER G. ATKINS

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 1, 1989

Mr. ATKINS. Mr. Speaker, water officials in my home State of Massachusetts recently announced a water emergency for the Metropolitan Boston area. The Quabbin Reservoir, which is the largest reservoir in the Northeast, and which provides Boston and 45 other communities with water, is falling at a rate of 70 million gallons a day. It is now at 68 percent of its capacity, and officials are warning that only prompt enactment of water conservation measures will spare the region from a serious water shortage.

This is in Massachusetts, a State bordered by an ocean and containing a multitude of rivers, lakes, and streams. In other regions of the country, the situation is even worse. California, for instance, is forecasting a third consecutive year of drought and severe water restrictions, while in the drought-stricken Midwest, farmers are praying for heavy spring rains after a dry winter.

Unfortunately, we cannot blame our water shortage problems solely on Mother Nature. We are also suffering from the rapid influx of people into our cities. About 70 percent of the population lived in urban areas in 1960, but that figure is expected to grow to 85 percent by 2000. In many of these areas, water use already approaches or exceeds the water supply system's dependable yield, leading the Congressional Budget Office to estimate that of the Nation's 756 large urban water systems, 170 will need an additional water supply in the next decade.

Mr. Speaker, we have the ability to attack our water shortage problems in a relatively simple and painless way: by improving the efficiency of plumbing products and residential water-use items. Unbelievably enough, residential water use for the average person in this country comes to over 18,000 gallons of water per year. The amount that is used unnecessarily is staggering, especially in light of the fact that new technology to improve the performance of water-using products is commercially available. It's time to recognize the severity of our water shortage problems and ensure that water-efficient products are used.

Today I am reintroducing the "National Plumbing Products Efficiency Act," which would accomplish that goal by setting national efficiency standards for residential items that use water. Congress passed similar legislation for energy appliances in the 100th Congress, and I have modeled my legislation after that law. I am pleased to announce that WYCHE FOWLER will again be joining me by reintroducing identical legislation in the Senate.

I first became interested in this initiative last spring, when Massachusetts became the first State to set water-saving standards for toilets. Since that time, the idea has taken off. The States of Washington and Rhode Island have begun the process of initiating similar standards, and recently the Delaware River Basin Commission, which controls water policy for parts of four States—New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Delaware—announced new efficiency standards for toilets, faucets, showerheads, and urinals. Furthermore, the environmental community included a call for plumbing product efficiency standards in its "environmental blueprint" for President Bush.

It is easy to see why this idea has received so much attention. In Massachusetts, it's estimated that a switch to more efficient toilets would save up to 25,000 gallons of water per year in the average household. In Maryland, studies indicate that a similar toilet standard could reduce or hold residential water demand at present levels for up to 30 years, despite rapid population growth. And, the Delaware River Basin Commission says its low-consumption toilet requirement would result in estimated savings of 42 million gallons of water per day by the year 2020.

All of the above savings are only for toilets. My legislation would also require water-saving standards for faucets, showerheads, clothes washers, dishwashers, and any other plumbing products which use significant amounts of water and for which standards can realistically be set. Use of products that meet those standards could cut indoor water use in half, and they could also cut home energy use by reducing the use of hot water. Low-flow requirements have financial benefits, as well. Massachusetts estimates that installation of low-flow toilets could chop $80 off the average family's annual water bill, while the Delaware River Basin Commission estimates its new toilet requirements could save $250 million in costs that would be needed for new water supplies and wastewater treatment facilities by the year 2020. Water conservation achieved through this strategy would also reduce the operating costs of existing facilities, and would spare us from the immeasurable environmental costs of diverting existing water supplies and constructing new plants.

I also believe that my legislation would reap considerable benefits for the plumbing and appliance industries. For one thing, the development of national standards would promote an orderly national market to replace a market in which hundreds of different States and localities could soon have hundreds of different efficiency requirements. Second, national standards enforced by the Federal Government would take the place of unenforceable consensus standards and put foreign and domestic manufacturers on an even playing field. Finally, enactment of efficiency standards would boost demand for new plumbing fixtures and appliances. The average toilet, for instance, is replaced every 15 to 20 years. However, if consumers recognize that water conservation is necessary, and that water-saving products can keep down rapidly rising water bills, the demand for replacements will escalate.

When I first introduced the "National Plumbing Products Efficiency Act" last October, I invited the plumbing and appliance industries, State water commissions, and environmental organizations to comment on my proposals. Since that time, I have learned a lot about water conservation and the plumbing industry, and I have incorporated a number of the suggestions I received into the new version of the bill. I look forward to a continuing dialogue with industry, States, and environmental groups in an effort to enact the most effective and fair plumbing products efficiency bill possible.

In the 1970's, this country responded to an energy crisis by enacting widespread energy conservation measures. We cannot wait for further evidence of an impending water crisis before doing the same in regard to water conservation. The potential savings from enacting water-saving efficiency standards for plumbing products are huge, and so are the fiscal and environmental savings from not having to create new reservoirs or construct new wastewater treatment plants. I urge my colleagues to join me in cosponsoring this legislation, which I hope will make water conservation the "wave" of the future.

SDI REASSESSMENT

HON. LEE H. HAMILTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 1, 1989

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert my Washington Report for Wednesday, March 1, 1989, into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

SDI REASSESSMENT

In the early weeks of the Bush presidency, one of Ronald Reagan's most controversial programs is quietly approaching an important turning point. As President Bush begins to define his defense and foreign policy priorities, important choices will have to be made about the future of the Strategic Defense Initiative (SDI)—the program to provide for defenses against enemy missile attack. These choices will have significant implications for the federal budget, the security of the nation, and the future of arms control.

Since President Reagan proposed SDI in March of 1983, there has been constant debate about its objectives. Should SDI be a research program exploring scientific principles and basic technologies which may have military applications in the 21st century? Should it be a program to build massive defensive systems to fully protect the American people from missile attack? Or should we develop more modest defenses with less all-embracing objectives? President Reagan's goals for SDI were always clear. He wanted nationwide defenses that would render nuclear weapons "impotent and obsolete." But that objective may no longer be central in SDI planning. President Bush's nominee for Secretary of Defense, John Tower, recently testified that any expectation of providing umbrella population defenses was "unrealistic." Most defense experts agree with Tower's assessment.

With nationwide defenses ruled out, there are now two widely talked about SDI alternatives. One is a modest defensive deployment called an Accidental Launch Protection System (ALPS) which would defend large parts of the country against a few missiles that might be fired by mistake or by a small country with limited capabilities. The other is the socalled Phase I of SDI. This first phase would involve the use of existing technologies to destroy some of the warheads aimed at the United States during a nuclear war. Any decision to deploy limited missile defenses can only be made after we have answered three basic questions:

HOW WELL WILL IT WORK?

Judging the utility of any missile defense proposal is difficult unless we know how the Soviet Union will respond ot it. If we build defenses, they could build more offensive systems and overwhelm our defensive capabilities. Both sides would then have increased military spending without achieving any measurable gain in security. A Phase I SDI, as currently envisioned, could probably be countered by the Soviet Union unless both sides agreed to limit their offensive weapons; and the Soviets are unlikely to accept new arms control limitations at a time when we are deploying missile defenses.

Modest defensive systems would offer some protection against accidental launches and against attacks from smaller nations that may someday acquire both nuclear weapons and long-range missiles. The chances of an accidental missile attack are hard to estimate, but they have certainly decreased in recent years as both the United States and the Soviet Union have worked to reduce the danger of technical failures in missile control. Limited defenses would not protect us against all kinds of small-scale or terrorist nuclear attacks, such as a nuclear weapon smuggled across our borders. Small defensive systems would give us some added protection, but at a significant price.

HOW MUCH WILL IT COST?

Funding for SDI has risen steadily in the last few years. The final Reagan budget request for 1990 includes $5.9 billion for missile defenses, a 50% increase over this year's expenditures. From 1985 through 1989, SDI has consumed nearly $15 billion. This level of spending is modest compared to the costs we would incur in a full-scale Phase I program. Last October the Defense Department estimated that the testing, development and deployment of Phase I would cost $69 billion. ALPS would probably cost less but no official estimates have been made. A commitment to either of these alternatives would affect spending on other defense priorities. In an era of budget constraints, SDI must compete for limited Pentagon funds.

WHAT EFFECT WILL IT HAVE ON ARMS CONTROL AND THE ABM TREATY?

Any decision to deploy missile defenses would have an impact on past and future arms control agreements with the Soviet Union. By most accounts, it will be impossible to build the first phase of SDI without violating the Anti-Ballistic Missile (ABM) Treaty of 1972, one of the most important international agreements in the postwar era. A decision to build missile defenses would also threaten the successful negotiation of a Strategic Arms Reduction Treaty (START) to reduce superpower nuclear warheads by 50%. Because ALPS would involve fewer interceptors and no space-based weapons, it might be possible to construct without violating our ABM treaty commitments, but there are serious verification problems in building any limited defense system without making it appear to be a precursor to a prohibited nationwide system.

The purpose of partial missile defenses is to increase the security of the United States by adding defensive capabilities to our existing offensive weapons. Increasing our security in the nuclear age is an important objective, but there are many ways to achieve it. For example, mobile missiles, which are now under consideration, would improve the ability of our land-based forces to survive a nuclear attack. Alternatively, signing a carefully negotiated START agreement could reduce the threat of nuclear war and the need for missile defenses. Taking one of these steps, or both of them, might be cheaper and safer than a decision to proceed with Phase I deployments.

SDI is at a crossroads. Since it was introduced in 1983, the idea of building missile defenses has received serious national debate. There is now wide agreement that we need a basic research program to explore the prospects for future missile defense systems. We have done this research for many years, and so have the Soviets. The harder questions for SDI are whether we should go beyond research and begin building actual defensive systems with limited capabilities. As SDI approaches its sixth anniversary, difficult decisions must be made about the immediate future of missile defenses. The Bush Administration, the Congress, and the American public will have to make those decisions with great care.

IN INDIA FEMINISTS OPPOSE ABORTION

HON. JOHN J. LaFALCE

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 1, 1989

Mr. LaFALCE. Mr. Speaker, I was very troubled by a recent column in Newsweek by Jo McGowan, an American writer living in India. She reports that in Bombay feminists have now succeeded in having amniocentesis severely limited. This action has been taken because 7,999 out of 8,000 recent abortions in Bombay were found to have been of females, who are considered less desirable than males in much of India. Given our cultural values, this may seem shocking to us. But how much more shocking must it be to other cultures when, in this very wealthy Nation, we abort millions of babies, often for purely financial reasons or other reasons of convenience. The Newsweek column reads as follows:

IN INDIA, THEY ABORT FEMALES

(By Jo McGowan)

Beware what you set your heart upon, for it surely shall be yours. Feminists would be wise to heed this old-fashioned warning. By insisting upon the right of every woman to have an abortion, they have opened a Pandora's box of which they are only now realizing the depths.

I say this as an American resident of India where an updated version of female infanticide is being practiced. Amniocentesis, a medical procedure used to detect certain fetal abnormalities, almost always reveals the sex of the unborn child—a side benefit doctors in India now put to use in a culture that prizes sons. Or, as one doctor was quoted in the Indian Express last year: "Yes, I do sex-determination tests. It's better for an unwanted girl not to be born than to suffer later." The birth of a boy is cause for great rejoicing, but given modern technology that of a daughter can lead to a request for an abortion.

In India, being female is an economic handicap. A girl means trouble. She must be married off at great expense (the custom of dowry was outlawed in 1961 but is still prevalent), only to be lost to her family. Anything she earns belongs to her in-laws. Her parents, who may incur a lifetime of debt to pay for her wedding, can expect to see her only once or twice a year and then in strained, formal visits. The more daughters they have, the worse off they become. It's no wonder then that the idea of sex determination, with abortion as an option if the sex turns out to be "wrong," is so popular here that sex-selection clinics have become a big business.

But as amniocentesis has become widely available in the subcontinent, it has also become more and more controversial. Feminists decry its inherent sexism—their vigorous fight against its use for sex selection won them a victory recently when the western Indian state of Maharashtra (of which Bombay is the capital) outlawed the procedure for any but strictly defined medical reasons.

To undergo amniocentesis in Maharashtra now, a woman must be at least 35 years old or must have a medical history that suggests the possibility of a genetic disease. The new law, applauded by women's groups, is seen as a promise of things to come. In my opinion, however, the victory it represents will remain an isolated one simply because the feminist position on this issue is illogical and inconsistent.

What is the feminist position? Very simply put—it is wrong to abort babies just because they are girls. In making their arguments, women in India use highly emotional terms like "feticide" and marshal grim statistics (out of 8,000 cases of abortion in Bombay, 7,999 involved a female fetus, according to one study) to support their case.

All very sad and very compelling but for one large fact: feminists (in India and all over the world, for the feminist community is at one on this issue) are speaking out of both sides of their mouths. When the issue is sex determination and the "selective" abortion of girls, they call it female feticide. But when the issue is reproductive freedom and the abortion of male and female fetuses, they call it a "woman's right to choose." It won't work. They can't have it both ways. Either they accept abortion or they don't.

For years now, feminists have made the abortion issue a top priority and have worked tirelessly to create a climate in which the destruction of unborn children is acceptable. They have done their work well: millions of fetuses are aborted all over the world and very few people give it a second thought.

SPECIAL INTEREST

The basic principle of the abortion-on-demand movement is that the decision to abort should rest entirely with the woman. No special-interest group or individual (be it the church, the state, her parents or her husband or lover—should have any say in the matter. Free choice means just that—the woman chooses.

Yet some mothers, indeed many mothers in India and other countries and cultures where males are highly prized, have very legitimate reasons in believing that giving birth to a girl is unacceptable. What gives anyone the right to tell them they are wrong? Certainly no traditional feminists should dare, any more than she would tell the mother of a hemophiliac that she should carry her pregnancy to term.

"Selective" is the term used to describe the specific targeting of girls for abortion, as if the word somehow proves the essential evil of the act. But which abortion is not selective? The handicapped fetus of the mother who only wants a perfect baby, the third child of a mother who only wants two, the unplanned baby of a mother who wants total control of her life—all of these can be "selectively" aborted. What changes in each case is only the mother's view of what is acceptable and what is not.

From where I sit, feminists have no moral standing from which to speak out against the selective abortion of girls. In insisting that they do, they have become just another special-interest group, like the church or the state, trying to prevent women from exercising their right to choose. Once it is permitted to kill some fetuses for some reasons, I don't see why it isn't permitted to kill all for any reason.

As a woman who is opposed to abortion, I would almost have welcomed this turn of events, were it not so tragic and wrong. But perhaps now the real nature of abortion will be revealed in all its horror. (Perhaps from the undeniable truth that it is wrong to kill a baby simply because she is a girl will emerge the larger truth that it is wrong to kill a baby at all.)

IN PRAISE OF THE SELECT COMMITTEE ON AGING

HON. CLAUDINE SCHNEIDER

OF RHODE ISLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 1, 1989

Ms. SCHNEIDER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take the occasion of the reauthorization of the Select Committee on Aging to express my profound sense of pride in the accomplishments of this committee. A day hardly passes without my citing a report, study, or hearing by this committee which has articulated a significant trend or fact of importance to older Americans. In its 14-year history, the Select Committee on Aging has addressed such critical issues as poverty among older women, the high cost of health care, age discrimination, and low cost elderly housing. It is this committee which addresses the Older Americans Act, the major piece of legislation affecting the elderly. It is this committee which has raised awareness about such devastating health problems as Alzheimer's disease and osteoporosis. It is this committee which has taken on the banking industry to make it more amenable to the needs of senior citizens. It is this committee which takes an active oversight role of the Social Security Administration, and the most important programs this Government runs—Social Security and Medicare. Obviously, I could go on and on because the list of the Aging Committee's accomplishments is long and distinguished.

Under the leadership of my esteemed colleague CLAUDE PEPPER, the Health and Long-Term Care Subcommittee, on which I serve, has been a major force addressing all aspects of long-term care. Our subcommittee is responsible for undertaking a comprehensive continuous review of health care facilities, research and development, relevant legislation, and the administration of health care programs. Congressman PEPPER's advocacy does not start and stop with older Americans. His long-term home health care bill calls for long term care coverage for children as well as seniors. This makes the bill totally intergenerational, and he has attracted overwhelming public support for it.

Mr. Speaker, the Select Committee on Aging provides much needed advocacy for older Americans. In this capacity, it acts as a coherent vehicle for promoting legislation and action to improve the quality of life for America's elderly. I view service on the Select Committee on Aging as a high priority. Rhode Island has the second highest proportion of older adults of any State in the Nation; I am fortunate to have the benefit of their wisdom and experience as I consider legislation of importance to Americans. I am proud to join my colleagues in reauthorizing this critical and successful committee.

NATIONAL FARM SAFETY DAY FOR KIDS

HON. JIM LIGHTFOOT

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 1, 1989

Mr. LIGHTFOOT. Mr. Speaker, today I have introduced a House joint resolution which would designate September 20, 1989, as "National Farm Safety Day for Kids."

We often think of farms as ideal places to raise children. There's plenty of space, responsibilities, and the positive interaction with nature. While these characteristics hold true, farm accidents involving children are taking a devastating toll on many farm families.

In few other occupations do youngsters have access to the sophisticated machinery and equipment as they do in modern farming operations; 7 days a week, 365 days a year, today's farmers and their children are involved in many activities that utilize this machinery.

Currently, accidents are the leading cause of death of children under the age of 16 who live on farms. There are a considerable number of children under the age of 5 who are exposed to extremely hazardous work sites on farms. Farm tractors, flowing grain, and other farm machinery account for over 80 percent of the fatalities of children who are involved in farm-related accidents.

The best way to prevent these farm accidents is through increased public awareness. Knowledge of the dangers that exist to children when surrounded by farm machinery and grain handling needs to be heightened. Farm safety education programs directed at children should be developed and implemented by Federal, State, and local officials with assistance from both public and private organizations.

I ask my colleagues to join me in sponsoring the "National Farm Safety Day for Kids" and call attention to the dangers that are present to our farm children.

SAFETY NET

HON. DONALD M. PAYNE

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 1, 1989

Mr. PAYNE of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I would like to share with my colleagues here in the House of Representatives an editorial which recently appeared in the largest newspaper in New Jersey, the Newark Star-Ledger. I am pleased that media attention is being focused on the important work that our friend and colleague, JIM FLORIO, is doing to alleviate the problems that have resulted from deinstitutionalization. Congressman FLORIO has been a leading advocate for a segment of our society that is too often neglected, those with mental and physical impairments.

Mr. Speaker, as a cosponsor of the bill to expand Medicaid benefits to persons living in group homes and supervised facilities, I share Congressman FLORIO's belief that every American must be given the chance to develop his or her full potential. I urge my colleagues to take a moment to read the following editorial and to join in this important legislative effort.

[From the Newark Star-Ledger]

SAFETY NET

As a concept, deinstitutionalization makes sense. Who can argue convincingly against a policy which holds that a person who is no threat to himself or society should be kept shut up inside some government-run hospital?

Regrettably, there is a serious discrepancy between concept and practice. Deinstitutionalization has been less than perfect because government has failed to follow through and provide the support programs needed to assist in the adjustment of the mentally retarded and other handicapped persons to the challenges of community life.

In recognition of this deficiency, Rep. James Florio (D-1st dist.) has introduced legislation which would come to the aid of persons suffering from mental retardation and related conditions, such as epilepsy and cerebral palsy.

What the Florio bill would do is change federal rules so that persons living in group homes, supervised facilities and other non-institutional settings could receive Medicaid benefits and improved quality of care. "People who are retarded or have related conditions should have the same rights as everyone else," Mr. Florio explained. "They should be allowed to reach their full potential as human beings. To me, this is not so much health legislation as an affirmation of the rights of people."

The existing rules are unnecessarily restrictive—harshly punitive, in fact—and prevent persons with disabilities from returning to the community and assuming more productive, fulfilling lives. Cosponsoring the legislation with Mr. Florio are Rep. Henry Waxman, chairman of the House subcommittee on health and environment, and Rep. John Dingell, who heads the House Energy and Commerce Committee.

Advocates of the mentally retarded and persons with related conditions are speaking out in support of the proposed change in Medicaid rules. The legislation would give a new lease on life to persons who would continue to suffer needlessly under the presently senseless system.

Clearly, the Florio bill is a humanitarian measure which should be quickly passed and signed into law by President Bush.

THE RAILROAD DRUG ABUSE PREVENTION ACT OF 1989

HON. THOMAS A. LUKEN

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 1, 1989

Mr. THOMAS A. LUKEN. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a bill that goes straight to the very heart of rail safety. This legislation would require the most stringent and most far-reaching drug and alcohol testing program for rail employees ever to be introduced in Congress. It is the same bill which passed the House last year but which died at the desk in the Senate.

A major feature of this bill is that it will require the random testing of all rail employees in safety-sensitive positions. That means we're going to test train crews, yard crews, dispatchers, and anybody else whose job involved the safe movement of trains. And that's not just blue collar workers, but management, too.

Why random testing? Because random testing will let drug users know that someone will be looking over their shoulders. They need to know that at any time they can be tested and yanked from the locomotive cab or the control tower. They simply won't be able to hide anymore.

Our bill doesn't just stop at random testing, however. It will also for the first time require by law a full scale program of post-accident drug and alcohol testing; reasonable cause testing; preemployment testing; and testing as part of annual physicals.

The need for this legislation is very clear. A shocking number of rail accidents in recent years have involved rail employees who use drugs or alcohol. The most well-known and devastating of those accidents occurred in Chase, MD, 2 years ago, when 16 people died after a Conrail locomotive recklessly ran through four red signals into the path of a crowded Amtrak passenger train. The Conrail engineer later confessed to having smoked marijuana only minutes before the crash.

Unfortunately, the Chase crash was not an isolated incident. It could easily have been repeated in April of last year in New York when one Metro North commuter train smashed into another which was standing still. The trains were empty, so no passengers were injured. But of the 10 rail employees tested for drugs after the accident, 5 tested positive—for everything from marijuana to morphine.

Despite these and other accidents, remedies have been slow in coming. In the last Congress, the House passed our bill, but the Senate refused to take it up. Instead, the Senate inserted in own omnibus drug bill a blanket provision requiring drug testing of airline, trucking, and rail employees, but limited it to just random testing. For reasons that are unclear, in conference the Senate was not willing to agree to our much more stringent bill.

Last year, the Department of Transportation issued rules for random drug testing of rail employees. While I wrote to then-Secretary of Transportation Burnley to applaud his initiative, I am concerned that the DOT regulations inexplicably fail to require testing for alcohol in addition to drugs. Furthermore, DOT's rules make no provision to ensure the accuracy of drug testing laboratories through a system of proficiency testing, nor do they provide for the treatment and rehabilitation of employees who test positive.

The bill I am introducing today, with the ranking minority member on our subcommittee, BOB WHITTAKER, of Kansas, would not only establish a comprehensive system of drug and alcohol testing, but addresses these other issues as well.

I must confess that the strong measures we have put in this bill are not ones that I embraced easily. I have long been, and continue to be concerned that any drug and alcohol testing program for rail employees be administered fairly and accurately. In fact, 2 years ago, at our hearing in which we exposed the falsification of drug testing results at DOT's CAMI Lab, I said:

Everyone agrees that drug and alcohol testing should be done. We simply cannot tolerate our railroads, our trucks, our cars, and our planes being operated in a blurry haze of drug and drink. At the same time, however, no one wants to see careers shattered and innocent lives ruined by the indelible mark of a positive drug test that was, in fact, mistaken or falsified.

I still hold that opinion. For that reason the bill I am introducing today not only requires the full range of drug and alcohol testing, including random testing, but goes on to specify a procedure for the certification and proficiency testing of drug testing laboratories. It requires the establishment of DOT approved rehabilitation programs for employees who test positive. And it opposes civil and criminal penalties: On those who alter test samples or falsify test results; on those who flee the scene of an accident to avoid being tested; and on railroads who fail to carry out the required testing.

In sum, with this bill we are sending a clear message: we are not going to tolerate drug use in the rail industry. We are not going to stand by while innocent people are killed month after month and year after year.

But we are going to do our best to stamp out the threat to public safety posed by drug users.

THE 71ST ANNIVERSARY OF ESTONIA'S DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE

HON. ROBERT K. DORNAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 1, 1989

Mr. DORNAN of California. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to commemorate the 71st anniversary of Estonia's Declaration of Independence. I would like to submit to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the following factual update on the current situation in Estonia provided to me by the Estonian American National Council.

ESTONIA: POLITICAL AWARENESS AND NATIONAL REAWAKENING, 1988–89

1988 was a dramatic year of demonstrations, rallies, song fests and unprecedented political activity in Soviet-occupied Estonia, all of it aimed, ultimately, at the eventual restoration of Estonian independence. The world media have been filled with images of "the mouse that roared," as a country of one million seemed to challenge an empire of 300 million.

In a true grassroots movement, Estonia demands for reform, democracy and outright independence came directly from the long-suppressed Estonian people—fully one-third of the population attended a rally September 17, while 900,000 signed a petition opposing proposed Soviet Constitutional changes as undemocratic and harmful to Estonian interests. National and local-level groups and organizations, representative of a variety of approachs but united in their final objective, continue to form.

Estonians were brought to this level of activity by a growing awareness that their very survival as a people is threatened by the continued Soviet occupation and colonization of their homeland. Kept keenly aware—by the presence of 150,000 Soviet troops—that they live in an nation under occupation, Estonians yearn once again to be masters in their own home, to control their own economy and natural resources, to decide their own internal affairs, their own destiny. At its founding ceremonies August 20, 1988, the Estonian National Independence Party declared:

"We do not have enough clean air, water or earth to sustain life, let alone freedom—Add to that the danger of becoming a minority in our own ancient land."

As a possible indicator of things to come, the Soviet press has been villifying Estonia for months, to the point that the Estonian Popular Front has sued Tass for slander. However, while well aware of the ever-present potential for a Soviet crack-down or of a violent backlash led by the Russian chauvinist organization "International Front," Estonians still push peacefully for further reforms and democratization. Counting on continued moral and real support from the free world, Estonians are proceeding with careful, measured steps to move away from Moscow's control and toward true sovereignty.

The goals of free Estonians and of the international Estonian resistance movement remain:

1. That the Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact along with its secret protocols be declared null and void from the moment of its inception.

2. That Estonian-Soviet relations be governed by the 1920 Peace Treaty of Tartu, in which the USSR promised to respect Estonian sovereignty "forever".

3. That all Soviet troops, militia and paramilitary forces be withdrawn from Estonian soil.

4. That the existing Soviet colonial administration and bureaucracy in Estonia be dismantled.

5. That reparations be paid to the Estonian people an to all individuals and families who have suffered directly or indirectly as a result of Soviet-German collusion, invasions and occupations of Estonia since 1939.

6. That democratic elections be conducted, initially under international supervision.

7. That, as a former member of the League of Nations, Estonia be admitted to United Nations membership and reinstated into all other international organizations, conferences and institutions to which Estonia belonged.

In Moscow on November 17, 1988, the Estonian National Independence Party presented to members of the U.S. CSCE (Helsinki) Commission a "Memorandum Concerning the Situation in Estonia". This document concludes:

"The time is ripe to begin to discuss the restoration of Estonian independence in much more conrete terms. It is our desire, that the developments in the Baltic states be taken into the orbit of the key issues concerning the United States Congress and Government and that there be a deeper and sincere understanding and appreciation of the efforts of Estonians, Latvians and Lithuanians as they strive to restore their national independence.

"A practical step would be the placement of impartial UN observers into the Baltic states to ensure a peaceful transition to democracy.

"An international conference should be organized within the framework of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe to discuss the problems and aspirations of the Baltic states (with representatives of Estonian, Latvian and Lithuanian independence movements invited to attend).

"We propose that discussions be initiated concerning a problem of key importance, namely the removal of Soviet occupation forces from Baltic territory. These discussions should be an integral part of all arms reduction talks in Europe and a logical extension of talks in connection with the evacuation of Soviet forces from Afghanistan. A multi-lateral international agreement on the evacuation of Soviet forces from Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania must be based on the condition that independence be restored to those states. The resulting neutral Baltic states, independent of any power-bloc, could play a valuable and positive role in the collective security of Europe."

INVISIBLE JUDICIARY

HON. AUSTIN J. MURPHY
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 1, 1989

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate this opportunity to rise in support of legislation which I have introduced today to create a central corps of administrative law judges.

In today's complex world of bureaucracy and red tape, the role of administrative law judge has taken on new significance. Often referred to as the "invisible judiciary," the work of the administrative law judge is important and necessary. It becomes much easier to understand the size of the Federal administrative judiciary when one realizes there are twice as many administrative law judges as there are district court judges handling all Federal and criminal cases.

The scope of the authority of the Federal administrative judiciary is much broader than most people realize. Administrative law judges deal with cases involving everything from licensure of radio and television broadcasting to corporate merger and antitrust; from regulation of trading and securities, commodities, and futures to adjudication of claims relating to social security and other benefits.

With a system this important, it is imperative we work to ensure it operates most effectively and efficiently. That is why I am sponsoring this legislation. In 1989, our Federal administrative judiciary needs to be examined. This system is too often slowed down by immense backlogs, plagued with an uneven distribution of work, and suspicions that judicial impartiality may be compromised.

The problems of uneven distribution of work first came to my attention in 1985 after my office investigated a constituent's black lung benefits appeal. I was shocked to learn this case was being delayed because it was one of 21,000 cases that had yet to be addressed by one of the 23 ALJ's then working on black lung at the Department of Labor.

Upon further investigation of this intolerable situation, I discovered glaring differences in the amount of work done by ALJ's at various agencies. In this same year, 1985, the ALJ's at the Securities and Exchange Commission issued only 11 decisions. This legislation would prevent such backlogs and inequity from ever occurring again, by equitably distributing cases between all ALJ's.

The corps proposal also evokes the question of judicial expertise. This argument is predicated on the belief that unification of all administrative law judges into a corps will not make maximum use of each judge's expertise. Opponents contend that administrative law judges should continue to preside over the same types of cases which they have always heard. This argument is based more on fear than on reason. Even with the consolidation of all federal administrative appeals offices into a corps, judges will continue to be assigned to a division that is responsible for the same or similar area of law from which their expertise has grown. Judges would be grouped in the following divisions:

One. Division of Communications, Public Utility and Transportation Regulations;

Two. Division of Safety and Environmental Regulation;

Three. Division of Labor;

Four. Division of Labor Relations;

Five. Division of Health and Benefits Programs;

Six. Division of Securities, Commodities, and Trade Regulation; and Seven. Division of General Programs and Grants.

Most judges will still be specialists in various fields of law, and their expertise will not be lost. Unification will provide judges with the opportunity to hear a wider range of cases. This move would combat the occasional boredom some judges encounter by providing them with a greater amount of intellectual stimulation.

This new agency would operate under the direction of the chief administrative law judge, who would be appointed by the President. Each of these divisions would be headed by a division chief. This system would provide the flexibility required to ensure uniform workloads among judges.

In this time of budget constraints, this bill would also provide substantial cost savings for the Government. Preliminary estimates from the Congressional Budget Office are that potential savings could be as high as $20 million annually. In Washington, DC alone, consolidation of 29 separate docketing offices would produce immense savings. Pooling of administrative staff, receptionists, docketing clerks, and libraries would allow reduction of the support staff and could yield an estimated additional $10 to $15 million annually. Consolidation of physical facilities and resources would also result in more efficient and economical operation of the administrative hearing process. Many law libraries and hearing rooms which are maintained for various agencies throughout the District of Columbia would no longer be required. Finally, efficiency would also be achieved by the unification or reconciliation of the nearly 280 different procedural and evidentiary rules currently used in departmental and agency adjudications.

Another problem that would be addressed by this legislation is the great inconvenience and cost when administrative law judges travel great distances to hear cases. Many administrative law judges are faced with the need to travel as much as 1 week each month in order to conduct hearings in locations remote from Washington, DC or district offices. This present arrangement is very costly. Estimates from the Departments of Labor and Agriculture indicates a range from $5,000 to $10,000 per year in travel related expenses per judge. This arrangement can be difficult to manage for judges who must travel constantly, and it is often cumbersome for the parties. Long-distance adjudication arrangements generate expensive phone bills. Mail delays are often encountered when filing documents, slowing down an already creeping system. Securing hearing rooms is often troublesome, and many hearings are conducted in hotel rooms.

Restructuring the system through enactment of my proposal would ameliorate many of these problems. The bill would provide for more administrative law judges being dispersed throughout the country. This arrangement would eliminate or significantly decrease the amount of necessary travel. Also, judges could hear more cases that arise in their vicinity not only because more judges would be located in outlying areas, but also because judges would be able to hear many cases in their vicinity requiring a hearing under the Administrative Procedure Act. The establishment of permanent hearing rooms throughout the country would also greatly ease the scheduling difficulties many administrative law judges now face.

This bill would also serve to dismiss one of the oldest problems facing the Federal administrative judiciary, the question of judicial impartiality. A direct result of the present structure of the administrative hearing system is a public concern that ALJ's, because they are agency employees, are not impartial. The comments of one pro se litigant defending himself against U.S. Department of Labor's charges of violating the Davis-Bacon Act aptly summed up public suspicion of the Federal administrative judiciary. The defendent complained, "How can I expect to win this case when the Department of Labor is my accuser, prosecutor and judge?"

This lingering suspicion will continue to impede the work of the Federal administrative judiciary as long as the current system exists. Whether or not agenices do influence the decisions of their administrative law judges remains a debate without an answer. The Administrative Procedures Act is certainly designed to protect the autonomy of the administrative law judge. However, as an agency employee, administrative law judges are vulnerable to a variety of subtle and not so subtle pressures from their employing agency. An agency's control over promotional opportunities, office space, and support staff is a source of very real power and control over administrative law judges. Even though most agencies refrain from exerting pressure to influence their judge's decisions, the fact that such pressure may be applied compromise the integrity of the entire system.

Consolidation into an administrative law judge corps would end suspicion. An independent agency under the executive branch would be responsible for all administrative appeal hearings and proceedings. Administrative law judges would be removed from the employ of the various agencies for which they had previously worked, allaying all suspicions concerning their impartiality.

Implicit in the Administrative Procedures Act is a guarantee of due process for claimants and defendants. As long as extensive delays, inequitable distributions of work, and suspicions of a lack of judicial impartiality continue of plaque the system, we are failing to enforce this guarantee.

I am confident this legislation will accomplish the efficiency and savings we as Members of Congress owe to our constituents. When so many people are effected by the decisions of the Federal administrative judiciary, why not provide them with the best system possible? At less cost to our taxpayers, this bill provides all Americans with a system they can rely on for expeditious, efficient and unbiased administrative justice.

RESOLUTION OF DISAPPROVAL OF THE RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE DEFENSE SECRETARY'S COMMISSION ON BASE REALIGNMENT AND CLOSURE

HON. GEORGE E. BROWN, JR.

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 1, 1989

Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Speaker, I rise to express my opposition to the recommendations of the Commission on Base Realignment and Closure and to announce my introduction today of the resolution of disapproval that would block the implementation of the base closings recommended by the Commission. During the 2 months since the release of the Commission's report it has become disturbingly clear that the Commission did not accomplish its mandate. Together with other members whose districts would be affected by the base closings, my staff and I have spent countless hours reviewing the Commission's recommendations as well as the merits surrounding many of the individual bases recommended for closure. For this reason, I am introducing the resolution of disapproval and I urge my colleagues to take a close look at the results of the Commission's work. I hope my colleagues will support the resolution if they conclude, as I have, that the Commission has failed to produce a base closure list the implementation of which would produce significant cost savings and improve our Nation's defense.

Earlier today I rose on the floor of the House to announce my introduction of the resolution of disapproval and explain some of the general reservations I have concerning the Commission's recommendations. At that time I questioned whether closing these bases would truly result in the cost savings which the Commission has predicted, and I made reference to the many serious questions my colleagues have raised concerning the Commission's analysis in regard to specific bases recommended for closure. Combined, the questions raised by my colleagues and I challenge the credibility and veracity of the Commission's work. I would like, at this point, to take issue with the specific justifications given by the Commission for its recommendation that Norton Air Force Base [AFB] be closed.

Before reviewing the Commission's recommendations for Norton AFB, I must first protest some general aspects of the Commission's work. Like many Members, I have been dissatisfied with the Commission's intransigence in releasing the information necessary for a complete understanding of how its conclusions were reached. The little information that has been given to my office does not represent, in my estimation, the fullest possible disclosure of the process and criteria by which Norton AFB was recommended for closure. Confronted by this unacceptable situation several Members, including myself, have been forced to resort to the Freedom of Information Act or a resolution of inquiry to obtain the information necessary to adequately review the Commission's work. At the request of myself and other Members the General Accounting Office is conducting an analysis of the Commission's work. I am sure this will be an objective and thorough review, but I hope it will be completed before Congress must vote on the resolution of disapproval.

I must also protest the intransigence of the Navy in regard to Commission's work. In an additional view added to the Commission's report by Thomas F. Eagleton, we have been told that the Navy "stonewalled" and "refused to play." My understanding was that no service would be given or receive special treatment in the base closing process. According to Mr. Eagleton, however, the Navy "got away with it." This is a disturbing revelation, patricularly when two Air Force bases are being closed in San Bernardino County in my district.

Finally, I must protest the fact that foreign bases were not reviewed by the Commission. If the American people are going to be asked to tighten their belts, then we should begin by reducing unneeded expenditures overseas. This is particulary appropriate at a time when our major allies have the economic and political strength to bear a higher share of their defense burden. Clearly, there exist obsolete overseas bases which the Commission could have recommended for closure.

Next, I would like to take issue with several of the reasons the Commission gave for the closing of Norton Air Force Base [AFB]. The Commission recommends Norton AFB for closure due to air traffic congestion, inadequate facilities, and excess capacity within that category of bases. The Commission specifically cites the poor quality of the facilities, increasing competition for skilled personnel, and a shortage or weapons storage facilities, family housing, medical, dental and recreational facilities.

Several of these points are contradicted by the limited documentation which was provided to my office by the Commission. For example, the Commission states that flight operations at Norton AFB have been constrained due to air traffic congestion in the Los Angeles area. In its phase II analysis, however, the Commission states that another Military Airlift Command unit is expected to assume control of the routes formerly occupied by Norton AFB units. It is stated quite bluntly that "airspace is therefore expected to remain unchanged." This comes as no surprise when one considers that most of Norton's flying units are recommended for transfer to March AFB, located only 15 miles south of Norton, and presumably subject to the same airspace constraints that have existed at Norton AFB. It should also be noted that prior to the release of the Commission's recommendations, the Air Force and the Federal Aviation Administration had approved a joint use proposal that would have increased air traffic at Norton AFB. These factors lead me to question the validity of the Commission's assertions concerning air traffic congestion at Norton AFB.

I must also question whether moving Norton's units 15 miles south to March AFB will markedly improve the Air Force's ability to attract qualified civilian personnel. One would assume that the competition for skilled personnel will be the same at March as it has been at Norton AFB.

Regarding the alleged shortage in weapons storage facilities, the Commission's documents show a deficiency of only 3 percent in explosive storage and 4 percent in warehousing. This hardly seems like a deficiency warranting elimination of the entire base.

It is not clear to me that significant cost savings would result from the closure of Norton AFB. The Commission's documentation does not provide a clear and comprehensive accounting in this regard. While the Commission states that $322 million will be saved over 20 years by the closure of Norton AFB, the Air Force has already estimated a cost of $316 million to accommodate Norton's units at other bases. I hope that in calculating the total savings from the closure of Norton AFB the Commission has taken these outlays into account. I also hope the Commission has recognized the value of the many new facilities, such as a new commissary and control tower, that have been built at Norton AFB.

As a member of the California congressional delegation I cannot help but note that California will lose more than 80 percent of the jobs lost nationwide resulting from the implementation of the base closure recommendations. The situation is even worse for San Bernardino County, home for both Norton and George Air Force Bases. While the Commission was not required to "spread the pain," so to speak, it seems wholly inappropriate to deliver such a massive impact to a single geographic region, regardless of where it is located.

Finally, and most importantly, I must take issue with the Commission's assertion that the closure of Norton AFB would have "minimal impact on local employment." Ironically, the documentation provided to my office shows clearly that the Commission's analysis is fatally flawed in this regard. In determining the effect on local employment which would result from the closure of Norton and George, the Commission considers only the civilian and military personnel directly employed on base. Thus, the Commission calculates that the loss of the 6,653 on-base jobs at Norton AFB would have only a 0.9 percent impact on the local employment base of 774,614. This is not an accurate reflection of the base's impact on the local economy. In its fiscal year 1988 economic resource impact statement, Norton AFB cites a total on-base work force of 10,741 plus 18,614 secondary jobs created due to the base's presence. Thus, when the 29,355 jobs dependent on the base are factored out of the local employment base we see a negative impact of 3.8 percent.

This is not the end of the story. Congress must accept or reject the Commission's recommendations in their entirety. Therefore, we must consider the net impact of all the base closings together. This is a particularly relevant consideration for San Bernardino County which will lose two bases if the Commission's recommendations are implemented. However, in addition to grossly underestimating the base's impact on local employment, the Commission's report also makes the mistake of considering each base closure in isolation. The Air Force uses a 50-mile radius to calculate its economic impact zones. The Commission evidently used the same 50-mile radius to reach the figure of 774,614 for total employment in both the Norton and George economic impact zones. It is reasonable, therefore, to jointly consider the closures of Norton and George when determining the impact of these closures on local employment. By conducting calculations this way we see an adverse impact on local employment of 39,168 jobs, amounting to a 5.1-percent increase in local unemployment. One can hardly classify this as a "minimal impact."

These are the primary concerns I have regarding to the Commission's recommendation that Norton AFB be closed. These concerns lead me to introduce the resolution of disapproval today. There are simply too many unanswered questions concerning the Commission's work to allow the implementation of its recommendations without an open debate of the full House of Representatives.

I am introducing the resolution of disapproval for the additional reason that I represent the people of the 36th Congressional District in California. My constituents are reasonable people who are willing to make sacrifices in our Nation's interests. They are not willing, however, to bear an inequitable burden in this regard. They are unwilling to see their area singled out in efforts to reduce our Federal budget deficit. San Bernardino County is being asked to forfeit two major military bases and suffer a potential increase in unemployment of more than 5 percent. My constituents have been virtually unanimous in demanding that I oppose this inequitable slam against our area; every city council in the area has passed resolutions opposing the Commission's recommendations, and my office has been deluged by constituent mail carrying the same message.

Some will accuse me of placing parochial political considerations ahead of our Nation's broader interests. There comes a point, however, when I must take a stand against the wholesale sacrifice of my district's interests in favor of broader considerations. I would be derelict in my duty as a representative of the people if I remained silent in the face of this outcry from my constituents.

I hope Congress will take a hard and serious look at the Commission's work. I harbor no illusions that the resolution of disapproval will garner broad support from the Congress. As a final request, therefore, I would ask that, if and when the base closures are implemented, the local communities are provided with the fullest possible assistance in minimizing the adverse economic impact. While I know there is life after base closings, I also know that this will be a long and difficult process for the communities in my district and across the Nation.

It is incumbent upon the Federal Government, therefore, to help ameliorate this impact on the communities that have, after all, been host for these bases for many years. The Office of Economic Adjustment must be provided with a budget sufficient to assist communities in converting bases to civilian uses. Environmental contamination on the bases must be cleaned up completely and rapidly, and in a manner which does not hinder the ability of local communities to convert the bases to job-producing civilian uses. This will be an extremely costly and complex process and I hope that the resources necessary to do the job right will be made available. Finally, I would urge my colleagues to consider the plight of the military retirees who live near the bases recommended for closure. Many of these retirees have settled near the bases to have access to commissaries, base exchanges, and clinics and hospitals. Closing these facilities will have a serious impact on their lives. Where feasible, such facilities should be retained. This is a particularly relevant consideration at Norton AFB where a brandnew, $4 million commissary was opened only 2 years ago.

There has been much talk laterly of working for a "kinder, gentler nation." I hope this concept will be applied to the issue of base closures. The military has been a part of many communities for decades. Indeed, communities have often grown up around military bases. If budgetary and efficiency considerations dictate that certain bases be closed, then let it be done in a manner which does not ignore the human impact.

SGT. JAMES B. STANLEY

HON. HARRY A. JOHNSTON II

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 1, 1989

Mr. JOHNSTON of Florida. Mr. Speaker, today I ask for your support of a private bill I am introducing for relief of Sgt. James B. Stanley. While I am aware that the vast majority of private bills do not gain passage, I sincerely believe this case warrants congressional action.

Sergeant Stanley was one of the military men unknowingly involved in LSD experiments during the 1950's. He had volunteered to test gas masks for the Army and was instead slipped LSD repeatedly in his drinking water without his consent. He began to hallucinate, lost his career in the Army, was at intervals violent toward family members, and his marriage eventually failed. It was not until 1975 that the Army finally informed him of his exposure to LSD, and that the origin of his mental illness and bizarre behavior became evident to him.

Sergeant Stanley's case has been heard by the Supreme Court, and although the Court decided against him by a 5-to-4 vote, all the judges agreed that the facts of the case proved that Stanley suffered irreparable injury. The Court cited the Feres Doctrine as the basis for their unfavorable ruling, which grants the U.S. Government immunity from liability in the civil courts for servicemen "where injury arises out of or are in the course of activity incident to service."

Congress has become Sergeant Stanley's court of last resort. As you are probably aware, precedent exists for an award of this kind. Public Law 96-77 provided for the relief of James R. Thornwell, who was similarly a victim of the Army's LSD experiments. In 1976, Congress also granted relief for the family of Frank R. Olson, a civilian biochemist, who was given LSD without his consent by the Army and subsequently jumped to his death while under the influence.

Supreme Court Justice Brennan, in his dissenting opinion, concluded that "soldiers ought not be asked to defend a Constitution indifferent to their essential human dignity." No action on the part of the military could more deeply offend our national conscience than the involuntary human experimentation reflected in the Stanley case. I ask my colleagues to help redress in some small way this extreme miscarriage of justice.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert a copy of the bill in the RECORD.

MARS IS NICE TO VISIT, BUT TAKE A LOOK AT EARTH

HON. BILL GREEN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 1, 1989

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, the study of global environmental change has become one of the more pressing issues Congress will address in this session. As the ranking minority member of the Veterans, HUD, Independent Agencies Subcommittee of the House Appropriations Committee, which funds NASA, I believe space-based environmental research is a key to preventing further global environmental disintegration. An increase in scarce Federal funds devoted to this type of research would ensure the acquisition of data vital to the preservation of our planet's ecological balance. William C. Potter, in an article for the Los Angeles Times, describes the importance of redirecting our efforts from a United States/Soviet mission to Mars to a cooperative plan regarding a space-based environmental investigation.

The article, which appeared in the January 29 edition of the Los Angeles Times, follows:

MARS IS NICE TO VISIT, BUT TAKE A LOOK AT EARTH

(By William C. Potter)

Now that the U.S. space shuttle has returned to service, there is increased excitement and talk aobut the new direction of the American space program.

Some would have us chart a course toward Mars in a manned mission with the Soviet Union. Others envision a manned space station as the logical progression in our exploration of space and its use for commercial purposes such as materials processing. Still other space enthusiasts identify moon-based research and exploration as the most feasible next phase of a rejuvenated American space effort.

While a good case can be made for each of these ambitious initiatives, there are compelling reasons to reserve at least a portion of the space agency's budget for exploration of planet Earth.

A long-term program of Earth observation from space is necessary in order to obtain otherwise inaccessible data on global environmental changes that threaten the future habitability of the planet. These changes include, but are not limited to, the depletion of stratospheric ozone, the greenhouse effect, ocean pollution deforestation and desertification.

An international program of space cooperation will be required to obtain the data necessary to develop models for predicting these changes and to devise strategies for coping with them. The coordination of U.S. and Soviet activities in the space-based study of global changes in the environment should constitute a major component of that international program.

The legal basis for coordination has already been created with the April, 1987, U.S.-Soviet agreement concerning cooperation in the exploration and use of outer space for peaceful purposes and the May, 1988, annex to that accord. Senior officials from 17 national space agencies have also endorsed the concept of "Mission to Planet Earth." What is now needed in the United States is the political will and financial support to implement a cooperative program of space-based monitoring of global environmental changes.

A major rationale for the proposed U.S.-Soviet mission to Mars is the effect that it might have as an international confidence-building measure. An international program of space cooperation for the purpose of monitoring global environmental trends on Earth could have much the same effect and for a fraction of the cost. The beneficiaries of the cooperation, moreover, would not be limited to the superpowers; the environmental threats to Earth do not discriminate between developed and developing regions.

This symmetry in impact—something rarely present in world politics—makes the study of environmental problems an ideal subject for international cooperation. It also has the merit of demonstrating to nations often critical of the superpowers that they, too, may derive tangible benefits from advances in space science.

The proposed mission to planet Earth provides the Bush Administration with an opportunity simultaneously to showcase the rejuvenated American space program and to enhance international cooperation. Now is the time to creatively make use of space-based observations of environmental changes and, literally, to turn our attention from space to Earth.

WELCOME TO THE SAN MATEO WEEKLY

HON. TOM LANTOS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 1, 1989

Mr. LANTOS. Mr. Speaker, in an era when newspapers seem to get fewer each year I am delighted to welcome a new newspaper—the San Mateo Weekly. Under the able and intelligent leadership of Jerry Fuchs, a new weekly newspaper will begin serving the residents of the city of San Mateo, CA. The first issue of the San Mateo Weekly appears today.

Our Nation is built upon the foundation of an informed citizenry, and newspapers have long been the chief means of keeping our people informed about the critical public issues of the day. Even in this age of electronic media and satellite communications, the printed word is still a key element in preserving our democracy.

Mr. Speaker, our precious first amendment rights of freedom of speech and freedom of the press are essential to our democratic way of life. It is most appropriate that we can welcome the San Mateo Weekly—a sign of the vitality of our free press—at the same time as we witness an unprecedented terrorist assault on those fundamental freedoms of speech and free press from zealots who seek to silence our right to speak freely.

Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the San Mateo Weekly and its publisher Jerry Fuchs on this important occasion.

MORATORIUM ON RELOCATION OF NAVAJO AND HOPI INDIANS

HON. JIM BATES

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 1, 1989

Mr. BATES. Mr. Speaker, today, I am introducing legislation that I believe will help a longstanding land dispute in Arizona between the Navajo and Hopi Indian Tribes that originated more than a century ago. My good friend and colleague, Senator ALAN CRANSTON, is today introducing identical legislation in the Senate.

Mr. Speaker, Public Law 93-531, as amended by Public Law 96-305, was supposed to provide the legislative solution to a land dispute in Arizona between the Navajo and Hopi Indian Tribes. The Navajo and Hopi Indian Relocation Commission established pursuant to this legislation issued a plan for relocation of individuals of each tribe residing on lands partitioned to the other pursuant to a court order resulting from the 1974 statute. This relocation was to be completed by July 6, 1986, a deadline which was not possible to meet.

Dissatisfaction with implementation of the legislation has been expressed by the Navajo, who comprise the great majority of the relocatees, as well as Members of this body. Moreover, the Hopi tribal government has rejected any attempts by the Navajo to negotiate changes in the provisions of relocation mandated by current law.

For the past two sessions of Congress, my distinguished colleague from the other body has introduced legislation that I believe will lead to the successful resolution of the issue. Today, I am introducing the same legislation.

Mr. Speaker, this legislation would place an 18-month moratorium on relocation and establish a commission to study relocation problems, hold hearings in the area, and submit a report outlining solutions to relocation problems and alternatives to relocation.

The Commission would consist of 17 members, including 6 Navajo and 6 Hopi members, with each tribe having three representatives appointed by its tribal council and three appointed by its "traditionalist" leaders.

Mr. Speaker, unless Congress acts on this issue, and a comprehensive plan is developed and put in place, the fundamental tribal disputes that exist today may persist for still another century.

The following is the printed text of the legislation:

H.R. —

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. (a) Notwithstanding any provision of law other than subsection (b)—

(1) no Navajo Indian or Hopi Indian shall be required to relocate pursuant to the provisions of Public Law 93-531, or pursuant to any judgment or order of any Federal court, during the 18-month period beginning on the date of enactment of this Act,

(2) no Federal funds may be expended during such period with respect to—

(A) the lands held in trust for the Hopi Tribe under section 10(b) of Public Law 93-531 (25 U.S.C. 640d-9(b)), or

(B) the lands held in trust for the Navajo Tribe, or to be acquired for the Navajo Tribe, under section 11 of Public Law 93-531 (25 U.S.C. 640d-10), and

(3) no construction, except such construction as may be necessary for individuals already located on such land, may be carried out during such period on the lands described in paragraph (2).

(b)(1) Nothing in this Act shall alter, affect, or delay an payment which is required to be made to any individual under the provisions of Public Law 93-531.

(2) The Navajo and Hopi Indian Relocation Commission and the Secretary of the Interior shall take such actions as may be necessary to ensure that no Indian is subjected to any undue hardship by reason of the provisions of subsection (a).

SEC. 2. (a) There is hereby established the Navajo and Hopi Relocation Advisory Commission (hereafter in this Act referred to as the 'Commission').

(b)(1) The membership of the Commission shall consist of—

(A) 2 individuals appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, after consultation with the minority leader of the House of Representatives,

(B) 2 individuals appointed by the President pro tempore of the Senate,

(C) an individual appointed by the American Bar Association who has a background in mediation or arbitration and in human rights or constitutional law,

(D) 3 Hopi Indians who represent the Hopi Traditional Sovereign Villages and are appointed to the Commission by traditionally recognized spiritual leaders or spokesmen of the Hopi Traditional Sovereign Villages,

(E) 3 Hopi Indians appointed by the Hopi Tribal Council,

(F) 3 Navajo Indians who represent Navajo traditional people and are appointed to the Commission by the Navajo communities located on lands held in trust for the Hopi Tribe under section 10(b) of Public Law 93-531 (25 U.S.C. 640d-9(b)) that are subject to relocation, and

(G) 3 Navajo Indians appointed by the Navajo Tribal Council.

(2)(A) At least one of the individuals appointed under subparagraphs (A) and (B) of paragraph (1) shall be an anthropologist or sociologist who has studied relocation.

(B) The individuals appointed under subparagraphs (A) and (B) of paragraph (1) should be representative of different educational, economic, racial, ethnic, and age groups and shall include men and women.

(3) Any vacancy on the Commission shall not affect its powers, but shall be filled in the same manner in which the original appointment was made.

(4) The individuals appointed under paragraph (1)(C) shall act as Chairman of the Commission.

(5) A majority of the members of the Commission shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business.

(6) Each member of the Commission shall be entitled to one vote which shall be equal to the vote of every other member of the Commission.

(7) The Commission may adopt such rules and regulations (consistent with the other provisions of this Act) as may be necessary to establish its procedures and to govern the manner of its operations, organization, and personnel.

(c)(1) The Commission shall conduct a study of—

(A) the problems resulting from the implementation of Public Law 93-531, and

(B) viable alternatives to the relocations required under Public Law 93-531 that meet the needs of traditional members of both of the Hopi and Navajo traditional governments.

(2) In conducting the study under paragraph (1), the Commission shall visit, inspect, and hold public hearings regarding, the lands involved in the relocation required under Public Law 93-531. Public hearings of the Commission shall be held at a variety of locations, particularly the communities involved in the relocation.

(3) By no later than the date that is 1 year after the date of enactment of this Act, the Commission shall submit to the President and to the Congress a report on the study conducted by the Commission under paragraph (1). Such report shall include—

(A) recommendations for solutions to the remaining problems involved in completing the requirements of Public Law 93-531, and that would resolve the disputes between the Hopi Tribal Council and the Navajo Tribal Council, and meet the needs of traditional members of both the Hopi and the Navajo traditional governments.

(B) viable alternatives to the relocations required under Public Law 93-531.

(d) The Commission shall have the power to—

(1) appoint, terminate, and fix the compensation (without regard to the provisions of title 5, United States Code, governing appointments in the competitive service, and without regard to the provisions of chapter 51 and subchapter III of chapter 53 of such title, or of any other provision of law, relating to the number, classification, and General Schedule rates) of such personnel as may be necessary to assist in the performance of the duties of the Commission, at rates not to exceed a rate equal to the maximum rate for GS-18 of the General Schedule under section 5332 of such title; and

(2) procure, as authorized by section 3109 of title 5, United States Code, temporary and intermittent services to the same extent as is authorized by law for agencies in the executive branch but at rates not to exceed the daily equivalent of the maximum annual rate of basic pay in effect for grade GS-18 of such General Schedule.

THE SEMIAUTOMATIC ASSAULT WEAPONS ACT OF 1989

HON. CONSTANCE A. MORELLA

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 1, 1989

Mrs. MORELLA. Mr. Speaker, the "right to bear arms" must not protect drug dealers, violent criminals, terrorists, and psychopaths. I join with my colleagues today in support of the Semiautomatic Assault Weapons Act of 1989. The terrible tragedy in the Stockton, CA school yard focused world attention on the ease with which people may purchase weapons of this type in the United States. This legislation would treat semiautomatic assault weapons the same way as machine guns are treated under current law.

This is not a confiscation bill. Current owners of semiautomatic assault weapons could keep their guns, but would have to register them with the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, and Firearms. Importation and domestic manufacture of semiautomatic assault weapons would be prohibited. Also prohibited would be the manufacture, importation, possession or transfer of new ammunition feeding devices with a capacity greater than 20 rounds.

I stand in strong support of this legislation, and I urge my colleagues to join me in support of this public safety measure. Let us make an effort to lower the shocking murder statistics in the United States today. This legislation would certainly be a step in the right direction.

RAILROAD DRUG ABUSE PREVENTION ACT OF 1989

HON. BOB WHITTAKER

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 1, 1989

Mr. WHITTAKER. Mr. Speaker, today I join my colleague TOM LUKEN, the Chairman of the Transportation Subcommittee of the Energy and Commerce Committee, in introducing legislation to mandate random drug testing of railroad personnel in safety-sensitive positions.

More than 2 years after the national attention was focused on the problem of railroad drug abuse by the tragic collision at Chase, MD, the Congress still has not enacted compulsory testing legislation for any mode of transportation. Yet over that same span of time, there have been numerous examples of rail accidents where drug use was involved. And by the way, we know of these instances of drug use only because the Department of Transportation is temporarily being allowed to conduct post-accident tests, but its testing rules have been overturned in Federal court with an appeal now before the Supreme Court.

After carefully investigating this railroad safety issue in our subcommittee's hearings, we know that random testing is the only truly preventive anti-drug strategy that can blunt the threat to public safety posed by drug users who literally hold the lives of others—including fellow workers—in their hands. Failing to pass legislation assuring that our rail safety authorities will have this vital tool available seriously undercuts our supposed national commitment to fight drug abuse in a comprehensive way.

The 2 years since the Chase accident have seen a number of developments: more unfortunate and avoidable accidents, the issuance of random-testing rules by administrative action of Transportation Department, and—inevitably—numerous court cases. But the key factors remain just about as they were in early 1987: DOT still has no congressional mandate to support a random testing program, and in an area where there are many thorny legal and constitutional questions, that deficiency can be fatal to any program once it reaches the courts.

Already, the newly issued random testing rules have been challenged in court. The prognosis is not particularly hopeful. And even if present rules—adopted without any specific statutory backing from the Congress—do ultimately survive in the courts, why should Congress assure by inaction that this vital safety measure will only be implemented the hard way, if at all?

Besides giving random testing a strong legal underpinning, the bill we are introducing today will also assure that railroad workers are afforded a testing program of guaranteed integrity—including a mandatory program of rehabilitation for those who voluntarily turn themselves in or are in a first-offense situation. This is the best and most humane way we know to protect the public against the obvious safety threat, while giving the drug user every reasonable opportunity to put his life back together through a professionally administered rehabilitation program. I look forward to working with our other colleagues to pass this important legislation on a bipartisan basis as soon as possible.

One final note: I sincerely hope that House members, the public, and especially the Senate advocates of transportation testing programs will consider our bill on its own merits, and its own merits only. This bill is a proposal addressed to the demonstrated problem of drug and alcohol abuse in the railroad industry. It is not a stalking-horse for other testing programs, in transportation or elsewhere. Therefore I urge that it be considered on its own, and not help hostage to divided opinions on other forms of drug testing—whether in transportation, sports, government, or elsewhere. Problems are often best solved one at a time, and this is such a case.

FAIRNESS FOR ADOPTING FAMILIES ACT

HON. WILLIAM LEHMAN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 1, 1989

Mr. LEHMAN of Florida. Mr. Speaker, for several Congresses I have introduced legislation to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 to provide a deduction for adoption expenses. Today I am again reintroducing the Fairness for Adopting Families Act along with my colleagues Congressman CHARLES RANGEL, Congresswoman, PATRICIA SCHROEDER, and Congressman FRANK WOLF. A companion bill in the Senate is being reintroduced by Senators ORRIN HATCH and PAUL SIMON as well.

I believe that we should focus our priorities and take a special interest in representing our Nation's children with emphasis on their needs and rights. One change in this direction was signaled by President Bush's announcement during his State of the Union Address. He promised to take steps to create a tax deduction for adoption expenses. I have worked for a bipartisan approach to this issue in the past, and I welcome working with the Bush administration on this important issue.

We neglectfully forget that there are many children who do not live in permament homes with loving, nurturing parents. Just as each child has a right to a home, I believe that people who are eager to become parents should not be barred only because they cannot afford the high costs associated with adoption. For those who chose this option, and it is a magnificent way to form families, we should better address today's needs and help to remove unnecessary obstacles that prevent successful adoption in this country.

We have not done very much to encourage the development of healthy families, despite a lot of lipservice to this ideal. Children still languish in the foster care system much too long, their best interests being lost in legal mire. Many prospective parents are ready and able to parent older, hard-to-place, and handicapped children as well as infants.

When enacted, this legislation will alleviate much suffering by American taxpayers who desperately want to parent but simply do not have the savings or income necessary to meet the increasing costs of adoption. Let us help children and would-be parents by allowing a little relief that is already being allowed to taxpayers that are covered by medical insurance and are allowed a tax deduction for childbirth expenses. It would also help families who are, more and more, choosing to expand their own families through adoption.

Tax reform enacted during 1986 has abandoned the needs of children and prospective adoptive parents by leaving this issue to the States. Yet research has shown most States have neither the funds nor sufficient interest to initiate adoption assistance programs.

The legislation being introduced in the House today would provide a tax deduction for reasonable and necessary adoption of a child by a taxpayer. These fees include agency fees, court costs, attorney fees, and other expenses directly related to the legal adoption of a child. It does not allow expenses incurred in the adoption by an individual of the spouse's child since such a child would already be a member of a family. The amount allowable shall not exceed $5,000 and in the case of an international adoption, $7,000. The deduction would not be allowed for anyone whose taxable income exceeds $60,000. And to encourage more companies to join those who already provide employee reimbursement for adoption expenses, the bill allows for business expenses.

One of the primary barriers to adoption for the mainstream of American citizens who wish to adopt is the cost associated with adoption. I know from the many letters I have received over the years and from my long involvement in adoption issues that the expenses prohibit many deserving people from adopting infants or older children. It is a myth that those who adopt can afford to do so. And it is unfair for only those who can afford to adopt to become parents. It is unfair to the children who I believe have a right to be nurtured in loving homes. And it is shortsighted if we do not help prospective adoptive parents to realize their dreams.

Our children are our future, and we have a responsibility as legislators to represent their needs. It is time for adoption as a mode of family formation to receive more support, and I urge my colleagues to cosponsor this legislation and work for its early passage.

MARK MASLER NATIONAL WINNER

HON. SHERWOOD L. BOEHLERT

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 1, 1989

Mr. BOEHLERT. Mr. Speaker, it is with great pride that I stand before the House to recognize Mark Masler of Tuxton, NY, as the national winner of the American Farm Bureau Federation Young Farmer and Rancher Discussion Contest.

Mark's accomplishment should not be underestimated. Mark was selected to represent New York in the national contest after winning regional and statewide meets. His victory represents New York's first national champion from this competition, singled out from 32 State champs who competed for the title.

The top national honors were based on Mark's discussion and knowledge on topics centering on the future of agricultural policy. The State champs gathered in San Antonio, NM, to debate ideas and offer solutions to such complex issues as the 1990 farm bill, Social Security, new agriculture product development, and chemical use in farming.

Because of Mark's history of assuming leadership roles, demonstrated through his chairmanship of the Young Farmers and Ranchers local and State committees, he was able to outshine many worthy farmers competing in the meet.

Presently Mark operates a 300-acre 100 registered Holstein cow farm. The Cortland County farmer's endeavors have not gone unnoticed, he has received quality milk awards from Cortland Bulk Milk several times.

Mark truly epitomizes the farmer of the 21st century. He is highly in tune with the technical advances in his field and has an excellent working knowledge of his choosen career in life. Mark received his bachelor of science from Cornell University in 1982. He works within his community in various local organizations and keeps abreast of the latest farming breakthroughs to increase his production.

As cochairman of the Northeast Agriculture Caucus I am aware of the problems facing farmers of the 1990's. I have no greater respect than to those individuals who enter the farming profession. The men and women who provide the country with bread and butter sacrifice much to reap the fruits this great land of ours has to offer.

Young people such as Mark Masler are a credit to their profession and give us great confidence that the future of farming is in good hands.

FEDERAL LAW ENFORCEMENT OFFICERS DEATH PENALTY ACT OF 1989

HON. ELTON GALLEGLY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 1, 1989

Mr. GALLEGLY. Mr. Speaker, today I ask for the help of my colleagues to send a convincing message that the 101st Congress will not tolerate wanton and intentional killings of Federal law enforcement officers. These brave men and women should be considered untouchable by violent criminals who show no regard for our moral standards or laws.

Last year, 114 Members of Congress joined me in sponsoring legislation to permit the death penalty for first-degree murder of Federal law enforcement officers. This support was greatly appreciated, and I believe it helped lead to the eventual inclusion of a similar death penalty measure in the comprehensive drug bill. As you will recall, votes on this issue were overwhelmingly supportive of the death penalty.

However, there is still no enforceable death penalty for the first-degree murder of law enforcement officers in cases where drugs are not involved. That is why I am reintroducing my legislation today. My bill covers several Federal officers who may be at risk because of their jobs, including U.S. marshals, judges, attorneys, and FBI agents.

My personal interest in this matter stems from the shocking murder of a constituent of mine who was performing his duties as a Drug Enforcement Agency Officer. When the suspects were apprehended, Federal prosecutors felt obligated to drop charges, and defer to local prosecutors because California has a death penalty. Said U.S. Attorney Robert Bonner at the time:

> It is lamentable, indeed, it is astonishing, that it is not possible to obtain the death penalty under Federal law for the murder of Federal agents. * * * Only Congress can remedy this glaring inadequacy.

Clearly, this is a matter that cuts across party lines. I am asking each Member to join with me to protect our Federal law enforcement officers by cosponsoring and supporting this legislation.

BILL ON CONSERVATION AND RENEWABLES

HON. MARILYN LLOYD

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 1, 1989

Mrs. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing with my colleagues Messrs. SHARP, MORRISON, and MOORHEAD, the Renewable Energy and Energy Efficiency Technology Competitiveness Act of 1989. Senator FOWLER has introduced the companion bill in the Senate. The legislation will provide funding stability for U.S. renewable energy and energy efficiency research and development. The 3-year funding authority seeks to rectify an ever-worsening situation—debilitating reductions in our Federal R&D energy funding.

This year I expect that many hours of our congressional agenda will be spent discussing issues of enormous importance to our global environment and our global community, with global warming, ozone depletion, and acid rain among the most prominent. As we attempt to define our future energy strategies and policies, I believe it is not too soon to reemphasize technologies which will clearly become an important part of our future energy mix. The clean-burning, waste-free renewable energy and energy efficient technologies authorized in the legislation deserve a "second look" as we seek the delicate balance between energy needs and environmental concerns.

By itself the bill is not meant to be a solution to problems within the renewable and energy efficient technology development industries caused by severely reduced budgets over the past 8 years. However, I hope it will be a first step in allowing the technologies to develop on a steady course. Our U.S. manufacturers need our help and our leadership in moving the technologies successfully to the marketplace in this country. We have seen too many promising technologies developed by U.S. research and development brought out by foreign interests because our Federal budget problems did not allow adequate support.

By instituting industry-Federal sector cost-sharing joint ventures I believe the legislation will be beneficial to our industry and business communities and our consumers. The technologies will leave the laboratory with U.S. private sector assistance thus ensuring a market interest. This will enhance our ability to compete in the international marketplace. When energy-saving, more efficient technologies are available to our consumers energy costs saved will benefit the homeowner as well as business owners.

The goals of the bill are to provide funding for 3 years to allow stability for research and development efforts; set national performance goals for renewable technologies; provide funding for six cost-shared joint research and development ventures; and calls for an annual report to the Congress by the Committee on Renewable Energy, Commerce, and Trade.

As chairman of the Subcommittee on Energy Research and Development, I intend to take action on the legislation as soon as our annual budget authorization deliberations are completed. It is my hope that, with the assistance of my colleagues the legislation will become law this year. The benefits gained by our support for these technologies far outweigh the small amount of Federal support called for by this bill. My colleagues and I hope you will join us in our sincere efforts to bring parity to these neglected technologies.

THE FUTURE OF TOURISM

HON. TOBY ROTH

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 1, 1989

Mr. ROTH. Mr. Speaker, the Travel and Tourism Government Affairs Council recently sponsored the seventh annual unity dinner. This event brings together travel industry professionals and public officials in a unified effort to promote tourism in the United States.

Tourism has always been a success story in America. Our great resources and diversity of attractions have made us a favorite destination for foreign travelers. In the past decade, the figures for tourism have skyrocketed, generating new jobs and boosting the economy. Tourism is now the second largest employer in the country, and the staple business for many of our States.

Our commitment to the tourism industry must reflect these statistics. We are at a crossroads. We cannot be bystanders while other countries claim our share of the worldwide tourism market. It is a competitive business, and it will take the combined effort of tourism professionals and government officials to keep tourism in America strong.

The caucus on travel and tourism has been a vital link between the tourism industry and the Federal Government. The forum it provides to discuss pertinent issues has been invaluable.

The unity dinner celebrated the 10th anniversary of the caucus. In 10 years we have made a lot of progress in the travel and tourism field. But the theme of last night's dinner was not a celebration of the past; instead it was a challenge for the future.

In the 101st Congress, we will address issues that affect the tourism business. I urge my colleagues to be aware of those issues and to join with the travel and tourism caucus in making these important decisions.

The course that we take now will steer us into the 1990's and into the next decade. America has traditionally been in the forefront of international trade, and tourism should be no exception. We must keep the industry strong in the next decade and in the next century.

IF THEY COULD SEE WITH MY EYES

HON. CHRISTOPHER SHAYS

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 1, 1989

Mr. SHAYS. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to share a poem with my colleagues that was written by one of my constituents, Jason Hoefflinger of Norwalk, CT, upon his completion of a drug rehabilitation program. The program, administered by the Vitam Center at Norwalk Hospital, helps young people locate an inner strength that allows them to overcome the influence of drugs. His poem reads as follows:

IF THEY COULD SEE WITH MY EYES

(By Jason Hoefflinger)

My old life is dead,
A new one is beginning.
It's a game I'm losing,
But I'm also winning.
Some say I can't be changed at all.
They say changing me is like hitting a wall.
If they could see with my eyes,
Hear with my ears.
Then they'd know how I lived throughout the years.
I've lived with crime and shame.
I've broken the rules,
I've cheated the game.
I have seen, I have done, I have heard it all,
But now I'm strong, I'm standing tall.
I'm inside looking out,
Wondering what my life is all about.
I'm trying as hard as I can,
To make myself a better man.
My past can't be changed,
It never will.
But the future to come,
Is yet to be filled.

CHIEF JUSTICE EARL WARREN DAY

HON. ROBERT T. MATSUI

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 1, 1989

Mr. MATSUI. Mr. Speaker, I want to take this time to inform you that Congressman BILL LOWERY and I will be introducing legislation to designate April 8, 1989, as "Chief Justice Earl Warren Day." We invite our colleagues to join us in honoring this great jurist and American.

Chief Justice Earl Warren was one of the outstanding public figures of the 20th century. He began his remarkable career as an assistant to the city counsel of Oakland and ended his days in California as Governor. However, it was not until President Dwight Eisenhower tapped Earl Warren for Chief Justice of the Supreme Court that his real impact on America was felt.

Under his leadership, the Warren Court set the United States on a new course of racial equality. Chief Justice Warren and his colleagues presided over the most dramatic and important civil rights cases this country has ever known. Warren's commitment to equal rights was firmly set in his decision of Brown versus the Board of Education. It was Earl Warren and his Court that ended legal discrimination in America. Warren was also the primary force in protecting the rights of the accused. In the case of Miranda versus Arizona, the Court ruled that individuals were innocent until proven guilty and that they deserved the same rights as all other citizens.

On April 8 and 9, 1989, many distinguished members of the public and private sectors will be meeting in San Francisco to honor Earl Warren on the 20th anniversary of his retirement from the Supreme Court. This commemorative weekend will include a dinner where the first public screening of the PBS documentary, "Superchief: The Life and Legacy of Earl Warren" will be shown. Also, a symposium on the legacy of the Warren Court will be held to debate the merits of the man and his Court. It would be most fitting then for Congress to pass this legislation in order that our institution be represented on the day that Justice Warren receives his homage.

Chief Justice Warren and his Court changed the face of America. Individual rights gained new importance and the Court was there to protect them. Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to join Congressman LOWERY and me in honoring this great jurist and American.

THE RENEWABLE ENERGY AND ENERGY EFFICIENCY TECHNOLOGY COMPETITIVENESS ACT OF 1989

HON. PHILIP R. SHARP

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 1, 1989

Mr. SHARP. Mr. Speaker, today on behalf of myself and my good friends and colleagues MARILYN LLOYD, CARLOS MOORHEAD, and SID MORRISON, I am introducing the Renewable Energy and Energy Efficiency Technology Competitiveness Act of 1989.

The purposes of this legislation are to improve the commercialization and international competitiveness of renewable energy and energy efficiency technologies developed in the United States.

It does this by orienting DOE's renewable energy research programs more toward achieving commercial applications; by establishing performance goals for those programs; by providing stable authorization levels for the renewable energy and conservation research and development programs over the next 3 years; by requiring the Department of Energy to enter into joint ventures with industry; and by expanding efforts by Federal agencies to facilitate marketing efforts for renewable energy products in foreign counties.

Three trends have increased the importance of renewable energy and energy efficiency since last year when my colleagues and I originally filed this bill.

One trend is the increasing scientific evidence that combustion of fossil fuels is contributing to a gradual warming of the Earth that may have dire consequences for our planet.

While my colleagues are no doubt aware of the global warming threat, they my not be as aware of two other trends in energy use. U.S. energy consumption has been rising rather steeply in the past 2 years. Total consumption was at an all time high last year after remaining roughly level between 1973 and 1986.

Finally, our imports of foreign oil are also increasing, rising to 42 percent of domestic consumption in 1988 with expectations of even higher imports in the years to come.

THE IMPORTANCE OF RENEWABLE ENERGY

Renewable energy has multiple benefits for our economy. The most obvious benefits are environmental. While renewable energy technologies do have some environmental impacts, they are not as severe as those of more conventional technologies. This becomes increasingly important as we learn more each year about the dangers of the "greenhouse effect" caused by carbon dioxide buildup and continue to struggle with the problems of storing radioactive waste, improving urban air quality, and reducing acid rain.

Renewable energy technologies also offer us diversity and therefore more security. The more different types of energy we rely on, the less chance that any one of them will be interrupted or will rise in price. Diversification is a form of insurance policy. Renewables also contribute to energy security more directly to the extent that they displace imported energy supplies.

Finally, renewables help with the trade deficit. Not only do they displace imported energy, but perhaps more importantly, they provide a growing international opportunity for exports. This last point is worth expanding upon.

The international market for wind turbines today is roughly $200 million per year and is expected to rise to $1 billion per year by 1994 and $3 to $6 billion by the year 2000. In the last 7 years, however, the share of the U.S. wind machine market captured by foreign imports has gone from zero to 70 percent.

The international market for photovoltaics is currently $500 million and is expected to increase to $5.4 billion by the year 2010.

We do not have to wait for the future to capture these benefits. Renewable energy technologies are contributing right now. Wind generated 1.8 billion kilowatt-hours in the United States in 1988, roughly enough electricity for the residential customers in a city the size of San Francisco. There are roughly 1,600 megawatts of geothermal powered electric generating capacity active in California, an amount equal to three large coal fired power-plants. Photovoltaics are currently cost effective in remote applications such as buoys, communication towers, and oil and gas production facilities, and technological advances are rapidly driving their cost down further. Between 5 and 10 percent of all homes in the United States rely primarily on wood for home heating.

While renewable energy is no panacea for our environmental, trade or energy security concerns, it has to be part of a long-term solution.

FEDERAL FUNDING FOR RENEWABLE ENERGY

Funding for renewable energy has been steadily declining since the beginning of the 1980's. For example, DOE renewable energy R&D funding dropped from $647 million in 1980 to $103 million in 1987, $97 million in 1988 and $92 million in the current fiscal year. This comes at a time when international markets are expanding and other countries are increasing their spending in these areas.

In 1988, for the first time, the United States Government spent less on research for photovoltaics—$35 million—than either Japan—$43 million—or West Germany—$61 million. The same is true in wind research where the United States spent $8.5 million while West Germany and the Netherlands spent $10.2 and $9.7 million respectively.

While the deficit compels us to limit spending in all areas, cuts of the size we have seen in renewable energy are not the way to maintain our technological leadership and international competitiveness.

ENERGY CONSERVATION'S IMPORTANT CONTRIBUTION

Efficiency has already saved the United States tremendous amounts of energy. Between 1973 and 1986 the GNP grew 33 percent while energy used stayed roughly steady at 73 quadrillion British thermal units—"quads". If the economy had continued to grow at that same level of energy use per GNP, we would have used an additional 29 quads per year. That 29 quads is more energy than the total new supplies from all other forms of energy since 1973. It also represents an estimated $150 billion savings per year to consumers.

Not all of that 29 quads can be attributed to increased efficiency. Some is due to a structural shift in our economy away from energy intensive "smokestack" industries. However, as much as half of the savings can be attributed to increased efficiency.

Compared to historical trends, our savings in oil and gas alone equal roughly half of OPEC's current capacity. This reduction in demand was a major factor in reducing OPEC's grip on the market.

There is much additional efficiency left to exploit in the economy. Various studies estimate there are between 5 and 18 million barrels of oil equivalent per day of cost-effective efficiency improvements available in our economy. Many of these savings are available at fractions of the cost of new supply.

Many exciting efficiency technologies are available to us such as heat mirror glass, electronic ballasts for fluorescent lights, cars in the 30- to 50-miles-per-gallon range, and refrigerators, air-conditioners and furnaces that use far less energy while offering the same comfort and convenience.

Just as renewable energy can help with the trade deficit, so can energy efficiency. Obviously, greater efficiency can reduce energy imports. In addition, lower energy costs mean lower production costs and hence more competitive U.S. products.

There is also a burgeoning world market for more efficient products including appliances, efficient motors and motor controls, automobiles and computerized energy management systems. Federal research and development can help us enhance our competitive edge in these growing markets.

Conservation R&D spending has undergone the same kind of cutbacks that have occurred in renewable energy. Funding dropped from $344 million in 1980 to $166 in fiscal year 1989.

WHAT THIS BILL DOES

This bill sets technical performance goals for DOE's research and development programs for photovoltaics, solar thermal and wind, and requires DOE to set similar goals for its biofuels, solar building, ocean energy systems and geothermal research programs.

The bill authorizes slightly higher, 3-year funding levels for the renewable energy and energy conservation research and development programs.

The 3-year authorizations have two purposes. One is to redress the imbalance which has occurred in absolute funding levels through cuts in recent years. Hence, the partial restoration of budget authority. Second, by providing authorizations for 3 years we hope to provide some stability for the researchers and firms depending on them. Such stability should lead toward better planning and efficiency for these programs.

It also requires DOE to set up six renewable energy joint venture projects demonstrating the commercial potential of renewable energy technologies. These ventures would be jointly financed with industry.

This provision is in response to industry criticism that the renewable energy R&D program is too oriented toward long-term research and not oriented enough toward nearer term research that firms can use to develop commercial products.

The bill authorizes slightly higher, 3-year funding levels for the Committee on Renewable Energy, Commerce and Trade [CORECT]. CORECT is a very successful interagency task force that coordinates the Government's efforts to encourage foreign markets for domestic renewable energy products.

The bill requires DOE to provide a strategic plan that shows how its research and development plans help achieve the policy goals in the national energy policy plan [NEPP]. The intent of this provision is to more closely tie the allocation of DOE resources in research to the goals specified in the NEPP. We should have some idea of the relative ranking of how much energy is potentially going to be produced or saved per dollar spent.

CONCLUSION

Renewable energy and energy conservation are too important to give up on now. We need to build on the progress we have already made through more emphasis on commercial application and by stabilizing funding for these programs. By doing so we can keep America competitive in the growing international market for these products. At the same time, we can make a down payment on the global warming problem and contribute to U.S. energy security.

We welcome our colleagues' support and cosponsorship.

VETERANS NURSE PAY ACT OF 1989

HON. JOSEPH P. KENNEDY II

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 1, 1989

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, day after day we read or listen to accounts about the terrible crises facing Veterans' Administration medical centers. VA hospitals have been forced to take beds out of service, deny patient care to war-injured veterans and cut back on essential patient services. The VA nursing shortage is an essential root problem of this crises—and the severe underfunding of salaries, without a doubt, is the root problem of the VA nursing shortage. VA nursing pay scales are grounded in title V of the general schedule which has become so obsolete that it can no longer provide the flexibility that the changing labor market demands.

The current GS pay scale for a registered nurse just out of college, for an example, is $17,542 per year. This may be sufficient for the limited areas of the country where there is no nursing shortage, but for 75 percent of the VA medical centers, this salary is totally inadequate to recruit and retain qualified registered nurses. Nurses in the VA can receive special salary rates, but the problem with special salary rates is that they are administratively costly to implement. By the time a hospital administrator receives the go-ahead from the VA central office to implement the new rates, nursing salaries in the private sector have escalated again, placing the administrator in the constant game of catchup. Another problem with special salary rates is that in areas such as New York, Boston, and San Francisco, labor costs far exceed the limit placed on special salary rates.

The Veterans' Nurse Pay Act of 1989 addresses these concerns by reforming the current nurse pay schedule. This legislation condenses the present eight pay grades into four pay grades and provides a broad salary range for each of the four grades. The Veterans' Nurse Pay Act of 1989 gives the hospital administrator the flexibility to respond to local labor market needs and select a salary within a range for registered nurses without prior VA central office approval. The hospital administrators must be able to substantiate their actions, just as they currently must substantiate the need for special salary rates. The difference is that they are able to do this at annual budget cycles which gives them the freedom to immediately respond to a crises instead of waiting several months for central office approval.

The Veterans' Nurse Pay Act of 1989 will provide nurses with the incentive to excel in their practice by rewarding them for assuming head nurse positions, publishing articles in professional journals, attaining clinical certification, and participating in professional societies. But most importantly, this legislation will reward nurses for choosing to work at the Veterans' Administration by allowing them to receive pay competitive with the private sector.

This legislation is cost conscious: it does not provide a blanket increase in nurses' salaries. Only the VA hospitals which are located in tough labor market areas will receive funds for salaries in excess of the minimum amount in each range. This legislation will incorporate the special salary rate funds that should be provided for under current law.

I hope my colleagues will support the Veterans' Nurse Pay Act of 1989. Special salary rates have become the rule rather than the exception. Piling bonuses and special salary rates on top of an ailing pay schedule has resulted in an administrative nightmare. Let's treat the underlying problem by reforming the pay schedule so that hospital administrators can reopen the closed wards, readmit deserving veterans and restore patient services back to the levels mandated by law. We owe this to our Nation's veterans. A section-by-section summary of the legislation is provided below:

VETERANS' NURSE PAY ACT OF 1989 SECTION-BY-SECTION SUMMARY

SECTION 1. TITLE

"Veterans Nurse Pay Act of 1989."

SECTION 2. RESTRUCTURING OF NURSE PAY LEVELS

A. The current 8 nurse pay grades will be condensed into 4 pay grades. Each of the 4 new pay grades will have a corresponding salary range which incorporates the pay levels employed under Title V of the General Schedule.

1. Entry Grade will replace the current junior and associate grades and will have a salary range of $17,542-$34,136 (GS 6-GS 10).

2. Intermediate grade will replace the current full and intermediate grades and will have a salary range of $23,846-$44,957 (GS 9-GS 12).

3. Senior grade will replace the current senior and chief grades and will have a salary range of $34,580-$63,172 (GS 12-14).

4. Director grade will replace the current assistant director and director grades and will have a salary range of $48,592-$82,500 (GS 14-GS 16).

B. DEFINITION OF CURRENT NURSE GRADES.—On the date of enactment, the 4 new pay grades will become known as the current nurse grades.

SECTION 3. ADMINISTRATION OF NEW PAY STRUCTURE

A. Amends Subchapter I of Chapter 73 of title 38, U.S.C. by creating a new section 4107A under section 4107.

a. Instructs the Secretary to maintain four pay grade levels with the corresponding relationship to the General Schedule (see section 2.a.).

b. The rates of salary for each nurse grade will correspond to the established range of pay grades. The minimum salary for the nurse within a grade will be the minimum salary within that range and maximum salary rates for the nurse within a grade will be the maximum salary within that range.

c. (1) The range of salary will be divided into 20 equal increments known as steps. There will be no rates of pay that fall between steps. Rates of pay will increase by a full step.

(2) a. A nurse's salary will be increased by one step every two years for satisfactory performance if a salary increase has not otherwise been received for that two year time period.

b. All promotions involving additional duty assignments will be associated with at least a one-step salary increase within a nurses grade.

(3) All future head nurses and existing head nurses will receive a two step salary increase. A two step decrease in salary will occur when the nurse leaves such position.

d. Promotions from one grade level to another will be associated with an increase in salaries.

e. MERIT INCREASES.—The director of a medical center may provide a step increase within a grade or a cash bonus to a nurse who has exceptional qualifications, experience or achievement for that nurse's grade using the following criteria:

1. service with relevant professional committees or groups.

2. service in a responsible office in a professional nursing society.

3. educational attainment including certification.

4. publication of articles in professional journals.

5. exemplary job performance.

6. other appropriate evidence of professional stature.

f. GUIDELINES FOR DETERMINING NURSES' SALARIES.—

1. The medical center director may hire a nurse at a rate of pay in excess of the minimum rate in each range but no more than the maximum rate in each range without prior Central Office approval if the director feels it is necessary to obtain the services of the nurse.

2. This may be done under the following circumstances:

a. to provide pay competitive with the private sector.

b. to meet current staffing needs.

c. to recruit nurses with essential specialized skills.

3. When a director exercises this authority without prior Central Office approval, the director must—

a. justify in writing why this action was taken and provide supporting documentation.

b. provide this documentation at the next budget submission.

g. A nurse transferring from one VA medical center to another will not become demoted in grade but will be subject to pay consistent with local VA pay conditions.

B. TRANSFERS.—

1. (a) clarifying language.

(b) Eliminates the cap on overtime pay by allowing nurses to receive 1 and ½ times their hourly rate for overtime.

2. renumbers current title 38, section 4107 language.

C. CONFORMING AND CLERICAL CHANGES.

SECTION 4. EFFECTIVE DATE

October 1, 1989.

HALL INTRODUCES SSC FOREIGN CONTRIBUTION BILL

HON. RALPH M. HALL

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 1, 1989

Mr. HALL of Texas. Mr. Speaker, today Mr. BARTON of Texas and I are introducing legislation designed to encourage foreign contributions to the superconducting super collider project and to clarify the terms and conditions under which the State selected for the site, Texas, will contribute voter approved funds totaling approximately $1 billion.

H.R. 1195, the SSC Non-Federal Contribution Act of 1989, contains much of the thrust of the State and foreign language in H.R. 4505, the Department of Energy Research and Development Authorization Act of 1989, which was reported from the Committee on Science, Space, and Technology and passed by the House last year. However, since that time a number of events have occurred which have given us reason to take a second look at these provisions.

The site selection process has been completed, and the size of the State contribution is now known. A contribution of this magnitude by the State of Texas, which is approximately 25 percent of the cost of the project, substantially reduces the Federal outlays required to construct and operate the SSC.

Like the State contribution, foreign contributions have the potential to further reduce the Federal cost of the project. However, there is justifiable concern that, in the absence of proper constraints on foreign contributions and participation in the SSC project, American jobs could be lost and an unjustified amount of experience in the so-called high-tech parts of the project could be gained elsewhere.

This bill addresses those issues and seeks to achieve a balance between the desire for substantial foreign participation and contributions and the economic and technical benefits that will accrue to Americans through the design, construction, and operation of such a large project.

The Subcommittee on International Scientific Cooperation which I chair will hold a hearing on March 8 to receive testimony on this bill. The Department of Energy and the State of Texas have been invited to testify. In addition, the Energy Department witness will be asked to review the current status of discussions with potential foreign contributors and participants.

Further hearings may be held to receive testimony from foreign governments and companies interested in participating in the SSC project.

STATEMENT HONORING CHIEF JUDGE ALMERIC CHRISTIAN

HON. RON de LUGO

OF THE VIRGIN ISLANDS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 1, 1989

Mr. DE LUGO. Mr. Speaker, we have an abundance of legal talent in the U.S. Virgin Islands, but no legal mind is more respected than that of Chief Judge Almeric Christian.

Judge Christian, who was the first native Virgin Islander to be named U.S. attorney and then district court judge, has been a model of scholarship and accomplishment for our entire community. Our people could go into his courtroom with confidence that they would find justice and fairness. In his 40-year legal career, he never shied away from tough decisions that affected our entire community, including one ruling that opened up our public schools to children of noncitizens and another ruling that declared our beaches belong to and must be accessible to our people.

After 18 years on the bench, Judge Christian now has retired to senior status. But he remains a highly esteemed leader in our community, whose opinions are sought on public affairs and the fine points of legal issues, not to mention the subtleties of a smooth golf stroke.

I was pleased to see the Virgin Islands Daily News recently devote its space to profile Judge Christian and hold him up as a model for our entire community. I want to place that article in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD because I believe Judge Almeric Christian has earned wider recognition for his wisdom and courage on the bench.

The article follows:

CHRISTIAN'S EMINENT CAREER—FIRST NATIVE-BORN DISTRICT COURT JUDGE IS TRAILBLAZER

(By Philip Harrigan)

He was the first native-born District Court judge and the first District Court senior judge in the territory.

But Almeric Christian could have ended up writing about law, not practicing it.

Now retired from the bench at age 69, Christian recalls being steered toward journalism by a teacher on his native St. Croix.

"He got me a scholarship to Columbia University," which has a top journalism school, but "I went straight into prelaw," Christian says.

This decision resulted in a long, illustrious legal career, one in which Christian made rulings and issued sentences that drew sharp criticism and for which he has no apologies.

"Judges pay too much attention to what the public, as they perceive the public, is going to think about what they do," he says. "That is one area in which I part company with most of the judges with whom I've come in contact."

Some residents have felt that Christian has been too easy on many offenders at sentencing. But he says it is sentencing guidelines that dictate how much time is served.

"Take a judge that would normally give 60 to 75 years for a sentence," he says. In some cases "under the guidelines, unless he justified it, he would have to give 10 years" for the same offense.

"The public doesn't know you can sentence someone for 50 years, and he's eligible for parole in much less time than that"—often one-third of the time to be served, Christian says. And new guidelines that set a 10-year term for certain crimes do not allow for parole, so that time must be served in full.

Christian was born Nov. 23, 1919, to Elena and Adam Christian. He says his legal career was inspired by his lawyer-uncle Andreas Christian.

While a student at Christiansted High School—from which he graduated in 1937 as salutatorian—Almeric Christian worked at his uncle's law offices after school and during the summer.

"I did a little shorthand and typing then and would help out," Christian recalls. Sharing office space with Andreas Christian was pioneering Virgin Islands journalist and labor leader David Hamilton Jackson, and exposure to both men "firmed up my ambition to be a lawyer."

In 1942, after a year of law study, Christian was drafted into the U.S. Army. During his stint in the service, he served as a defense counsel in special court martials.

"I got so many guys acquitted, they made me the prosecutor," he says.

After completing his legal studies, Christian was admitted to the Virgin Islands bar in October 1947. Also that year, he was admitted to the New York bar.

Back then, he recalls, "we had three resident lawyers on St. Croix and maybe another four on St. Thomas. Now we have over 300."

In 1959, Christian was admitted to practice before the 3rd Circuit Court of Appeals and in 1955 was admitted to the bar of the U.S. Supreme Court.

In 1962, President Lyndon Johnson appointed Christian U.S. Attorney for the Virgin Islands for a four-year term and reappointed him in 1966.

In 1970, President Richard Nixon appointed Christian to the territory's single District Court seat. Less than one year later, he became chief judge when Congress authorized appointment of a second district judge and stipulated that the jurist with the most service would be named chief judge.

He was appointed to a second 10-year term in 1980.

During his years on the bench, Christian ruled on issues that deeply affected life in the territory. In one notable case, he set the stage for implementation of a free-beach law by ruling that the beaches belonged to the government, and, essentially, the people.

Christian was an imposing figure on the bench—sternness tempered with a lighthearted sense of humor that showed itself in asides to lawyers, jurors or the courtroom in general.

Christian may well be remembered for his work on the bench, but he also is a man who once was an avid baseball player, a sprinter in college and a teacher, a job he held right after high-school graduation ("They gave me a fourth-grade class that nearly drove me nuts").

Christian also is a family man. He is married to the former Shirley Fronup. They have two children, Adam, 22, and Rebecca, 19. Christian's eldest child by a first marriage is Dr. Donna Christian Green, assistant Health commissioner.

Last Oct. 31 shortly after becoming a senior judge with a reduced caseload, Christian stepped down from the bench. There was no provision for senior-judge status for V.I. federal judges before 1986, he says.

Christian, who was experiencing problems with his sight when he took senior status, says he's been "trying to reduce my golf handicap" since retiring.

But, he adds, the legal world has not been left entirely behind. He has met with the Government Employees Service Commission "to discuss matters that were bothering them." And he's also told Lt. Gov. Derek Hodge that he'd serve as a hearing officer for insurance claims.

Christian says he also has offered his services to Territorial Court Presiding Judge Verne Hodge "to help out in a pinch."

Christian calls his professional life rewarding, and he believes there are "highly capable lawyers" in the territory.

And, he adds, it "galls me" when the government brings in outside lawyers of "no greater competence than lawyers we have right here."

THE PROMISE OF TENANT MANAGEMENT AND URBAN HOMESTEADING

HON. RICHARD K. ARMEY

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 1, 1989

Mr. ARMEY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend for my colleagues' attention the following article by David Caprara which appeared in the winter 1989 issue of Public Welfare. Mr. Caprara is the director of Housing and Economic Development Programs at the National Center for Neighborhood Enterprise. He has worked tirelessly on behalf of innovative housing policies that will help our Nation's lower income citizens help themselves.

THE PROMISE OF TENANT MANAGEMENT AND URBAN HOMESTEADING

(By David Louis Caprara)

A visit to the Vaughn public housing site in St. Louis provides a grim reminder of the failures of federal housing policies throughout the past several decades. The looming concrete canyon of vacant, boarded-up, high-rises is scheduled for demolition in the near future, the same fate that leveled the once adjacent Pruitt-Igoe project—a housing site so ridden with troubles that dynamite was deemed the only viable solution. These are but two examples of the substandard conditions our country's poor have endured as the hapless victims of the "war on poverty."

Across the nation, such housing failures can be found time and again: in the buildings that have virtually been taken over by gangs in Cabrini Green on Chicago's North Side; in the vacant and crime-ridden public housing sites of Detroit. One can only marvel at the seeming indifference of some policy makers in their purported effort to provide "decent, safe, and sanitary housing" for low-income individuals and families.

Only one block away from the catastrophies of public housing in St. Louis, however, lie three low- and moderate-income housing sites that may provide direction for a future successful housing policy for this nation. One of the model developments, the Carr Square Village public housing site, was turned over to a tenant management corporation (TMC) in 1976. After nearly 13 years of successful management, throughout which residents, through their own efforts, enjoyed an ever-increasing sense of pride and improved quality of life, Carr Square Village will soon become the second public housing site in the nation to be converted to cooperative tenant homeownership—a fitting reward for the sweat and effort poured into the site by residents.

The first tenant-managed housing site to be purchased by its residents is Kenilworth-Parkside in Washington, D.C., which achieved its long-awaited goal in October 1988. Both Kenilworth and Carr Square are part of a three-year public housing resident management demonstration funded by the AMOCO Foundation and sponsored by the National Center for Neighborhood Enterprise. The center provided technical support through a three-step process of management training, economic development, and homeownership conversion.

The Cochran Gardens TMC in St. Louis, a neighbor of the Vaughn site, is also in line for tenant ownership. Cochran Gardens has been hailed as a national model of resident-managed housing and was recognized as such in the federal Housing and Community Development Act of 1987. Bertha Gilkey, Cochran's chairman of the board and president of the National Tenant Union, testified before the housing subcommittees of both the House and Senate. She also appeared on CBS's Sixty Minutes, where she recounted in detail the transformation of her housing site. Challenging the decision to doom the site to the same fate as that of gang-ruled Pruitt-Igoe, Gilkey applied her courage, energy, and powers of persuasion, enlisting former gang members in a massive effort to rehabilitate Cochran Gardens.

In time, a virtual army of talented and energetic residents was mustered to form an in-house maintenance crew; a youth corps; and a bevy of small-business entrepreneurs who have set up ventures including day care provision, catering services, renovation/construction teams, cable television installation crews, and a system of urban mass transportation. A "people's factory" is also on the drawing board, which will be owned and operated by the TMC in partnership with area corporations.

O'Fallon Place, also located in St. Louis, is a third model project, a low- and moderate-income project that resulted from a joint venture between Carr Square and Cochran Gardens—which hold 25 percent equity—and a local private developer, McCormack, Baron, and Associates. The O'Fallon site is a well-kept, attractive set of townhouse apartments.

Moreover, repeated examples of the success and momentum of resident management throughout the nation give evidence that such programs are repeatable and not merely flukes—or the result of a single charismatic leader, as some have claimed. In case after case, resident management has transformed communities that had previously been hellholes, abandoned by housing authorities. In addition, statistics show that as the management in various sites improves under the residents, who are after all the people most concerned with its success, the larger society also benefits. For example, a recent study of the Kenilworth-Parkside development by Coopers and Lybrand estimates that the site will save $4.5 million for the District of Columbia government over a 10-year period, thanks to a 77 percent increase on rental revenues, a decrease in operating costs, and an abundance of services offered by the Kenilworth resident management corporation that will diminish the burden on the local government. (In addition, 132 residents have been taken off the welfare rolls through the various business enterprises created by the residents.)

Resident management groups have ventured into areas of social service provision where traditional housing authorities have feared to tread. Hope and a sense of community pride of ownership have been restored through participatory democracy as residents have taken on a range of problems and projects including teen pregnancy, drugs, unemployment, health, and education. In Jersey City, New Jersey, the A. Harry Moore TMC reduced its crime rate from three times the citywide average to a rate significantly below the city's average. In Boston, the Bromley Heath TMC cut robberies by 77 percent in an area in which telephone companies and other vendors had previously eliminated services because of the high incidence of crime.

The hope for the future of U.S. housing policy clearly lies in private-sector initiatives that involve partnerships with inner-city residents like those I have described. These partnerships may be more fully recognized by lawmakers in the 101st Congress. For example, the current draft of the Senate Housing and Urban Affairs Subcommittee's "National Affordable Housing Act" states that "national housing policy related to preservation and investment in affordable rental housing should rely more heavily on the growing sophistication of state and local governments. And it should expand the capacity of the non-profit sector and other public/private partnerships."

In his book, Producing Lower-Income Housing: Local Initiatives, James Pickman and other housing experts have compiled an inventory of over 100 local and state initiatives "within the rapidly changing context of lower-income housing production in the 1980". The authors agree that the predominantly private-sponsored ventures described in the book are clearly replicable. They added that "in fact, new initiatives are being launched constantly—which makes it difficult to keep up with the latest developments".

Clearly, these dynamic and pioneering champions provide the brightest hope for a new formulation of our national housing policy. The "urban homesteading approach" advocated by such leaders as President George Bush, Jack Kemp, and Sen. Alan Dixon (D-Ill.) is now guiding the creation of a new partnership in housing policy—one of compassion and vision, which will allow pioneering tenants to acquire their homes through "sweat equity and self-management".

PHYSICIAN SELF-REFERRAL PROBLEM: THE EVIDENCE INCREASES

HON. FORTNEY PETE STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, March 1, 1989

Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, Thursday the Subcommittees on Health and Oversight of the Committee on Ways and Means are conducting hearings on issues related to physician self-referrals, including H.R. 939, the Ethics in Patient Referrals Act of 1989.

In today's Wall Street Journal, a most sobering and alarming article emphasized the pervasiveness of these practices. In it, the inflationary effects on costs to patients and insurance carriers, the perversion of medical judgment, and the secrecy—to the patient—of the arrangements, are detailed.

I would like to share with my colleagues the text of this informative article by M. Waldholz and W. Bogdanich, in the Wall Street Journal, March 1, 1989:

[From the Wall Street Journal, Mar. 1, 1989]

DOCTOR-OWNED LABS EARN LAVISH PROFITS IN A CAPTIVE MARKET

(By Michael Waldholz and Walt Bogdanich)

The threat was unmistakable. Coming from a fellow physician, it was a shocker.

William Birnbaum, a radiologist in Irvine, Calif., says that in late 1985 a colleague suddenly demanded a share of his profit. If Dr. Birnbaum didn't accede, he says he was told, this colleague and other physicians in the same medical building would stop referring patients to him for X-rays and other tests.

"He said he wanted a piece of the action," Dr. Birnbaum recalls. "He said since it was their patients, they deserved some of the income."

Dr. Birnbaum spurned the offer. Late last year, the colleagues carried out the threat. In a building next door, they created a separate radiology practice in which they each owned investment shares. As owners of the new Irvine Imaging Center, they will divvy up the income from tests on their patients for such ills as broken bones, tumors, heart problems, backaches, migraines and chest pains. The more tests, the more revenue, and the higher the dividends to physicians.

Practically nonexistent two or three years ago, arrangements such as this are spreading across the U.S. Terrance Gill, a consultant who helps set up such deals, bluntly described the phenomena in a seminar for physicians a few years ago. "Stickup, extortion, bandit(ry), anything else you want to call it, but it's reality out there, foks," he said in the tape-recorded session.

By some estimates, physicians in every community in America are supplementing their incomes with profits from their interests in laboratories, X-ray centers and other medical facilities where they send their patients. In many cases the physicians earn 25% to 100% and more a year on investments of $5,000 to $100,000.

The halls of medicine, in fact, are buzzing with tales of extra cash for no extra effort. Physicians who in 1986 bought partnership shares at $25,000 each in MRI of Elizabeth, N.J., a magnetic-resonance imaging, or scanning, center, received a financial report last June showing a six-month return of $248,442, or almost $10,000 a share.

That amounts to an annualized return of nearly 80%, after just two years of operation. The venture's prospectus projected an annual return by 1995 of $35,498 a share and total profits after 10 years of nearly $250,000 a share.

LEGAL, BUT ETHICAL?

Outside investors aren't welcome in many such ventures. Physicians, on the other hand, are courted, because they can refer patients to the facilities and thus help ensure their financial success.

U.S. law strictly forbids payments to physicians in direct return for a professional referral where federal money, from Medicare or Medicaid, pays the bill. State laws vary. But in most places it is legal for physicians to profit from investments in medical services to which they refer patients. Critics say such profits, however legal, amount to referral fees—or kickbacks. They charge that the ventures circumvent the law and violate longstanding medical ethics that prohibit payments in return for referrals.

"The arrangements are wrong because they produce a terrible conflict of interest for a doctor," says Arnold Relman, editor of the New England Journal of Medicine. "They give doctors powerful incentives to bend their professional judgments." If such deals aren't outlawed, he says, "doctors will continue to drift toward the opinion that medicine is just a business, and patients are theirs to be bought and sold."

The issue of profiting from patient referrals is one of the most-important to confront the medical community in years. There is evidence that self-referral affects the quality and cost of patient care. But few patients, employers and insurers, who pay the bills, are aware the practice exists. Still, many in medicine see nothing wrong with the arrangements as long as physicians disclose their holdings.

Some health-care authorities like Dr. Relman believe the growth in the ventures reflects a changing attitude among physicians. Angered by loss of income and control over patient care, many physicians are fighting back in a manner the critics say breaches standards of conduct and abuses the trust of their patients.

Few dispute that the investments create conflicts of interest. The argument concerns how extensive the ventures are and whether the profit potential affects patient care. "There is no evidence [of] . . . widespread abuse," says James Todd, an official of the American Medical Association.

Yet some patients have received less convenient and more expensive care when referred to specialized practices or facilities in which their physicians own an interest. A 1983 survey by Blue Cross and Blue Shield of Michigan found that diagnostic laboratories owned by referring physicians charged almost double the fees of other labs and did nearly twice as many tests on the average patient.

"There is no question that ownership interest leads to more testing," says Charlotte Bartzack, a Blue Cross researcher who conducted the 1983 study. She says she has just completed a study showing that physicians have overtested pregnant women with ultrasound imaging devices. The physicians charge Blue Cross about $100 more than it costs them to rent the device for a test. "Some of the doctors are testing the women every month, while only one or two such tests are needed," she says.

In medical trade-magazine argot, giving physicians a piece of the action in laboratories, and other facilities is called "joint-venturing." It is about to erupt into controversy in Washington. Democratic Rep. Fortney "Pete" Stark of California refers to joint ventures as "bribes" and "scams designed to skirt federal anti-kickback laws." Last month, he introduced a bill to block Medicare payments for services provided by the ventures. Tomorrow he will chair a congressional hearing into the matter.

Joint-venturing is also being investigated by a congressional committee chaired by Democratic Rep. John Dingell of Michigan, Congress's General Accounting Office, and the Office of the Inspector General of the Department of Health and Human Services. Their findings will be out later this year.

Says Rep. Stark: "If legislation is not enacted, every minute of every day more deals get started. Within a certain period of time, it [joint venturing] will be politically irreversible."

The American Medical Association says only about 7% of American physicians are involved in such ventures. Other healthcare authorities estimate it may be closer to 25%. All told, physicians hold shares or limited-partnership interests in medical facilities that provide "tens of billions of dollars" a year in services, says Ronald Kovach, a health-care market analyst for Technicore Corp. of Allentown, Pa.

The transactions are spreading into every aspect of medicine. In Florida and California, hospitals are selling interests in operating rooms and laboratories to physicians. Thousands of physicians have bought interests in diagnostic laboratories, physical rehabilitation centers, sports-medicine clinics, mammography laboratories and women's health clinics, all of which a partner-physician can help make profitable by referring patients.

Some of the offerings seem simply too good to be true. In Houston, entrepreneur Jay Harvey sought referring physicians for an outpatient surgery center in 1987 by offering a tenfold return within five years on a $7,500 investment requiring no cash down. Philip Hensel, an enterprising physician in Newport Beach, Calif., tried recruiting physicians to invest in a rehabilitation program for heart patients with the promise of "$15,000 to $25,000 annually . . . by sending your own patients to your own facility."

In an interview, both men say they eventually scaled back the returns they projected but still attracted plenty of physician-investors.

THE PROFITS IN MRI

Many of the ventures encourage high usage. A financial report by Central Suffolk MRI, Smithtown, N.Y., sent to potential physician-investors in other centers, shows that in the first three months of 1987, 481 MRI scans generated a per-share quarterly dividend of $1,000. By October 1988, after quarterly usage doubled, the per-share dividend rose to $5,300. Physicians' shares in the magnetic-resonance center costs $100,000 each, most of which could be borrowed.

Magnetic resonance imaging, which produces extraordinary pictures of the internal body without the health risk of X-rays, has become especially profitable. MRI machines cost as much as $2 million or more. But an hour's examination generates fees of $500 to $1,000.

Jerome Molitor, medical director of the MRI center in Elizabeth, says the center's 26 physician-investors took a high risk by financing a "much-needed technology for the community." He says the investors refer only 30% to 40% of its patients.

In medicine's version of a hostile takeover, many physicians are demanding interests in existing scanning facilities and laboratories. An East Coast physician tape-recorded conversations he had with a promoter who had organized a group of physicians who wanted to share in the profits of an imaging center. Unless the radiologists who owned the center agreed, the promoter told them, the referring physicians would finance a competing center.

"Some people have called me an extortionist," the entrepreneur was recorded as saying. The Wall Street Journal was supplied the tape with the understanding that neither the physician who supplied it nor the promoter be identified.

Many faciliites market their services by offering ownership to physicians. A prospectus for Physicians' Professional Laboratory Services in Jacksonville, Fla., says the $5,000-a-share offering is being made only to physicians. "It is expected that the eventual success of the facility will depend to a large extent on the willingness and ability of the investors to refer patients for lab work," the prospectus says.

IT STINKS

Even physicians who find joint ventures unethical or distasteful are being pressured to join them to protect their income. Alfred Sils, a radiologist in Tarzana, Calif., led an unsuccessful fight in 1986 for a law in California banning the arrangements. But last year, he himself sold shares in his radiology practice to about 40 referring physicians. "It stinks," he says. "We held our noses and did it because if we didn't, someone else would come in here and lure our referring doctors away."

Few patients are aware of such conflicts of interest. This is true despite the American Medical Association's recent ruling that physicians must disclose to patients their interest in facilities the physicians sent them to. In California, state law also requires disclosure if a physician's interest in a facility amounts to 5% or $5,000, or higher. The requirement is widely ignored.

Physicians at the Irvine Imaging Center aren't notifying their patients in writing or in person. Ray Asrar was recently sent to the facility for an X-ray by his physician, Marshal Grossman, an investor. Mr. Asrar says he was unaware of his physician's interest. "It would have been common courtesy to tell me," he says, noting the test cost him about $200 beyond his insurance coverage. Neither Dr. Grossman nor other physicians involved in the imaging center would comment on their disclosure policy or any other aspect of the center.

Despite the conflict of interest in joint ventures, the AMA and many individual physicians don't oppose them. But under intense pressure by many radiologists, the American College of Radiology condemned joint-venturing last September.

In a personal letter to the editor of the New England Journal of Medicine, the radiology college chairman, Lee F. Rogers, wrote: "We have found the potential and actual abuse and exploitation of patients by unethical practices, and the flagrant disregard of physicians' responsibilities to the patient so great and so pervasive that these arrangements must be disallowed."

TALE OF TWO SCANNERS

In Boise, Idaho, the two main hospitals each installed an identical MRI scanner in 1986 even though some health planners urged them to share one. The scanner at St. Alphonsus Regional Medical Center isn't owned by the hospital but by a partnership that includes 39 local physicians and the hospital's administrator. They financed about $1 million of the machine's cost, according to papers filed with the state. Sometimes the machine has run around the clock all week long.

Meanwhile, the machine at St. Luke's Regional Medical Center, 10 minutes away and owned solely by the hospital, runs only eight hours a day, and almost never on weekends. For some scans, until last fall, St. Luke's was charging about $150 less than St. Alphonsus. Then St. Luke's raised its prices.

"We finally figured, why the price-competitive," says Dr. Tod Burt, a radiologist at St. Luke's. "No matter what, the doctors who own a share of the machine at St. Al's aren't going to send their patients here, even if it means billing them more or sending them to be scanned in the dead of night."

Several physician-investors in the St. Alphonsus machine declined to discuss the situation. C. Thomas Jewell, a physician associated with St. Alphonsus who turned down an offer to invest in the MR, says, "I have a feeling many of the doctors involved feel it's wrong."

But for some physician-investors, getting involved "is just plain old greed," says Steven Hirschtick, a Los Angeles lawyer whose firm, Hirschtick, Chenen, Lemon & Curtis, represents radiologists. Physicians' incomes are being squeezed by Medicare and private insurers' cost constraints and by competing health maintenance organizations, he says. "Competition for patients is cutthroat," says Jeff Goldsmith, a Chicago consultant.

BEYOND PRUDENCE

"There is no doubt in my mind that the [joint venture] deals violate medical ethics," says Mr. Hirschtick. But they are perfectly legal, he says, if structured as limited partnerships in which physicians receive dividends in proportion to their ownership interest, not as payments for specific patient referrals.

The General Accounting Office of Congress is conducting the first detailed study of whether joint venturing encourages unnecessary or inappropriate medical care.

Some physicians think it does. "There are a lot of ways you can increase your use of the (MRI) without practicing bad medicine," says Murray Solomon, a radiologist in Burlingame, Calif., just outside San Francisco. "Where it might be prudent to scan a patient with an ailment once every two years, you might just do it every year or even more often instead, figuring what's the harm." Dr. Solomon says he is involved in an MRI joint venture for "competitive" reasons.

Physician-investors in Mammography Plus, a breast cancer detection center in Los Gatos, Calif., were told in a quarterly letter last year that 20% of investors ordered five or less mammogram tests, another 20% ordered six to 10 tests, while 18% referred 30 or more patients. "One physician has referred 115 patients during the first quarter," the letter says. "A fine example for us all to follow."

The letter, sent by Gerald Trobough and Donald Cariani, both obstetrician-gynecologists, exhorted partners with low usage rates to "increase their referrals" because "the long-term goal of this partnership is the responsibility of each of us."

A CHECK AND A SCORECARD

Enclosed with the letter is a first "distribution check" to the physicians for $300 per share, an "approximately 50% annualized return on your investment." Besides the check, each physician-investor also received a report showing how many patients he had referred to the center.

Dan Hale, administrative consultant of the center, says Mammography Plus is popular among the physicians because it provides better services than the local hospitals, not because of the investment return. He says the center isn't overtesting, but is encouraging physicians to use an important service.

Health facilities supported by taxpayers say they are being hurt by the for-profit competition. Harry Stein, chief of radiology at North Shore Hospital in Manhasset, N.Y., says several area physicians who have invested in local imaging centers now send the hospital "only their Medicaid patients."

Many nonprofit home health agencies say they receive only low-paying Medicaid referrals from physicians who have invested in their own visiting nurse operations. The Visiting Nurses Association of Los Angeles, a nonprofit organization, recently notified such physicians that it would no longer take their Medicaid patients if they didn't also refer patients with private insurance, which reimburses at higher amounts.

LONG-DISTANCE INVESTING?

The federal Stark bill would forbid the payment of Medicare money to facilities owned by physicians who refer patients to them. And newly proposed regulations by the Department of Health and Human Services would sharply restrict the ventures.

The fiercest counterattack is expected to come from the American Imaging Association, a lobbying group for physician-owned imaging centers that was organized in December. "We think the [Stark] bill ought to be restricted to just regulating abusers," says Frank Kyle, whose firm, Med Inc., Nashville, helps establish physician-owned centers.

But critics of the ventures say anything less than outright banning of them will leave loopholes.

Advanced Diagnostic Imaging, a venture associated with the New York securities firm of Stuart, Coleman & Co., recently recruited physicians in Long Island to invest in an MRI center it is opening in Massachusetts. "That would be a way for doctors to make a good investment without violating the Stark law," says ADI's president, Drew Netter. "There is no suggestion that the Long Island doctors encourage use in Massachusetts, but then again there is nothing to stop Long Island doctors from talking to their colleagues up north."

And, presumably, Massachusetts physicians would be free to invest in a Long Island MRI center.

Often the joint ventures sprout in areas already saturated with services. In some places deals are so readily available that physicians can choose between them.

That is happening in Fountain Valley, Calif., south of Los Angeles. The Fountain Valley Medical Center runs an MRI and a CT, or computerized tomography, scanner. Last year, area physicians asked for an interest in the imaging center. They weren't interested in the money, says Michael D. Cummings, a neurosurgeon, but wanted control of the center in order to run it better.

CONSULTANT'S ROLE

When the hospital rejected the physicians' offer in late December, the physicians set out to raise $3 million in cash and notes from about 100 area physicians in order to build their own center. In a letter to these physicians, Dr. Cummings predicted returns beginning at more than 50% a year and rising to about 91% in the sixth year of operation.

Now, to retain the allegiance of physicians who use the existing imaging center, the hospital will be forced to make a competing offer, says Malcolm Sperling, a member of the hospital's governing board. "It will be as competitive as it has to be to attract [referring] doctors," Dr. Sperling says. "We need to do this to keep our doctors."

Dr. Cummings says he got the idea to try a takeover of the Fountain Valley center at a seminar last year. There he met Mr. Gill, the Southern California consultant who for the past few years has criss-crossed America preaching the gospel of joint-venturing.

At a symposium for physicians in 1986, Mr. Gill told them that MRI centers do "much, much, much better," if they give "a piece of the action . . . in your community [to physicians] who own the book of business," according to a tape recording.

Mr. Gill said physicians should take advantage of the fact that their "contemporaries march to the cash register." He added, "Greed is a powerful motivator." He said that many referring physicians seeking to increase their incomes were already seizing part ownership in hospital imaging centers.

ABOVE THE AVERAGE

Mr. Gill's consultancy, called the Cooperative, has helped establish some 70 MRI centers with physician-investors, or about 14% of the total MRI centers in the country that are owned by investors.

In a letter he wrote in January to a prospective client, Mr. Gill boasted that the Cooperative's MRI centers average 400 scans a month, versus the national average of 260, and average more than $1 million a year in pre-tax profits, versus the national average of $400,000.

About a dozen other consulting and venture capital firms are beating the medical bushes for new deals. A Merrill Lynch & Co. investment fund has raised $25 million for 13 limited-partnership imaging centers around the country. On New York's Long Island alone there are now 14 MRIs, although the state's health planning agency says only six are needed.

The greater Los Angeles area has more than 50 MRI scanners. The number is expected to triple to 150 by 1991 as a result of "rampant entrepreneurial spirit," says Dr. Robert Lufkin of the University of California, Los Angeles, School of Medicine.

A MICHIGAN DOCTOR TURNS AGAINST HIS MEDICAL LAB

Michigan has the nation's toughest law governing physicians' conflicts of interest. Physicians are barred from referring patients to medical facilities in which they have an interest.

Yet the law, Michigan authorities say, failed to stop physicians from investing in what was Michigan's largest independent medical laboratory, Metric Medical Laboratory. At one point Metric, in suburban Detroit, had 144 limited partners. Most were physicians or their stand-ins, says David Edick, an assistant state attorney general in Michigan. The lab boasted that its limited partners received returns on their investments of between 5,000% and 7,000%.

In September, Michigan Attorney General Frank J. Kelley filed criminal complaints in Ingham County charging the lab with fraud and the payment of illegal kickbacks.

Soon after investing in the lab, Leo Modzinski got a letter from the lab warning "that he would be terminated as a limited partner if his volume of lab referrals did not increase," the complaint alleges.

When Dr. Modzinski tried to increase his $1,000 initial investment, he was told he must first generate more lab referrals, a complaint charges. Investigators also say the lab "insisted that Dr. Modzinski use lab profiles which contained unnecessary testing for many of its patients."

Dr. Modzinski has agreed to cooperate with the government in exchange for the dropping of charges against him. Richard Zuckerman, a lawyer for Metric Medical, says "the company believes the charges are specious and baseless." Mr. Zuckerman says the case rests on Dr. Modzinski, who was convicted of defrauding the federal government in the 1970s. Dr. Modzinski declines to comment.

SENATE COMMITTEE MEETINGS

Title IV of Senate Resolution 4, agreed to by the Senate on February 4, 1977, calls for establishment of a system for a computerized schedule of all meetings and hearings of Senate committees, subcommittees, joint committees, and committees of conference. This title requires all such committees to notify the Office of the Senate Daily Digest—designated by the Rules Committee—of the time, place, and purpose of the meetings, when scheduled, and any cancellations or changes in the meetings as they occur.

As an additional procedure along with the computerization of this information, the Office of the Senate Daily Digest will prepare this information for printing in the Extensions of Remarks section of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on Monday and Wednesday of each week.

Any changes in committee scheduling will be indicated by placement of an asterisk to the left of the name of the unit conducting such meetings.

Meetings scheduled for Thursday, March 2, 1989, may be found in the Daily Digest of today's RECORD.

During the recess, the following proceedings took place in commemoration of the Bicentennial of the U.S. Congress.

The U.S. Army Band, under the direction of Col. Eugene W. Allen, leader and conductor, Maj. C. Benjamin DuBose, conducting, entered the door to the left of the Speaker, took the positions assigned to them, and presented a prelude concert.

The honored guests entered the door to the right of the Speaker and took the positions assigned to them.

The Doorkeeper, Hon. James P. Molloy, announced the President pro tempore and Members of the U.S. Senate, who entered the Hall of the House of Representatives, the President pro tempore taking the chair at the right of the Speaker, and the Members of the Senate the seats reserved for them.

The U.S. Army Band, under the direction of Col. Eugene W. Allen, leader and conductor, and Maj. C. Benjamin DuBose, presented a prelude concert.

The SPEAKER. The joint meeting to commemorate the Bicentennial of the U.S. Congress will come to order.

The Doorkeeper announced the flag of the United States.

The flag was carried into the Chamber by the joint Armed Forces color guard accompanied by the 3d U.S. Infantry Fife and Drum Corps.

The national anthem was presented by the U.S. Army Band.

The color guard saluted the Speaker, faced about, and saluted the House.

The SPEAKER. The color guard will now post the colors.

The flag was posted, and the Members were seated.

The SPEAKER. The invocation will be given by the Reverend James David Ford, Chaplain of the House of Representatives.

The Chaplain, Rev. James David Ford, D.D., offered the following invocation:

With appreciation for Your providence, with gratitude and praise, we thank You, Almighty God, for the blessings given to us and to our Nation in all the time before us.

You have nurtured us and breathed into our souls the very breath of life; You have given direction in the dark days when hope was weak and spirits confused; You have shown the path of truth as a beacon of light; You have redeemed us in forgiveness and pointed the way to righteousness. Gracious God, continue to touch the heart, the mind, the spirit of our Nation that we will be faithful to the high calling You have given, to be the people You would have us be and to do those things that honor You and serve the common good.

Accept our gratitude, O God of wisdom, for the gifts of life and hope that have been the heritage of our Nation. May we continue to know the blessings of order, harmony, and peace and continue in Your way that justice will flow down as waters and righteousness like a mighty stream. This we pray. Amen.

The Doorkeeper announced the House and Senate Journals of the First Federal Congress, and they were carried by the Clerk of the House and the Secretary of the Senate and placed in the well.

The Doorkeeper announced the mace of the House and the gavel of the Senate, and they were carried by the House and Senate Sergeants at Arms and placed in the well.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentlewoman from Louisiana, the Honorable LINDY BOGGS, Chairman of the Commission on the Bicentenary of the House of Representatives. [Applause.]

Mrs. BOGGS. Mr. Speaker, Mr. Vice President, leaders of the House and Senate, Members of the House and Senate, distinguished guests, ladies and gentlemen, it is my great honor to welcome you to this joint meeting in commemoration of the 200th anniversary of Congress. This occasion is a very special part of the celebration of the Bicentennial of Congress, which will be marked by historical publications, ceremonies, exhibits, a special film, and other activities during 1989.

All three branches of the Federal Government trace their beginnings to 1789, but it was Congress which assembled first, and successfully launched the United States of America. So, it is fitting that the first branch assemble on this day in recognition of the noble work of our predecessors and in anticipation of the events yet to come that will celebrate the executive and judicial branches.

As today's ceremony began, officers of the House and Senate brought into the Chamber some special objects that are dear to Congress. The two Journals, one for the House and one for the Senate, contain the record of the beginning of Congress in 1789. Each legislative day for the past two centuries the House and Senate have recorded their actions and formally approved their Journals. They represent our beginnings as a legislature, and they are symbols of the unbroken record of two centuries of representative government under the U.S. Constitution.

These two particular copies of the Journals were George Washington's personal copies and they are kept at the National Archives.

The mace of the House of Representatives, a silver eagle atop a silver globe of the world, supported by 13 ebony rods, each representing one of the Original Thirteen States, is a symbol of authority of the House.

This particular mace has been used since 1841, and is always in the Chamber when the House is in session.

The ivory gavel is one of the great treasures of the Senate. According to tradition, John Adams, the Nation's first Vice President, used the gavel at the first session of the Senate in 1789. Thomas Jefferson may have used this same gavel to call the Senate to order when he was Vice President of the United States and President of the Senate from 1797 to 1801. Jefferson compiled his Manual of Parliamentary Practice to guide him as he presided over the Senate. Those rules are still consulted almost 200 years later.

Behind me on the Speaker's desk sits an old silver inkwell that has been in the House for at least 168 years. It appears in a portrait of Henry Clay of Kentucky painted in 1821. Clay was the first great Speaker of the House, and went on to a distinguished career as one of the greatest U.S. Senators in history.

We have gathered these volumes and these special artifacts to remind us of the past and to show the continuity of the traditions of Congress, traditions which are as strong today as they were in the past.

It is my great pleasure to introduce to you Senator ROBERT C. BYRD, the President pro tempore of the Senate and the Chairman of the Senate Bicentennial Commission, who has contributed so much to our understanding of the history and traditions of the Senate. His recently published history of the U.S. Senate is testimony to the great love he has for its traditions and for this great experiment in freedom—the United States of America. Senator ROBERT C. BYRD. [Applause.]

Senator BYRD. Mr. Speaker, Mrs. BOGGS, Members of the 101st Congress, fellow citizens, as Chairman of the Senate Commission on the Bicentennial, it is a privilege and an honor for me to address this joint meeting commemorating the beginning of the First Congress on March 4, 1789.

The ink had only barely dried on the new Constitution which two of the Original Thirteen States had not yet ratified. The newly elected President, George Washington, waited to be sworn into office; nor had the Vice President taken his oath. Neither of the two constitutional officers of Congress, the Speaker of the House and the President pro tempore of the Senate, had been elected. The Cabinet, the Supreme Court, and the entire Federal judiciary remained mere phrases in the Constitution, as yet unformed by legislation.

Members of the First Congress set about to mold the aspiration of the Constitutional Convention into the reality of a government that would unite the separate States into a Nation, a government that would forge the citizens of these States into one people, a government that would preserve domestic tranquility and defend against foreign aggression, a government that would divide power into three branches, with checks and balances among them to prevent any part of it from becoming tyrannical. Moreover, it was a government and a nation that could grow.

In 1791 Congress voted to admit Vermont as the first new State outside the original 13. Over the course of the next two centuries, the Nation expanded across the continent and to the Pacific and into the Pacific. Today a majority of us represent States that not only did not exist in 1789 but also whose areas at that time lay under foreign control. A map of 1789 would show my own State of West Virginia as simply the western region of Virginia, still 74 years and a bloody Civil War away from separate statehood.

Whether those of us in this 101st Congress represent one of the Original Thirteen States or one of the additional 37 States, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, the District of Columbia, and American Samoa, Guam or the Virgin Islands, we share a commonality to our predecessors in the First Congress, and we are here today as a result of the work done by them and by succeeding generations of Senators and Representatives. We have inherited from them the responsibility for making the laws of this Nation, for determining the course today, and into the future centuries. We celebrate 200 years of history, a proud accomplishment of the democratic government and a representative national legislature.

But 200 years is not so long a time. Consider that one Member of the 101st Congress first took his oath during the 74th Congress. CLAUDE PEPPER became a U.S. Senator in November 1936 and served in the Senate until 1952. He became a Member of the House of Representatives in January 1963 and he continues ably and faithfully to represent his district. [Applause.]

Think about his service which began over 50 years ago, fully one-quarter of the two centuries that Congress has existed. CLAUDE PEPPER first took his oath of office as a Senator when Franklin D. Roosevelt was President of the United States, when this Nation was emerging from a devastating depression, and before it had faced global conflict in the Second World War. CLAUDE PEPPER first took his oath of office as a Representative during the Presidency of John F. Kenndy and a far more prosperous Nation was beginning seriously to address problems of poverty and racial inequality and before it faced another terrible war in Southeast Asia. During his span of years in the Congress the United States exploded the first atomic bomb, signed the Nuclear Test Ban Treaty and recently agreed to abolish an entire class of nuclear weapons. We built our first Interstate Highway System, made tremendous strides in national health care and landed men on the Moon and brought them back safely again to their home on Earth.

It is remarkable that one congressional career could encompass so much of our Nation's history, and certainly CLAUDE PEPPER is a remarkable man. Many of the rest of us can look back over our own careers in this Congress and similarly marvel at the momentous events that we have witnessed, the many Presidents with whom we have worked, the significant legislation that we have helped enact. We are all part of the history of this great institution, even those of us who entered Congress for the first time during the 101st Congress and who are still learning their way about the corridors of this magnificent Capitol. These Members, too, will have the opportunity to make history. Perhaps among these Members will be as tenacious a one as CLAUDE PEPPER, who will still be serving in the 126th Congress, 50 years from now.

If one Member among us eventually celebrates the 250th anniversary of the Congress, I ask that member on behalf of all of my colleagues and on behalf of all of our predecessors give our successors this salute: May the Congress of the United States endure forever, may here the people always govern. [Applause.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (presiding). The Chair recognizes the Speaker of the U.S. House of Representatives, Mr. JIM WRIGHT. [Applause.]

Mr. WRIGHT. Two hundred years ago the First Congress came to New York to breathe life into the new Constitution and to make a reality of the dream and promise of representative self-government.

Members of the new Congress arriving in New York were greeted by flags, musical salutes, church bells, and the roar of cannon. They, as well as the crowds that greeted them, were keenly aware that they were plowing new ground. They were attempting to create something unique in history. Madison said, "We are in a wilderness without a single footprint to guide us."

There were 59 Representatives and 22 Senators representing those 11 States which had ratified the new government at that point. Eight of them had served as delegates to the Constitutional Convention. All but two of them had served at some point in public office.

After reviewing the roster of the new Congress, an optimistic George Washington proudly proclaimed that "it will not be inferior to any assembly on Earth." A somewhat less enthusiastic James Madison, on the other hand, seemed to discern in the very distinctions that adorned the names of the Members of the new House a cause for concern because he said, "I see on the list of Representatives a very scanty proportion who will share in the drudgery of business."

The new House did not exactly get off to a running start. Only five States were represented on that first day, March 4, 1789, and it took 25 false attempts over a period of 29 days just to establish a quorum, without which they were unable to elect a Speaker and get down to business.

But get down to business they finally did. Even before George Washington could be inaugurated the new House had taken up the tariff bill to provide the needed revenue to run the new government and to pay off some of the debts that they had accumulated during the Revolutionary War. Oh yes, they already had a national debt. It was so severe in relative terms that Spain, which then owned Florida, was offering to help bail out the new government with cash payments to buy the Carolinas.

That First Congress to its credit and to our lasting benefit accumulated a very impressive legislative record. It gave form to the executive branch of Government by creating the Departments of State, Treasury, War and the Office of the Attorney General. It gave substance to the judicial branch of government by establishing the Supreme Court, a system of lesser Federal courts and establishing a criminal code for the United States.

It began to tie together the thin sprinkling of pioneer settlements scattered along this eastern seaboard into one cohesive Nation by authorizing a system of roads and bridges, trails and navigable streams.

But surely its most celebrated and most enduring contribution to the future was the writing by the First Congress of that lasting testament to individual human liberty, the American Bill of Rights.

Now for 200 years Congress has been a mirror of the Nation—a distillate of our national strengths and weaknesses. Hale Boggs described it as a collection of ordinary men and women grappling with extraordinary problems.

William Redfield said Congress was "a fair cross-section of the people, showing us very much as we are and throwing our faults and virtues into high relief." Samuel Johnson, speaking for the ratification of the Constitution before the North Carolina Convention, sought to describe the quality and character of those Representatives whose election had been mandated by the Constitution. He said, "They are to be bone of our bone, flesh of our flesh."

In all of this the U.S. Congress is probably the most fascinatingly human institution in the world. It is beyond question the most criticized legislative assembly on Earth, and still the most honored. It can rise to heights of sparkling statesmanship, and it can sink to levels of crass mediocrity. In both postures it is supremely interesting precisely because it is human. The story of Congress is the story of people.

We were visited in 1831 by a distinguished French aristocrat named Alexis de Tocqueville who later wrote about American democracy. De Tocqueville was grandly impressed by the intellectual caliber of people in the Senate who at that time were not directly elected by the public, but rather chosen by State legislatures. But he was negatively impressed by the quality that he discerned in the House. He spoke of our "vulgarity and poverty of talent." These characteristics which he thought created a general worthlessness to the House of Representatives, de Tocqueville attributed to the fact that its Members were directly elected, democratically, by the people. That French nobleman boldly prophesied that, unless the method of choosing Representatives was changed, this American Republic stood under the doom of "perishing miserably among the shoals of democracy." Well, that was 158 years ago.

In 1925, the House Speaker, Nicholas Longworth, philosophically opined that "from the beginning of the Republic it has been the duty of every freeborn voter to look down upon us and the duty of every freeborn humorist to make jokes about us." He may have had in mind Mark Twain who, a quarter Century earlier, commented that America had no distinctive indigenous criminal class—"except, of course for the Congress."

Even so, the Congress—called by Thomas Jefferson "the great commanding theater of the Nation," by another historian, the grand repository of the democratic principle, the butt of cartoonists, crusaders, and comedians alike—has endured for 200 years as the fulcrum of our system of representative self-government.

In this tripartite system, Congress sometimes has been overshadowed by a charismatic executive. Yet the Congress has managed in all circumstances to muddle through, sometimes leading and sometimes lagging, sometimes leaping and sometimes limping.

Toward the end of his career Sam Rayburn once was asked, "How many Presidents have you served under?"

The crusty old Texan snorted and replied, "Huh, I haven't served under any. I've served with eight."

And that system of representative self-government, of which Congress is an integral and indispensable part, with all its faults, and flaws and mortal imperfections, still is—just as it was in Lincoln's time, and may it forever remain—the last best hope of the Earth. [Applause.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Maine, the Honorable GEORGE MITCHELL, the majority leader of the U.S. Senate. [Applause.]

Senator MITCHELL. Mr. Speaker, Mr. President, Members of Congress, and distinguished guests, this is a new experience for me which I think I am enjoying. When we leave here, the Senate will commence debate on the Tower nomination. A month ago, when the pay raise controversey was at its height, a Republican colleague of mine in the Senate came over to me, put his arm on my shoulder and said, "Look at it this way. It can't get any worse."

In 1830, John Quincy Adams was elected to the House of Representatives. He had previously served as an ambassador, as Secretary of State, and as President, yet he wrote of his election to the House, "My election as President of the United States was not half so gratifying." His sentiments were understood by the people of his time, but they would not be understood by the people of our time.

In the 20th century, and especially in the age of television, many, if not most, Americans have come to view the executive as the primary branch of government. That was not intended by the Members who wrote the Constitution. The Constitution's first article which describes the powers of Congress is longer than the other seven articles combined, and that is why Congress is called the first branch of Government. I do not claim that Congress is the primary branch, but I do remind all that it is a coequal branch of Government.

Indeed an independent legislature is a distinguishing feature of democracy. All forms of government have executives. In totalitarian societies that is usually all there is. Where legislatures exist in those societies they are merely tokens, wholly subservient to the executive.

This 101st Congress is part of the most successful effort at self-government in all of human history. The brilliant success of the Founding Fathers is evidenced in the fact that in our two centuries of history we have had 41 presidents and no kings. No institution has contributed more to that happy result than the Congress.

Together the two Houses of Congress enact all legislation. Together they can override Presidential vetoes. The House originates revenue bills. The Senate's advice and consent is necessary for the ratification of treaties. The Constitution entrusts Congress with the power to tax, to provide for the common defense and general welfare. The Congress has the authority to regulate commerce, to establish a judicial system, to declare war, to raise and support the Army and the Navy.

With that broad authority comes great responsibility. It is our responsibility to use the power with which we have been entrusted for the common good.

As we enter the third century of our institution, we can do no better than to recall the words of one of the great past Members of Congress to whom the Speaker has already alluded, his predecessor, Sam Rayburn, who in his first speech in the House said:

> It is now my sole purpose here to help enact such wise and just laws that our common country will by virtue of those laws be a happier and more prosperous country. I have always dreamed of a country which I believe this will and could be. That is one in which the citizenship is an educated and patriotic people, not swayed by passion or prejudice, a country that shall know no East, no West, no North, no South, but inhabited by a people, liberty-loving, patriotic, happy and prosperous, with its lawmakers having no other purpose than to write such just laws as shall in years to come be of service to humankind yet unborn.

To some, Sam Rayburn's objective may sound naive and so idealistic as to be impossible of attaining. To me, even recognizing the failings from which we as humans suffer, they are noble objectives for which we should always strive.

Thank you very much. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Washington, the Honorable THOMAS S. FOLEY, majority leader of the U.S. House of Representatives. [Applause.]

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, Mr. President pro tempore, Members of the Congress, distinguished guests, ladies and gentlemen, when the crowds cheered and cannons roared, as Speaker WRIGHT has said, on the First Congress' meeting in New York on March 4, 1789, the quarters which they were to inhabit were not yet finished, causing them to convene in makeshift circumstances. The first Members were planters and merchants and, as today, about a third of them were lawyers. There were, Chaplain Ford, a few clergymen as Members as well. Despite a slow and rather disappointing start to their work, they obtained a brilliant conclusion. Allowing Fisher Ames, a Member of the First Congress, to say of his colleagues that they were "on the whole, very good men, not shining, but honest and reasonably well informed."

Congressional terms overlap; individuals come and go—sometimes without much fanfare. Influences change, recede. I believe, however, I speak for the more than 10,000 of us who have served in the House of Representatives and over 11,000 who have served in the Congress, in saying that for most of us it has been the greatest pride and honor of our lives.

As Senator MITCHELL indicated, John Quincy Adams returned to serve in the House of Representatives after being President of the United States considering it a great honor to do so. According to the 63-year-old Mr. Adams, "No election or appointment conferred upon me ever gave me so much pleasure." Yet, in addition to being President, he had, before he came to the House of Representatives, been at the age of 14 a diplomatic secretary in the court of Russia's Catherine II, at 28 a minister to The Hague, and minister plenipotentiary to Russia at the time of Czar Alexander I. He saw Napoleon return to Paris from Elba, served as Secretary of State under President Monroe, then a U.S. Senator, President, and finally Member of the House.

In this body, we have had over 10,000 Members. While many of them have gone from the House to the Senate, I would note that some of our greatest Members, John Quincy Adams and CLAUDE PEPPER, have done it the other way around. [Applause.]

With the great honor of being a Member of Congress has come throughout the years of our history close scrutiny and criticism, both individually and as an institution. That is appropriate, because the great pride of our service is that unlike great Cabinet officers or judges, we are here not by the appointment of the President, but by the election of the people.

The Congress has changed dramatically over the years with the coming of radio and television. It is perhaps the most closely followed branch of our Government, clearly the most observed and commented upon. We are the only branch of Government that conducts its day-to-day business not only under the scrutiny of television, but in an almost verbatim RECORD. While the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD will perhaps never appear on the best-seller list, it does lay open to the American people, as does television coverage, the business that goes on here, their business.

We have perhaps the longest-standing continuous assembly in the world, along with that of Great Britain and its Commonwealth. But it is perhaps only here that Members have an opportunity from the very first day of their service to participate directly in the affairs of the institution and to have the opportunity to actively serve the people of their State or their district in an immediate way.

We are, unfortunately, sometimes victims of the perception that the business of the Congress is somewhat disorderly and confused. This is because the business of making legislation is also the business of compromise and adjustment. That is not always understood. Although it is considered by some to be making a "deal" or trading away principles, it is, when done with principle, the most compelling and important of public business.

"The Congress," Woodrow Wilson said, "has been both extravagantly praised and unreasonably disparaged, according to the predisposition and temper of its various critics. The truth is," he said, "in this case as in so many others, something quite commonplace and practical. The Congress is just what the mode of its election and the conditions of public life in this country make it."

When the First Congress completed its work in 1789, it had, as the Speaker indicated, a brilliant, almost unequalled results, to the point that journalists and other observers of the day in commenting on its achievements, decided that they had been truly phenomenal.

A friend wrote to Vice President Adams that "In no nation, by no legislature, was ever so much done in so short a period for the establishment of government, order and public credit and generally tranquillity."

At the end of my first session of Congress, the 89th Congress, our late great colleague, Hale Boggs, quoted Fisher Ames and concluded that he believed that his was a very apt description of Congress because "we come from the people, and we are of the people, and, thank God, we have a system that makes that possible."

We can all echo that prayer of gratitude today. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The U.S. Army Band will now perform America the Beautiful.

The U.S. Army Band presented a musical interlude.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the distinguished gentleman from Illinois, the Honorable ROBERT H. MICHEL, minority leader of the U.S. House of Representatives. [Applause.]

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, Mr. President pro tempore, Mr. Chief Justice, my distinguished colleagues, ladies and gentlemen, that spirited rendition of "America the Beautiful" speaks of our national natural wonders of this great land, its spacious skies, its waving fields of grain and purple mountains' majesties, but I guess equally as beautiful is our legacy of self-government because it is a beauty we have created for ourselves. With God's help and our own help we have drafted a way of living together in community guided by the ideals of justice and equality before the law. Nothing beneath the spacious skies is more beautiful than human beings working out their destiny in freedom. In that sense our country has for 200 years indeed been America the beautiful, and Congress is a major part of that creation.

One of the most gratifying events in each session of Congress is the return of former Members to this Chamber. It is a special day for all of us filled with memories. The continuity and the tradition of this great institution are embodied in our welcome of old friends and colleagues, and today in a similar spirit we are gathered in honor of our former Members of Congress, the 65 Representatives and the 26 Senators who made up that very first Congress.

It is difficult for us to think of them as colleagues. We are, after all, separated by 200 years. We can no longer see them as they are. They have become a legend, and it is the legend we see.

In one sense it is good that we have this legend. A nation needs its legends as much as it needs its heroes, but it is good for us to recall today that the Congressmen with discern across the chasm of years were also creatures of flesh and blood, not the demagogues of legend. They had to make the same kinds of decisions that we have to make, they had to answer the same questions:

Will it be yea or nay on this vote? Shall I compromise or shall I fight? How can I balance the desires of my constituents with the harsh necessities of governing?

And like us and like all those who came after them, they had to work for ideal political goals with rather imperfect human abilities.

I can remember when I first came to this House, I looked with awe at Speaker Sam Rayburn and Joe Martin and Senators Everett Dirksen and Dick Russell over on the other side, and so many others, and now I find myself a veteran of the legislative wars. I might tend to think I have become all too sophisticated, not easily impressed, but today once again I feel that sense of awe and humility as we commemorate the giants of the First Congress.

In this ceremony we stretch forth our hand to them as colleagues across the centuries, and we say to them, "If we have not matched your record of accomplishment, we hope at least we have been worthy of your trust. And separated by time, but united in duty, we say to Daniel Carroll, of Maryland, to George Thatcher, of Massachusetts, and to Speaker Frederick Muhlenberg of Pennsylvania and all the rest, honored congressional colleagues:" thank you for your sacrifices and your achievements. Because of you our country is truly America the beautiful.

Now I have an introduction to make. If I may paraphrase one of our former congressisonal colleagues, the Members of the First Congress left us a legacy far above our power to add or detract by our record, and at this point in our celebration, therefore, what we need is not more congressional prose, but the fiery, living truth of great poetry.

We are very fortunate indeed to have with us today the Poet Laureate Howard Nemerov. His work has been described as modern sensibility with classic elegance. He has been the recipient of the Pulitzer Prize, the National Book Award, the National Medal of Arts and, among other recognitions, the prestigious Bollingen Prize for poetry in 1981. He is also a novelist, essayist, critic and teacher, a consultant to the Library of Congress, and a distinguished professor of English at Washington University in St. Louis.

Now, if these achievements were his only contribution to our civilization, he could be content, but he made another kind of commitment. During World War II he flew more than 100 combat missions with the Royal Air Force and later with the U.S. Air Force.

Howard Nemerov was once asked about the problem of poetic inspiration, and he said, "The impulse comes from unexpected oddities." Unexpected oddities sounds much like what goes on in some of our debates, so he should feel right at home here on this floor of the House.

Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen, it is my pleasure to introduce the Poet Laureate of the United States, Howard Nemerov. [Applause.]

Mr. NEMEROV. Well, this is going to be an anticlimax; isn't it, after an introduction like that?

TO THE CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES ENTERING ITS THIRD CENTURY, WITH PREFACE

Because reverence has never been America's thing, this verse in your honor will not begin "O thou." But the great respect our country has to give may you all continue to deserve, and have.

Here at the fulcrum of us all,
The feather of truth against the soul
Is weighed, and had better be found to balance
Lest our enterprise collapse in silence.

For here the million varying wills
Get melted down, get hammered out
Until the movie's reduced to stills
That tell us what the law's about.

Conflict's endemic in the mind:
Your job's to hear it in the wind
And compass it in opposites,
And bring the antagonists by your wits.

To being one, and that the law
Thenceforth, until you change your minds
Against and with the shifting winds
That this and that way blow the straw.

So it's a republic, as Franklin said,
If you can keep it; and we did
Thus far, and hope to keep our quarrel
Funny and just, though with this moral:

Praise without end for the go-ahead zeal
Of whoever it was invented the wheel;
But never a word for the poor soul's sake
That thought ahead, and invented the brake.

—26 ii 89.

[Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Kansas, the Honorable BOB DOLE, minority leader of the U.S. Senate. [Applause.]

Senator DOLE. Mr. President pro tempore, Mr. Speaker, my colleagues in the House and Senate, this morning we have all paused from our normal legislative pressing business, which is not too pressing these days, to commemorate the 200th anniversary of the U.S. Congress, and this is a rare, special occasion because as an institution we focus so much on today and tomorrow that sometimes it is difficult to find time to reflect on yesterday. So today for a few moments we are doing that, and that is a shame because, as Members of Congress, we are surrounded by reminders of men and women who preceded us. We sit at their desks, we occupy their offices, we carry on their traditions, and we have much to learn from them.

During the last Congress I delivered a series of Bicentennial minutes offering vignettes on important or colorful or unusual events that happened in the Senate's history. While putting these together, I was repeatedly surprised to find Members of Congress wrestling with issues 100 and even 200 years ago that were as current as the headlines in today's newspapers. As the Speaker said, we were confronting Federal deficits. They were struggling with pay raises or helping a President get his nominees confirmed, and I find examples demonstrating that we have been doing it for 200 years.

Take today's joint gathering. In a sense it has been stated previously that this really commemorates today the first absence of the quorum because, although we officially began on March 4, 1789, they could not get a quorum, and we did not have the first real joint meeting until April 6, 1789. On that first occasion Members of the House walked up to the Senate Chamber in New York Federal Hall to count the electoral votes confirming George Washington's election as President.

The last joint session, prior to today's joint meeting, took place a month ago when Members of the Senate walked through the Capitol of the House Chamber to hear President George Bush. During the two centuries in between joint meetings, we have heard Presidents, kings, prime ministers, admirals, and astronauts. In the past here stood Winston Churchill, Chester Nimitz, Carl Sandburg, Charles deGaulle, Neil Armstrong, Anwar Sadat, and Margaret Thatcher. Here Gen. Douglas MacArthur told a joint meeting in Congress that "old soldiers never die, they just fade away." Those were memorable moments in our history.

Beyond such out-of-the-ordinary events as joint meetings, 1989 will mark the 200th anniversary of many of Congress' everyday routines. It was in 1789 that the House and Senate appointed their first committees, convened their first conference committees, elected their first officers, adopted their first rules, wrote and took their first oaths of office and enacted their first legislation, confirmed their first nomination, and established the first Cabinet officers thereby beginning their first oversight of executive agencies.

Today, if you wonder why the clerks of the Senate and the House bow when they deliver bills and messages in each House, that was prescribed by the First Congress. If you ever wonder why we formally address our Chief Executive as the President of the United States of America, the First Congress decided that.

The first choice, by the way, of a special Senate Committee on Titles was: His Highness, President of the United States of America and Protector of the Rights of the Same. That is the title I was leaning to until New Hampshire.

The House Chaplain who opened this session with a prayer and the Senate Chaplain who will close it are the successors of Chaplains chosen by the First Congress. So, too, are the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House who presented the first Journals of Congress, Journals which are still being recorded by our clerks today.

About the only job you would not have found in that First Congress was mine, or GEORGE MITCHELL'S or BOB MICHEL'S or TOM FOLEY'S. There were no party leaders in the First Congress because there were no political parties. With parties and party offices coming later, it reminds us that we are constantly adding to the history of this institution. We build on foundations laid before us as others will build upon what we leave behind.

Perhaps the best that can come out of our celebrations of Congress' yesterdays is a greater awareness of how much the past has shaped us and how much we can help shape America's tomorrow.

Now I have the pleasure of introducing an outstanding American, a very special guest speaker, David McCullough. David is well known to us in the Senate, who debated the Panama Canal, the Panama Canal treaties of 1978. A dog-eared copy of his book on the creation of the Panama Canal, "The Path Between the Seas," rested on the table in the well of the Senate and was consulted extensively by those on both sides of that heated issue. That book won the National Book Award for history. His most recent book, a biography of Theodore Roosevelt entitled "Mornings on Horseback" won the American Book Award. He is a narrator of the forthcoming CBS documentary produced in honor of the congressional bicentennial.

I am honored and proud to present David McCullough. [Applause.]

Mr. McCULLOUGH. Mr. Speaker, Mr. Vice President, Senator DOLE, Members of the 101st Congress, ladies and gentlemen. For a private citizen to be asked to speak before Congress is a rare and very high honor and I thank you.

Simon Willard was never a Member of Congress in the usual sense. Simon Willard of Roxbury, MA, was a clockmaker early in the 19th century and he did it all by hand and by eye.

"In cutting his wheel teeth," reads an old account, "he did not mark out the spaces on the blank [brass] wheel and cut the teeth to measure, but he cut, rounded up and finished the teeth as he went along, using his eye only in spacing, and always came out even. * * *

"It is doubtful," the old account continues, "if such a feat in mechanics was ever done before, and certainly never since."

The exact date is uncertain, but about 1837, when he was in his eighties, Simon Willard made a most important clock. I will come back to that.

On a June afternoon in 1775, before there was a Congress of the United States, a small boy stood with his mother on a distant knoll, watching the battle of Bunker Hill. That was Adams, John Quincy Adams, diplomat, Senator, Secretary of State, and President, who in his lifetime had seen more, contributed more to the history of his time than almost anyone and who, as no former President ever had, returned here to the Hill to take a seat in the House of Representatives, in the 22d Congress, and thrilled at the prospect. And it was here that this extraordinary American had his finest hours.

Adams took his seat in the old House—in what is now Statuary Hall—in 1831. Small, fragile, fearing no one, he spoke his mind and his conscience. He championed mechanical "improvements" and scientific inquiry. To no one in Congress are we so indebted for the establishment of the Smithsonian Institution. With Congressman Lincoln of Illinois and Corwin of Ohio, he cried out against the Mexican War, and for 8 long years, almost alone, he battled the infamous gag rule imposed by southerners to prevent any discussion of petitions against slavery. Adams halted slavery, but was fighting, he said, more for the unlimited right of all citizens to have their petitions heard, whatever their cause. It was a gallant fight and he won. The gag rule was permanently removed.

Earlier this year, at the time of the inaugural ceremonies, I heard a television commentator broadcasting from Statuary Hall complain of the resonance and echoes in the room. What resonance. What echoes.

John Quincy Adams is a reminder that giants come in all shapes and sizes and that, at times, they have walked these halls, their voices have been heard, their spirit felt here. Listen, please, to this from his diary, from March 29, 1841:

> The world, the flesh, and all the devils in hell are arrayed against any man who now in this North American Union shall dare to join the standard of Almighty God to put down the African slave trade; and what can I, upon the verge of my seventy-fourth birthday, with a shaking hand, a darkening eye, a drowsy brain, and with all my faculties dropping from me one by one, as the teeth are dropping from my head—what can I do for the cause of God and man. * * * Yet my conscience presses me on; let me but die upon the breach.

And how he loved the House of Representatives:

> The forms and proceedings of the House [he writes], this call of the State for petitions, the colossal emblem of the Union over the Speaker's chair, this historic Muse at the clock, the echoing pillars of the hall, the tripping Mercuries who bear the resolutions and amendments between the members and the chair, the calls of ayes and noes, with the different intonations of the answers, from different voices, the gobbling manner of the clerk in reading over the names, the tone of the Speaker in announcing the vote, and the varied shades of pleasure and pain in the countenances of the members on hearing it, would form a fine subject for a descriptive poem.

Some nights he returned to his lodgings so exhausted he could barely crawl up the stairs. In the winter of 1848, at age 80, after 17 years in Congress, Adams collapsed at his desk. A brass plate in the floor of Statutory Hall marks the place.

He was carried to the Speaker's office and there, 2 days later he died. At the end Henry Clay in tears was holding his hand. Congressman Lincoln helped with the funeral arrangements. Daniel Webster wrote the inscription for the casket.

Many splendid books have been written about Congress: Harry McPherson's "A Political Education," Allen Drury's "A Senate Journal," Alvin Josephy's "On the Hill" and "Kings of the Hill" by Representative RICHARD CHENEY and Lynne V. Cheney; "Rayburn," a fine recent biography by D.B. Hardeman and Donald Bacon, and "the Great Triumvirate," about Clay, Webster, and Calhoun, by Merrill Peterson. Now, in this Bicentennial year, comes volume one of Senator ROBERT BYRD'S monumental history of the Senate.

But a book that does justice to the story of Adams' years in the House, one of the vivid chapters in our political history, is still waiting to be written, as are so many others.

Our knowledge, our appreciation, of the history of Congress and those who have made history here are curiously, regrettably deficient. The plain truth is historians and biographers have largely neglected the subject. Two hundred years after the creation of Congress, we have only begun to tell the story of Congress—which, of course, means the opportunity for those who write and who teach could not be greater.

There are no substantial, up-to-date biographies of Justin Morrill of Vermont, author of the Land Grant College Act; or Jimmy Byrnes, considered the most skillful politician of his day; or Joe Robinson, the tenacious Democratic majority leader whose sudden death in an apartment not far from here meant defeat for Franklin Roosevelt's court-packing scheme; or Carl Hayden of Arizona, who served longer in the Senate than anybody, 41 years.

We have John Garraty's life of Henry Cabot Lodge, Sr., but none of Henry Cabot Lodge, Jr. Search the library shelves for a good biography of Alben Barkley or Speaker Joe Martin and you won't find one. They don't exist. The only biography of Senator Arthur Vandenberg ends in 1945, when his career was just taking off.

The 20th century Senator who has been written about most is Joe McCarthy. There are a dozen books about McCarthy. Yet there is no biography of the Senator who had the backbone to stand up to him first—Margaret Chase Smith.

"I speak as a Republican," she said on that memorable day in the Senate. "I speak as a woman. I speak as a United States Senator. I speak as an American. I don't want to see the Republican Party ride to political victory on the four horsemen of calumny—fear, ignorance, bigotry and smear."

We have books on people like Bilbo and Huey Long, but no real biographies of George Aiken or Frank Church.

Richard Russell of Georgia, one of the most highly regarded, influential figures to serve in the Senate in this century, used to take home old bound copies of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, to read in the evenings for pleasure. He loved the extended debates and orations of older times and would remark to his staff how strange it made him feel to realize that those who had once counted for so much and so effected the course of American life, were entirely forgotten.

You wonder how many who pour in and out of the Russell Building each day, or the Cannon Building, have any notion who Richard Russell was? Or Joseph Gurney Cannon? There is no adequate biography of either man.

As Speaker of the House and head of the Rules Committee, Uncle Joe Cannon, of Danville, IL, once wielded power here of a kind unimaginable today. He was tough, shrewd, profane, picturesque, and a terrible stumbling block. It was the new 20th century. The country wanted change, reform. Uncle Joe did not. "Everything is all right out west and around Danville," he would say. "The country don't need any legislation."

When a bill came up to add a new function to the U.S. Commission of Fish and Fisheries, making it the U.S. Commission of Fish and Fisheries and Birds, Cannon protested. He didn't like adding "and Birds" * * * "and Birds" was new and different and therefore unacceptable.

The insurrection that ended Cannon's iron rule, a revolt here in this Chamber in 1910, was led by George Norris, of Red Willow County, NE. There have been few better men in public life than George Norris and few more important turning points in our political history. Yet today it is hardly known.

How much more we need to know about the First Congress when everything was new and untried.

How much we could learn from a history of the Foreign Relations Committee.

Imagine the book that could be written about the Senate in the momentous years of the New Deal. Think of the changes brought about then. Think of who was in the Senate—Robert Wagner, Burton K. Wheeler, Hugo Black, CLAUDE PEPPER, Barkley, Huey Long, Tom Connally, Vandenberg, Taft, George Norris, Borah of Idaho, and J. Hamilton Lewis, of Illinois, a politician of the old school who still wore wing collars and spats and a pink toupee to match his pink Vandyke whiskers.

It was "Ham" Lewis who advised a newly arrived freshman Senator named Truman from Missouri, "Harry, don't start out with an inferiority complex. For the first 6 months you'll wonder how the hell you got here, and after that you'll wonder how the hell the rest of us got here."

For some unaccountable reason, there is not even a first-rate history of the Capitol, nothing comparable say, to William Seale's history of the White House. This magnificent building grew in stages, as America grew. It is really an assembly of different buildings, representative of different times, different aspirations, and the story should be told that way.

We are all so accustomed to seeing our history measured and defined by the Presidency that we forget how much of the story of the country happened here.

Beside Congress, the Presidency seems clear, orderly, easy to understand. The protagonists are relatively few in number and take their turns on stage one at a time.

Congress, by contrast, seems to roll on like a river. Someone said you can never cross the same river twice. Congress is like that—always there and always changing. Individuals come and go, terms overlap. The stage is constantly crowded. The talk and the rumpus go on and on. And there is such a lot of humbug and so much that has been so overwhelmingly boring.

But let no one misunderstand, and least of all you who serve here, we have as much reason to take pride in Congress as in any institution in our system. A history abundantly shows, Congress, for all its faults, has not been the unbroken parade of clowns and thieves and posturing windbags so often portrayed. We make sport of Congress, belittle it, bewail its ineptitudes and inefficiency. We have from the beginning, and probably we always will. You do it yourselves, particularly at election time. But what should be spoken of more often, and more widely understood, are the great victories that have been won here, the decisions of courage and vision achieved, the men and women of high purpose and integrity, and, yes, at times genius, who have served here.

It was Congress after all that provided the Homestead Act, ended slavery, ended child labor, built the railroads, built the Panama Canal, the Interstate Highway System. It was Congress that paid for Lewis and Clark and for our own travels to the Moon. It was Congress that changed the course of history with lend lease and the Marshall plan, that created Social Security, TVA, the GI bill, the Voting Rights Act, and the incomparable Library of Congress.

It is not by chance that we Americans have built here on our Capitol Hill, side-by-side with the center of Government, our greatest library, a free and open repository of books and without limit on viewpoint, in every language, from every part of the world.

In 200 years, 11,220 men and women have served in the House and Senate, and while the proportions of black Americans, of women, of Hispanic and Asian Americans, and native Americans have not, and do not now, reflect the country at large, it is nonetheless the place where all our voices are heard. Here, as they say—here as perhaps we cannot say too often—the people rule.

We need to know more about Congress. We need to know more about Congress because we need to know more about leadership. And about human nature.

We may also pick up some ideas.

Considering the way defense spending has been handled in recent years, we might, for example, think of reinstating an investigating committee like the Truman Committee of World War II, which saved billions of dollars and thousands of lives.

If we are unwilling to vote the taxes to pay for the war on drugs, to save our country, why not sell bonds as we did in two world wars? It is hard to imagine anyone not wanting to buy a bond to win the war on drugs.

Above all we need to know more about Congress because we are Americans. We believe in governing ourselves.

The boy should read history, the first John Adams wrote to his wife Abigail about the education of their son, John Quincy. History. History. History. We must all read history, and write and publish and teach history better.

How can we know who we are and where we are headed if we don't know where we have come from? How can we call ourselves patriots if we know little of our country's past?

Who were those people in the old bound volumes of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD? What moved them? What did they know that we do not?

Our past is not only prolog, it can be bracing. In Emerson's words, "The world is young: the former great men [and women] call to us affectionately."

I have decided that the digital watch is the perfect symbol of an imbalance in outlook in our day. It tells us only what time it is now, at this instant, as if that were all anyone would wish or need to know. Which brings me back to Simon Willard.

In the years when the House of Representatives met in Statuary Hall, all deliberations were watched over by the muse of history, Clio. She is there still over the north doorway. She is riding the winged "Car of History," as it is called, keeping note in her book. The idea was that those who sat below would take inspiration from her. They would be reminded that they too were part of history, that their words and actions would face the judgment of history, and that they could count themselves part of an honorable heritage.

Clio and the Car of History are by the Italian sculptor Carlo Franzoni of Carrara. The clock in the foreground is by Simon Willard. It was, as I said, installed about 1837. Its inner workings, cut freehand by Simon Willard, ticked off the minutes and hours through debate over the Gag Rule, the annexation of Texas, the Mexican War, tariffs, postal service, the establishment of the Naval Academy, statehood for Arkansas, Michigan, Wisconsin, matters related to immigration, the Gold Rush, statehood for California, the fateful Kansas-Nebraska Act, and the final hours of John Quincy Adams.

It is also a clock with two hands and an old-fashioned face, the kind that shows what time it is now * * * what time it used to be * * * and what time it will become.

And it still keeps time.

On we go. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. It is my privilege to present soloists of the U.S. Army Band, Sfc. Will Shead and Sfc. Evelyn Yount, who will perform a patriotic note.

Sfc. Will Shead and Sfc. Evelyn Yount presented a musical interlude.

The SPEAKER, The Chair at this time would like to recognize Mr. Anthony Frank, the Postmaster General of the United States, who will introduce to Members the special congressional postage stamps that will be issued in commemoration of the Bicentennial of Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, good morning, women and men of the Congress. It is appropriate that the Postal Service pay tribute to the Congress and the legacy of leadership, not just because my last name is "Frank."

Both our organizations hold the public trust. We deliver America's mail, 500 million pieces a day, 6 days a week. You deliver the promise of the Constitution. You have been chosen by and you speak for the people. For 200 years, you have represented our interests, defended our rights protected our freedoms.

Today we will have a preview of the two new commemorative stamps dealing with this bicentennial which will be issued commencing in April. Interestingly, the subject for the House of Representatives stamp features the 1890 marble structure which Dr. McCullough just described to us, referred to as the "car of History." It is on display in Statuary Hall. Clio the muse stands in the winged chariot of time recording events as they occur.

I would like Mrs. BOGGS to help me in unveiling the U.S. House of Representatives stamp.

(Mrs. BOGGS assisted in unveiling the U.S. House of Representatives stamp.)

Mr. FRANK. The Senate stamp features the carved gilded eagle and shield located on the Vice President's chair in the old Senate Chamber. I would like Senator LUGAR to join me in unveiling the U.S. Senate stamp.

(Senator LUGAR assisted in unveiling the U.S. Senate stamp.)

[Applause.]

Mr. FRANK. Next month, on the 4th and 6th of April, millions of these stamps will be transporting mail around the world, and may they serve as a small but powerful symbol of democracy of leadership of America.

Thank you. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER, The Chair at this time would like to recognize the Honorable Nicholas Brady, Secretary of the Department of the Treasury, who will introduce to us the special congressional coins that will be issued in commemoration of the Bicentennial of Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. BRADY. Mr. Speaker, Mr. President, distinguished Members, and friends, I am honored to address this joint meeting of the Congress marking the 200th anniversary of the first meeting of Congress.

It is a special privilege for me, having been a Member of Congress, to return on such a wonderful moment in history. I am here this morning to introduce the designs that will appear on the coins commemorating the Bicentennial of the Congress. These coins will celebrate 200 years of the great American experiment in democracy. The coins will honor the Congress and at the same time provide funds to be utilized by the U.S. Capitol Preservation Commission for improvements to the restoration of the Capitol. Designs for the three coins were chosen from among the designs submitted by 18 sculpture engravers who provided 110 designs for us to choose from. The designs embody the traditions and the symbols cherished by our forefathers. The U.S. Capitol is recognized throughout the world as a symbol of democracy and freedom. The $5 gold coin depicts the Capitol dome on the obverse, and the gilded eagle in the old Senate Chamber on the reverse. The silver dollar portrays the statue of freedom which reigns atop the Capitol dome on the obverse, and with the House mace the reverse side of the coin is designated. The clad half dollar includes the head of freedom on the obverse and the full Capitol on the reverse.

These designs are the artists' renderings that will be transferred in sculpturings that will be used to mint the coins. I would like to send to each of the Members an invitation to participate in the first ceremony which will take place later in the spring of the striking of these coins. The U.S. Department of the Treasury is very proud to be a part of this wonderful celebration.

Mr. Speaker, with your permission, I would like to ask Senator DIXON, Congressman FASCELL, and Congressman ANNUNZIO to come to the well and unveil the drawings. Thank you very much. [Applause.]

The Honorable Nicholas Brady was assisted in the unveiling of the drawings of the coin designs by Senator DIXON and Representatives FASCELL and ANNUNZIO. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The stamp and coin designs will be available for viewing in the Speaker's lobby after today's ceremony.

Now we will rise for the benediction which will be spoken by the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, Chaplain of the Senate.

The Chaplain of the Senate, Rev. Richard C. Halverson, L.I.D., D.D., offered the following benediction:

Eternal Father, thank You for the legacy that is ours, for the giants of the past and the giants that are here today. Grant us, people and politician, the will and the wisdom to be faithful. The Lord bless you and keep you. The Lord make His face to shine upon you and to be gracious unto you. The Lord lift up His countenance upon you and give you His peace. Amen.

The SPEAKER. Members and guests will remain standing for the retirement of the colors.

The color guard retired the colors.

The SPEAKER. The Chair declares the joint meeting dissolved. The House will continue in recess until approximately 12 noon.

The honored guests, and the Members of the Senate retired from the Chamber.

At 11 o'clock and 44 minutes a.m., the proceedings in commemoration of the Bicentennial of the U.S. Congress were concluded.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the business in order under the Calendar Wednesday rule be dispensed with on Wednesday, March 8, 1989.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

ELECTION OF MEMBER TO COMMITTEE ON HOUSE ADMINISTRATION

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Republican Conference, I offer a privileged resolution (H. Res. 100) and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

H. RES. 100

Resolved, That Representative Walsh of New York be and is hereby elected to the Committee on House Administration.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

COMMENDING APPOINTMENT OF ROBERT D. REISCHAUER AS DIRECTOR OF CONGRESSIONAL BUDGET OFFICE

(Mr. PANETTA asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Speaker, I wish to rise in commendation for the appointment of Robert D. Reischauer as Director of the Congressional Budget Office.

The recommendation of the Committee on the Budget both by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. FRENZEL], who is my ranking minority member, and myself was that Mr. Reischauer should be appointed to that position. The Senate concurred in that appointment.

Mr. Speaker, he brings a very long and distinguished career in the Congressional Budget Office to bear as the new Director. The Congressional Budget Office is the arm of the Congress that reviews budget numbers. It is essential that we have credible budget numbers both in assumptions and the numbers that we deal with in developing a credible budget resolution.

Mr. Speaker, I think Mr. Reischauer will assist us in that effort, because he brings credibility and qualifications to that job. It has been a long time since we have had a Director of the Congressional Budget Office, and I thank the Speaker and the President pro tempore of the other body for acting quickly and expeditiously to fill that responsible job with a very responsible individual.

CARIBBEAN BASIN ECONOMIC RECOVERY EXPANSION ACT OF 1989

(Mr. GIBBONS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. GIBBONS. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of a broad bipartisan group of this House, I have introduced H.R. 1233, the Caribbean Basin Economic Recovery Expansion Act of 1989.

I will include at the end of my remarks a section-by-section summary explanation of the bill.

Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing, with a bipartisan group of my House colleagues, an important piece of trade legislation designed to expand and improve the Caribbean Basin Initiative or CBI Program. The legislation, entitled the Caribbean Basin Economic Recovery Expansion Act of 1989 and more commonly referred to as CBI-II, would expand the current duty-free treatment for imports from the region and extend trade benefits on a permanent basis in order to promote a stable climate for expanded investment.

As my colleagues are aware, the Caribbean Basin is a crucial region to the United States, and its political and economic stability is a key component of our foreign and national security. Under the Caribbean Basin Economic Recovery Act enacted in 1983, Congress authorized certain unilateral and preferential trade and tax benefits for Caribbean Basin countries and territories. Presently, 22 countries are designated beneficiaries for duty-free access of their exports to the U.S. market until September 30, 1995. The current program exempts from duty-free treatment certain goods produced in CBI countries which are generally regarded as import sensitive in the United States. These exemptions include textiles and apparel subject to textile agreements, footwear, handbags, work gloves, leather flat goods and apparel, certain watches and parts, petroleum, and tuna. The CBI program also provides certain tax benefits, including a convention tax deduction, operation of foreign sales corporations, and the availability of financing for active business investments in those countries that have signed a tax information exchange agreement.

The legislation that we are introducing today is the result of a year-long investigation by the Subcommittee on Oversight of the Committee on Ways and Means under the distinguished leadership of its chairman, JAKE PICKLE, on the impact and effectiveness of the CBI, a series of hearings held by the Subcommittee on Trade on CBI legislation introduced in the 100th Congress (H.R. 3101), and consultations with representatives of the Caribbean countries and major U.S. industries involved. The bill expands the duty-free treatment granted to imports from the region and includes a number of other recommendations to improve the effectiveness of the program. At the same time, several of the more controversial provisions in H.R. 3101 have been removed or modified to address concerns raised by the domestic textile and sugar industries.

I will briefly mention a few major provisions of the bill:

First, the bill allows limited duty-free treatment for articles from the Caribbean currently exempt from the program. Second, the bill sets a minimum quota floor and quota reallocations for sugar imports from the region. Third, the bill increases the duty-free allowance for tourists returning from the Caribbean from $400 to $600. Fourth, the bill creates a separate cumulation determination for imports from the Caribbean for determining injury in antidumping and countervailing duty cases. Fifth, the bill establishes a Pilot Customs Preclearance Program. And finally, the bill repeals the 1995 termination date on duty-free treatment of imports from the region.

Mr. Speaker, in closing, our purpose in introducing this legislation now is to address concerns that the current program has not achieved the positive results that were intended. We need to build confidence in the region, create greater business certainty, and provide a long-term positive investment climate. I believe this is a good bill that will foster economic development of the Caribbean and thereby promote political stability in the region. I urge my colleagues to review this legislation and I seek your support.

A section-by-section summary of the bill is set forth below:

SUMMARY OF PROPOSED CARIBBEAN BASIN INITIATIVE (CBI) LEGISLATION

SHORT TITLE (SECTION 1)

The short title of the legislation is the "Caribbean Basin Economic Recovery Expansion Act of 1989".

CONGRESSIONAL FINDINGS (SECTION 2)

Section 2 contains findings of the Congress that a stable political and economic climate is necessary for the development of the Caribbean Basin and for U.S. security and economic interests, and that the U.S. commitment to the development of that region should be reaffirmed and strengthened by improving the operation of the Caribbean Basin Economic Recovery Act (CBI).

REPEAL OF THE DUTY-FREE TREATMENT TERMINATION DATE (SECTION 3); REPORTS ON PROGRAM OPERATION (SECTION 6)

Under current law, duty-free treatment for eligible imports from CBI beneficiary countries terminates on September 30, 1995. Section 3 repeals this expiration date, thereby maintaining duty-free treatment for eligible imports in perpetuity unless Congress legislates otherwise. Section 6 requires the President to submit a report to the Congress every 3 years on the operation of the program, with the initial report due by October 1, 1992.

AN INCREASE IN THE DUTY-FREE ALLOWANCES FOR U.S. RESIDENTS RETURNING FROM CBI BENEFICIARY COUNTRIES OR U.S. INSULAR POSSESSIONS (SECTION 4)

Section 4 increases the duty-free allowance for U.S. residents returning directly or indirectly from a CBI beneficiary country from $400 to $600 and from a U.S. insular possession from $800 to $1,200.

LIMITED DUTY-FREE TREATMENT FOR EXEMPT ARTICLES (SECTION 5)

Under the present CBI, imports of textiles and apparel which are subject to textile agreements; footwear, handbags, luggage, flat goods, work gloves and leather wearing apparel; canned tuna; petroleum and petroleum products; and certain watches and watch parts are exempt from duty-free treatment. Certain imports of textiles and apparel are subject to import quotas under bilateral agreements. Imports for the Caribbean Basin are also dutiable if they do not meet the rule-of-origin requirements.

Section 5 expands CBI benefits through limited duty-free treatment on these products:

1. Duty-free treatment for textile products entering under Guaranteed Access Levels.—Duty-free treatment on textile products entering under bilateral guaranteed access level (GAL) agreements would apply to the total value of textile products entering from the Caribbean under GAL agreements, not merely the value of the U.S. fabric currently exempt from duty under item 807.00. Products receiving duty-free GAL treatment must be assembled in the Caribbean from either (a) fabric formed and cut in the United States or (b) foreign fabric cut in the United States that is not made in the United States or is made in the United States but is in critical shortage. The Secretary of Commerce will determine, after consultation with an advisory committee of domestic textile and apparel industry representatives, the foreign fabrics that will qualify for GAL duty-free treatment. The initial list will be revised annually based on industry petitions to add or delete fabrics and their review by the advisory committee.

2. A "tariff rate quota" allowing a specific volume of goods in each product category currently dutiable under CBI to enter duty-free, except textiles and apparel.—Imports from CBI beneficiary countries of a product-exempt category, except textiles or apparel, would receive duty-free treatment on an aggregate amount up to 5 percent of annual U.S. total imports in the category. If aggregate CBI imports reached that level in any year, imports in the following year from each individual CBI beneficiary country would enter duty-free up to the amount entered from that country in the preceding year plus an annual growth of 3 percent. Any imports above the specified tariff-rate quota level would continue to be subject to duty.

STATUTORY GUARANTEED ACCESS LEVEL AGREEMENTS FOR CERTAIN TEXTILE PRODUCTS ASSEMBLED IN CBI COUNTRIES (SECTION 5)

Section 5 codifies the administrative GAL program as a statutory program and requires the U.S. Trade Representative to enter into bilateral agreements with CBI beneficiary countries, at their request, to guarantee access levels to the U.S. market for textile products assembled in CBI beneficiary countries from U.S. fabric or qualified foreign fabric. The textile product may incorporate findings and trimmings of foreign origin that do not exceed 25 percent of the cost of the components of the assembled product. Existing GALs, which were negotiated under the Reagan Administration's CBI Special Access Program, would be "grandfathered" under this statutory authority.

A sense of the Congress urges the U.S. Trade Representative to seek greater fairness, transparency, and stability in country allocations of quota export certificates between U.S. and foreign companies.

ESTABLISHMENT OF A SUGAR IMPORT FLOOR AND QUOTA REALLOCATIONS FOR CBI COUNTRIES (SECTION 7)

Section 7 establishes a guaranteed minimum access level for sugar imports from CBI beneficiary countries by setting a minimum quota floor at the 1989 aggregate level. Irrespective of the total global quota level in future years, the CBI share in the aggregate could not be set below the current level, but that share would increase proportionally if the total global quota level increases.

Individual CBI countries would receive quota reallocations as a result of annual shortfalls or quota suspension or termination by administrative actions. The Department of Agriculture is required to determine each year whether each quota country will fill its quota for that year, under penalty that any shortfall would be allocated. Any quota shortfalls, including shortfalls of CBI beneficiary countries, would be reallocated proportionally to CBI countries. The existing quota suspension for Panama and any future country quota suspension or termination under existing authorities, such as for national security or foreign policy reasons, would also be reallocated proportionally to CBI countries.

Compensation authority is provided if these CBI quota provisions are found to be inconsistent with U.S. international obligations under the GATT. The Administration must consult with the House Ways and Means and Senate Finance Committees prior to proposing a compensation offer.

SEPARATE INJURY CUMULATION DETERMINATION FOR CBI BENEFICIARY COUNTRIES IN COUNTERVAILING DUTY AND ANTIDUMPING CASES (SECTION 8)

In countervailing duty and antidumping cases under current law, imports into the United States from CBI beneficiary countries are aggregated together with imports of the like product under investigation from all non-CBI suppliers in determining whether the unfair trade practice causes or threatens material injury to the U.S. domestic industry. Section 8 creates a separate cumulation of imports of a like product under investigation only from CBI beneficiary countries, as a group. If the U.S. International Trade Commission determines that such imports from CBI beneficiary countries injure U.S. producers, current law and sanctions would apply.

ESTABLISHMENT OF A PILOT CUSTOMS PRECLEARANCE PROGRAM (SECTION 9)

Section 9 requires the U.S. Customs Service to establish preclearance operations during fiscal years 1990 and 1991 at a facility in a country in the Caribbean Basin appropriate under specified criteria for testing the extent to which the availability of preclearance operations can assist in the development of tourism. The Commissioner of Customs shall submit a report to the Congress on the preclearance operations program as soon as practicable after September 30, 1991.

REQUEST THAT BLUE BUNTING OVER DOORS OF HOUSE CHAMBER BE ALLOWED TO REMAIN

Mr. GIBBONS. Mr. Speaker, if I may be recognized for one other brief unanimous-consent request, I ask unanimous consent that the blue bunting over the doors adorned by stars used in today's ceremony be allowed to remain in the Chamber at the discretion of the Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will take that suggestion under advisement and will consult with others and consider the advisability of following the gentleman's recommendation.

REQUEST THAT PRESIDENT APPOINT EMERGENCY BOARD TO SOLVE DEADLOCK BETWEEN MACHINISTS AND EASTERN AIRLINES

(Mr. ENGEL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to request that President Bush appoint an emergency board to solve the deadlocks between the International Association of Machinists and Eastern Airlines.

The contract between Eastern Airlines and the International Association of Machinists expired 14 months ago. Last month, after 13 months of negotiations, the National Mediation Board declared an impasse and instituted a 30-day-cooling-off period which comes to an end on Saturday. The two sides are still unable to come to an agreement and unless a Presidential emergency board is created, a strike appears inevitable.

The creation of an emergency board will prevent a strike from occurring for another 60 days, and will give the union and Eastern additional time to work out their differences. If a strike were to occur, it would result in chaos for air travelers around the country. I join the National Mediation Board, the International Association of Machinists, and the AFL–CIO in urging the President to appoint an emergency board and prevent a strike at Eastern Airlines.

The last-minute attempt by Eastern to play a divide-and-conquer game and pull the pilots away from the machinists points to the urgency of this matter.

IRAQ'S SUFFERING LITTLE CHILDREN

(Mr. LANTOS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LANTOS. Mr. Speaker, Iraq's indiscriminate use of poison gas against its own civilians last year was one of the most shocking violations of human rights since the end of the Second World War.

We now have another devastating revelation about Iraq. The highly respected human rights organization, Amnesty International, has documented large-scale and systematic torture of children by Iraqi authorities in order to punish their parents or to obtain false confessions from them as they watch in agony while their children are tortured.

With a united voice, the entire civilized world must condemn this mind-boggling example of medieval cruelty at the end of the 20th century.

As a sad footnote to this horror, the United Nations Human Rights Commission has lost what little credibility it had by refusing to investigate this outrage because of political pressure by some of its totalitarian members.

RIGHT-WING REPUBLICAN ACTIVISTS ENGAGE IN PARTISAN POLITICS

(Mr. COLEMAN of Texas asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. COLEMAN of Texas. Mr. Speaker, a small band of right-wing Republican activists is engaged in an undertaking so brazenly cynical and so blatantly partisan that it should offend and throughly outrage every one who is sensitive to due process.

Recent news articles make it clear that this small band of propaganda terrorists has been plotting all along, on a series of conspiracies to discredit Speaker WRIGHT and other Democrats.

Moreover, they are cynically trying to intimidate Republican members of the Ethics Committee into finding some complaint against the Speaker to be valid.

To use the prosecutorial forum of the Ethics Committee to resolve our political differences is improper. To attempt to influence individual members' votes on that committee is tantamount to jury tampering and should be punished under our rules. I shall propose such rules changes.

Well, it won't work—the American people are a lot wiser than you Republicans give them credit to be. Americans will not be led down a path of divisiveness, no matter how shrill your whining becomes.

Congressman GINGRICH, quoted in the February 26 Washington Post, says, and I quote, "Now we have a way of dividing America."

PRESIDENT BUSH URGED TO TAKE STEPS TO PREVENT EASTERN AIRLINES STRIKE

(Mr. MARTINEZ asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MARTINEZ. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in strong support of the workers of Eastern Airlines in their battle with Eastern Chairman Frank Lorenzo. And I call upon President Bush to declare a national transportation emergency to prevent the strike scheduled to begin Saturday morning.

Texas Air's shameful history shows why President Bush must act. In 1982, Lorenzo's Texas Air bought Continental Airlines and quickly manipulated bankruptcy laws to break Continental's union. Congress was so outraged that we passed legislation preventing companies from using bankruptcy laws to ever do this again.

In 1986, Lorenzo bought Eastern Airlines and began trying to use sham transactions to break its union. On two separate occasions, a Federal judge had to stop Lorenzo from unilaterally transferring unionized Eastern workers into nonunion subsidiaries of Texas Air. Meanwhile, since 1987 Lorenzo has been demanding that Eastern employees take pay cuts of 30 to 40 percent. Texas Air has simply not played fair. It has sold Eastern assets to itself at bargain basement prices and then cried that Eastern is losing money. It has made ridiculous demands of Eastern's workers and then cried that the workers are not being reasonable.

Now Lorenzo's single-minded attempt to crush Eastern's union has led to the scheduling of a strike which could cripple America's transportation system. I urge President Bush to use the power which is his alone to prevent this potential disaster. I urge him to appoint an emergency board under the Railway Labor Act which would start a 30-day factfinding action followed by a 30-day-cooling-off period.

A TRIBUTE TO WILLARD SCOTT

(Mr. WOLF asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. WOLF. Mr. Speaker, Willard Scott is a great American, a great Virginian and a man who is beloved in the Washington, DC, area.

I rise today to pay tribute to Willard Scott in the wake of news reports about the unfortunate memo criticizing Willard's work as the weatherman and man about country on the NBC morning program.

I also rise to report that USA Today's telephone poll yesterday confirmed what we all know: America loves Willard Scott.

Willard is pure Americana. Through his travels across our land to county fairs and festivals and into small towns and neighborhoods, he celebrates America and her people. He touches America's heart and focuses on her goodness.

And incredibly over the years, Willard, through his individual effort, has promoted and benefited more charities and worthwhile causes than any one person I know.

It would be a fitting tribute for the Congress to recognize Willard Scott as the U.S. Ambassador of Goodwill. We salute him and predict Willard Scott will be leading the cheers for America every morning on the Today Show for many years to come.

REQUEST FOR PRESIDENT BUSH TO APPOINT A PRESIDENTIAL EMERGENCY BOARD TO MEDIATE DISPUTE BETWEEN EMPLOYEES AND MANAGEMENT OF EASTERN AIRLINES

(Mr. GARCIA asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to voice my concern over the protracted confrontation between the employees and the management of Eastern Air Lines.

Negotiations started in September 1987. In January 1988, Eastern management rejected the National Mediation Board's arbitration proposal. This set up the 30-day count down that will end midnight tomorrow, March 3, at which point the International Association of Machinists may have no alternative but to strike.

Over the past decade, Eastern's unionized employees have agreed to significant financial concessions in their attempt to help save the airline. In the current round of talks, the employees have taken a pay freeze, major work rule changes, and reductions in entry pay rates.

I call on President Bush to appoint a Presidential Emergency Board to help Eastern employees and management overcome this current impass. I am not here to pass judgment. I do not have knowledge of the details of the negotiations. But I speak on behalf of the employees of Eastern and the general public that relies on Eastern Airline's services.

SUBCOMMITTEE MEMBERS SUPPORT APPOINTMENT OF BOARD TO INVESTIGATE DISPUTE BETWEEN EASTERN AIRLINES AND MACHINISTS

(Mr. JONES of Georgia asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. JONES of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, Eastern Airlines and its machinists are now locked in a dispute which threatens not only to temporarily disrupt air service, but to permanently disrupt the employment of thousands of employees, and to destroy the fabric of this vital industry. This situation requires immediate, and special, attention. Along with Congressman OBERSTAR, who is Chairman of the Aviation Subcommittee on which I serve, I have just signed a letter to President Bush, requesting that he accept the recommendation of the National Mediation Board to appoint a board to investigate and report on the issues which are involved in the dispute between Eastern and the International Association of Machinists.

In over 30 airline disputes, 5 Presidents have, without exception, accepted the NMB's recommendations and have appointed emergency boards. In the majority of cases, the boards have been successful in averting work stoppages.

The current dispute is one which has already caused a great deal of concern and hardship to a great many people. In Georgia's Fourth District, which I represent, aviation is a vital part of our economy and our community. In this time of concern over aviation safety and maintaining productive jobs for Americans, we cannot afford to ignore the very real problems which exist, and those which will be created by the disruption of a major airline such as Eastern. The interest of the larger community—of the traveling public and the thousands of people involved in the aviation industry and their families—will be served by the appointment of a commission and the consequent aversion of a strike. This is a time to prevent devisiveness and to work together for the resolution of this painful situation. I strongly urge the President to follow the unbroken precedent set by his predecessors, and accept the NMB's recommendation for the appointment of a commission.

CALLING ON PRESIDENT BUSH TO ACT TO AVERT A NATIONAL TRANSPORTATION DISASTER

(Mr. LEWIS of Georgia asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. LEWIS of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I rise to call on President Bush to act to avert a national disaster. I call on the President to appoint an emergency mediation board to fashion a settlement in the Eastern Airlines conflict.

A March 4 strike could potentially cripple our Nation's transportation system. It would cripple a once great airline and render tens of thousands of employees temporarily jobless. In my Atlanta congressional district thousands of employees would be adversely affected by this action.

I call on Frank Lorenzo and Phil Bakes at Eastern to bargain in good faith with the International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers to avert a labor disaster in the days to come. Eastern and its unions must come together for the common interest of our Nation's transportation industry.

Again, Mr. President, I call on you to appoint an emergency mediation board to settle the differences between Eastern and its unions.

THE 200TH ANNIVERSARY OF FIRST CONGRESS ALSO BIRTHDAY OF THE HONORABLE ROBERT H. MICHEL, REPUBLICAN LEADER

(Mr. MACHTLEY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. MACHTLEY. Mr. Speaker, I would like on this historic day, to recognize the fact that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MICHEL], our Republican leader, was born on this day many years ago, and to wish him well.

QUALITY HEALTH CARE IS ESSENTIAL

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. LEWIS of Georgia). Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SLATTERY] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. SLATTERY. Mr. Speaker, small rural hospitals are losing money and closing their doors at an alarming rate. These small hospitals, of 60 beds or less, have an average profit margin of minus 1 percent. Some are losing even more money which is limiting their ability to deliver health care services.

Since 1983, when the cost plus reimbursement system for Medicare reimbursement and replaced with the prospective payment system, 453 hospitals have closed nationwide; 188 of those hospitals were located in rural communities.

Unless unfair discrepencies in payments to urban and rural hospitals are eliminated, more rural hospitals will be forced to shut down and the residents of small towns throughout our country will be forced to live without local hospital care.

These small hospitals are often the only well-equipped medical facilities within miles of rural communities like Clay Center, KS in my home district.

Mr. Speaker, quality health care is essential to the economic well-being of rural communities everywhere.

Congress must recognize its responsibilities to alleviate the glaring pressure which inadequate Medicare payments place on the viability of rural hospitals.

The Medicare physician reimbursement system is also having a negative effect on the ability of rural communities to attract and retain physicians' services.

Doctors can earn more money in big cities than they can in many rural communities.

For example, physicians in New York have received $7,500 for triple bypass surgery. A Kansas physician has received $3,300 for the same operation.

This is contributing to the problem rural hospitals have in recruiting and retaining doctors. Congress must act to correct these discrepancies between urban and rural fees.

For these reasons, today I am introducing the Medicare Reform Act—a two-part package which I believe will help stabilize the situation confronting our rural hospitals, and begin the reform of the Medicare physician payment policy.

OUTLINE OF LEGISLATIVE PROPOSALS

This legislation has four major provisions:

First, remove from the prospective payment system and return to a cost-based system: Rural hospitals of 60 beds or less, or any rural hospital which has experienced during the past two years a 70-percent Medicare caseload, or any rural hospital which has an average daily census of 30 patients or less.

Second, study of future payment system for rural hospitals: Within 3 years of enactment, HCFA, in consultation with the Prospective Payment Assessment Commission, is directed to recommend to Congress either a new payment system for rural hospitals which have opted out of the prospective payment system, or maintainance of the cost-based system.

Third, severity of illness: Payments to hospitals continuing to be reimbursed under the Prospective Payment System will be the greater of either the DRG applicable to admission or post-admission diagnosis.

Fourth, physicians: Require that HCFA publish the top 100 volume procedures under Medicare part B—which account for approximately 70 percent of part B spending. Following publication, differences in prevailing rates for physician specialty groups within carrier areas will be eliminated and one median prevailing rate will be established for each identified procedure. Upon submission of each carrier's 100 median prevailing rates, HCFA would be required to calculate national median rates.

Carrier median prevailing rates which are above the national median prevailing rates for any of the 100 identified procedures would be frozen—those falling below would receive the full MEI increase.

Mr. Speaker, I realize that some changes in physician reimbursements are being developed, but those changes will not be available for at least one year.

The crisis in rural health care cannot wait.

We must seize this opportunity to institute a more equitable physician reimbursement system. Geographic discrepancies in today's reimbursement system must be reduced and physicians should be reimbursed under one payment rate.

Mr. Speaker, we are at a critical turning point in the health care industry. The health care industry has experienced dramatic changes since the early 1980's. Certainly, portions of the industry have become more efficient. Yet not all providers have come out winners—the changes of the past have placed a tremendous strain on the capacity of some facilities, especially in rural areas, to provide quality health services.

The legislation I have introduced above will provide a period of stability for the small rural hospitals which have suffered greatly under the prospective payment system.

I realize that changes in Medicare will be difficult in light of President Bush's proposed $5.5 billion cut in Medicare, but the effort must be made.

I look forward to participating in the movement to save our rural hospitals and establishing equity in the Medicare physician payment system.

And I encourage my colleagues to join me in this effort.

APPOINTMENT OF A PRESIDENTIAL EMERGENCY BOARD TO AVOID AN IMPENDING EASTERN AIRLINES STRIKE IS GOOD ADVICE

(Mr. WEISS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, without a major turnaround before midnight on Friday, Eastern Airlines employees will be forced to strike. Despite a few last-minute maneuvers by management, the fact remains that the negotiations' posture, the management of Eastern has been intransigent and irresponsible throughout the 2 years of negotiations.

As Yogi Berra once said, "It seems like deja vu all over again."

The management of Eastern has presided over the busting of the union at Continental Airlines and from there it has proceeded to dismantle Eastern Airlines by selling its most profitable assets and siphoning off hundreds of millions of dollars from Eastern to Continental and Texas Air.

Now it claims that Eastern is poor. Effective labor law requires good faith collective-bargaining effort from labor and management. This spirit has clearly been violated by Eastern's management in its dealing with Eastern employees notwithstanding last night's offer.

Eastern's president, Mr. Frank Lorenzo, has consistently refused to offer the employees anything more than severe reductions in pay.

Mr. Speaker, the National Mediation Board which has overseen the negotiations, has asked for the appointment of a Presidential emergency board to avoid the impending strike. I believe this is good advice.

It is in the interest of all American workers, indeed of all Americans, to assure that the tactics of corporate management such as Eastern's do not succeed.

ESTONIAN INDEPENDENCE DAY

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ANNUNZIO] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. ANNUNZIO, Mr. Speaker, on February 24, 1918, 71 years ago, the people of Estonia proudly proclaimed their independence, and created a government free from the domination and tyranny imposed on them for centuries by the Russians.

After the formation of this free state, Estonians and their allies successfully defended their country from attacks by the Red army. About 2 years later, on February 2, 1920, a peace treaty was signed between the new Republic of Estonia and the Soviet Union, where Russia "agreed to renounce voluntarily forever all rights over Estonian territory and people."

This peace treaty lasted only 20 years, before the Soviet Union in 1940 again attacked and invaded Estonia, and incorporated it into the Soviet empire. The United States has never recognized this brutal seizure by the Communists, and the people of Estonia continue today in their brave efforts to obtain freedom and self-determination once again for their beloved homeland.

During the last year, we have seen a growing movement of Estonian nationalism sweeping Soviet-occupied Estonia. The people of Estonia have taken bold steps in an attempt to gain more freedom and autonomy from their Soviet oppressor.

At this point in the RECORD, I would like to share with my colleagues a statement prepared by the Estonian American National Council outlining these recent steps that the Estonian people have taken in pursuit of liberty. The text of that statement follows:

ESTONIA: POLITICAL AWARENESS AND NATIONAL REAWAKENING, 1988-89

1988 was a dramatic year of demonstrations, rallies, song fests and unprecedented political activity in Soviet-occupied Estonia, all of it aimed, ultimately, at the eventual restoration of Estonian independence. The world media have been filled with images of "the mouse that roared," as a country of one million seemed to challenge an empire of 300 million.

In a true grassroots movement, Estonian demands for reform, democracy and outright independence came directly from the long-suppressed Estonian people—fully one-third of the population attended a rally September 17, while 900,000 signed a petition opposing proposed Soviet Constitutional changes as undemocratic and harmful to Estonian interests. National and local-level groups and organizations, representative of a variety of approaches but united in their final objective, continue to form.

Estonians were brought to this level of activity by a growing awareness that their very survival as a people is threatened by the continued Soviet occupation and colonization of their homeland. Kept keenly aware—by the presence of 150,000 Soviet troops—that they live in a nation under occupation. Estonians yearn once again to be masters in their own home, to control their own economy and natural resources, to decide their own internal affairs, their own destiny. At its founding ceremonies August 20, 1988, the Estonian National Independence Party declared:

"We do not have enough clean air, water or earth to sustain life, let alone freedom. . . . Add to that the danger of becoming a minority in our own ancient land."

As a possible indicator of things to come, the Soviet press has been villifying Estonia for months, to the point that the Estonian Popular Front has sued TASS for slander. However, while well aware of the ever-present potential for a Soviet crack-down or of a violent backlash led by the Russian chauvinist organization "International Front," Estonians still push peacefully for further reforms and democratization. Counting on continued moral and real support from the free world. Estonians are proceeding with careful, measured steps to move away from Moscow's control and toward true sovereignty.

The goals of free Estonians and of the international Estonian resistance movement remain:

1. That the Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact along with its secret protocols be declared null and void from the moment of its inception.

2. That Estonian-Soviet relations be governed by the 1920 Peace Treaty of Tartu, in which the USSR promised to respect Estonian sovereignty "forever".

Mr. Speaker, on the occasion of the 71st anniversary of Estonian Independence Day, I am honored to join with Estonian-Americans in the 11th Congressional District of Illinois which I am honored to represent, and Americans of Estonian descent throughout this Nation, as we commend the great courage of the Estonian people in resisting the tyranny of their Communist oppressor, and as we support their efforts in one day achieving self-determination in a free Estonia.

PRICE FIXING PREVENTION ACT OF 1989

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BROOKS] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing the Price Fixing Prevention Act of 1989 to end increasing confusion in the Federal courts over the proper substantive and evidentiary standards to be applied in cases where a manufacturer conspires with a dealer to drive a rival dealer out of business because of that rival's competitive pricing policies.

The American retail sector of the economy is without parallel in the world. From full service to highly innovative discount stores, the American consumer is presented with the widest selection of goods and services at the lowest prices. Without the vigorous pull of competition, however, the number and diversity of retail sources would diminish rapidly, ultimately driving up prices for nearly all consumer goods. For this reason, the antitrust laws were designed to protect against all conspiracies aimed at driving competitors out of the marketplace.

But striking out against such conspiracies has been severely hampered because of two developments: The first involves the continuing failure—even refusal—of the antitrust enforcement agencies to bring a single vertical price fixing case in the past 8 years. In fact, it was only through congressional action that we have been able to bar efforts by the Department of Justice to intervene in behalf of defendants charged with price fixing. We can no longer harbor any illusion that public enforcement alone will be a factor in deterring or punishing such conspiracies.

Without public enforcement of the antitrust laws, we can only rely on private enforcement by individuals injured in their business or property. And yet, even the private remedy has been put at risk by two recent cases decided by the Supreme Court. In Monsanto versus Spray-Rite Corp. and in Business Electronics versus Sharp Electronics, the Court made statements that have now cast uncertainty about the proper substantive and evidentiary standards to be applied in cases involving the termination of a dealer as a result of a vertical price fixing conspiracy. In the wake of these decisions, a number of lower courts have erected procedural and substantive barriers which may have prevented some meritorious cases from even reaching the jury.

As the ultimate antitrust policymaker, Congress should now put an end to confusion and clarify precisely what its policy views are in this area. The Price Fixing Prevention Act of 1989 thus has two major provisions: First, it clarifies that if sufficient causation for a Sherman Act section 1 claim is shown by the plaintiff, then an inference of illegal "concerted action" is raised; and a jury will decide whether the antitrust laws have been violated. Where these requirements are not met, a defendant's ability to obtain a grant of summary disposition under the Federal rules of civil procedure remains unaffected. Second, the bill states plainly that resale price maintenance in all its various forms other than a maximum price is illegal per se under the antitrust laws.

The legislation that I introduced today tracks very closely a predecessor bill in the 100th Congress, which I sponsored and to which this body gave near-unanimous support. It is my hope that we may move quickly forward with this legislation so that the other body may have sufficent time to act during this Congress. It is quite clear to me that without action by Congress, vertical price fixing will become an increasingly familiar business practice in the marketplace.

EXIMBANK AND THE TRADE WAR CHEST

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KLECZKA] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. KLECZKA. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to inform my colleagues that the direct loan program of the Export-Import Bank of the United States, which was shutdown by the Reagan administration in its final days, is now back in business.

The Eximbank Board of Directors has resumed operations of this essential trade program after the new administration clarified its position on the program in a letter from OMB Chairman Darman.

While this is welcome news, more needs to be done if we are to strengthen the capacity one of our Nation's key trade agencies to assist our exporters in meeting the heavily subsidized foreign competition.

On the near horizon, we need a 1-year reauthorization of the tied aid credit "war chest." While progress has been made on the tied aid issue, Eximbank needs the statutory authority to use the war chest to combat unfairly subsidized foreign competition. As a recent article in the Financial Times indicated, very attractive tied aid credit offers by other nations are luring American firms to move offshore. If the Congress does not act, the war chest goes out of business September 30. I intend to introduce legislation this month which would extend the war chest authority for 1 year.

In addition, we must address the capital levels of the Bank itself. By the end of this fiscal year, the Bank will likely deplete entirely its capital. Some type of recapitalization, perhaps tied to the waiver of prepayment penalties of certain Eximbank loans, is in order.

At this point, I would like to include in the RECORD an article on Eximbank which includes the views of outgoing Bank President John Bohn. As the article notes, the "on again, off again" attitude toward export financing gives the United States a reputation of unreliability.

The material follows:

[From the Financial Times, Feb. 28, 1989]

DEPARTING EXIMBANK CHIEF ACCORDS LITTLE CREDIT TO U.S. GOVERNMENT

(By Peter Montagnon and Nancy Dunne)

An unenviable task awaits the still-to-be named successor to Mr. John Bohn, who leaves the post of president of the US Eximbank for greener private-sector pastures next week.

Though widely respected in the US export industry for the professionalism of his three-year term in charge of the bank, Mr. Bohn leaves the institution facing fundamental problems that call its future into question.

A victim of both general budget stringency and the free-market doctrines of the years of former President Ronald Reagan, the bank has faced increasing political fire in recent times.

In the past seven years, its budgetary authorisation for direct credit lending in support of exports has dwindled to $695m (£395m) from $5.4bn. In January it was forced to announce a cessation of all new direct-loan approvals because no money was made available at all in Mr. Reagan's budget for the fiscal year beginning in October.

According to Mr. Bohn, losses incurred as a result of a mismatch between its cost of borrowing from the Government and the low export credit rates in the late 1970s and early 1980s will wipe out its capital sometime around the turn of the current fiscal year.

Meanwhile the big dollops of aid used quite legitimately by competitors such as Japan have seriously undermined the ability of US exporters to compete in markets such as Thailand, Indonesia and China.

In short, there could scarecely be a more poignant example than the Eximbank of the way in which institutional failures on the part of the Government have contributed to loss of international competitiveness by US industry.

At a conference in Washington this week, several leading exporters spelled out the consequences.

Mr. Robert Hammond, assistant treasurer of American Telephone and Telegraph, said the failure of the US to provide more attractive mixed credits was encouraging telecommunications companies to move offshore. Mr. Robert Smith, assistant treasurer of General Electric, said his company was forced to source exports abroad to take advantage of the more competitive financing offered by foreign governments. And Mr. Glen Bruce, corporation manager of Dresser Industries, said some overseas customers were not even asking US companies to bid on projects because their credit was uncompetitive.

Arresting this drift will be an uphill struggle for Mr. Bohn's successor.

The bank's dependence on federal government financing as its sole source of funds means it will be able to continue functioning even after its capital is exhausted. The provision of some as yet unspecified funds in the budget of President George Bush means it will soon be able to resume its direct lending programme, but a great deal of uncertainty remains.

"We still don't know and have no way of knowing whether we will get an adequate amount of money," Mr. Bohn said this week. As a result, the resumption of direct credit approvals will have to be cautious even though the temporary suspension of lending announced in January had contrived to give an impression to trading partners of unreliability.

Though the bank could operate without capital, this was not an incentive for firm management of its affairs, he said.

A further problem remained the proliferation of mixed credits (export credits sweetened with aid) which has not been solved by tighter international rules agreed two years ago.

Japan was continuing to offer mixed credits at an increasing level but within the new guidelines, he said. "The mechanism we have introduced provides some discipline but not enough."

For its part, US aid policy was not sufficiently commercially oriented. "We have given away money with little regard for its effect on our economy."

The Eximbank has long been regarded with suspicion by many in Congress who see it as providing unnecessary subsidies to a few large companies which account for a tiny share of US exports, but it is not without its supporters.

Senator Patrick Leahy, chairman of the Foreign Operations sub-committee responsible for Eximbank, told the conference this week he was a strong supporter because other countries had made it clear they would continue their export subsidies. "Some countries have been getting a free ride as a result of US policies," he said.

Mr. Bohn cited two beacons of hope. The first was that export credit agencies generally might play an increasing role in any new policy to deal with the developing country debt crisis. The second was that Eximbank might eventually be drawn in to play a role in reversing the decline in US competitiveness, which is still the subject of much agonized debate in Washington.

There is not much sign of that happening yet, however. The budget message from Mr. Bush is that there is a "pre-disposition" to retain the direct lending programme, but that is a long way from increasing it or even putting it on a permanently secure footing.

IMMIGRATION EMPLOYMENT PAPERWORK REDUCTION ACT OF 1989

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SHAW] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. SHAW. Mr. Speaker, there are times and circumstances when, in our eagerness to pass legislation, we do not foresee its potential impact on the business community. This is sometimes referred to as the "law of unintended effects." The 1986 Immigration Reform and Control Act, is a case in point.

This act requires all employers to compile and maintain "I-9" employment verification forms on all new employees. This has not been a popular requirement, but I believe it is the best way to limit the job opportunities drawing illegal immigrants to our shores. In what was originally an attempt to restrict people smugglers, who were paid to transport aliens into the United States, the act extended employer sanctions to those "who recruit or refer for a fee."

As officially interpreted, this requirement has created special problems for the placement industry, which the Immigration and Naturalization Service views among those who "recruit or refer for a fee." Personnel consultants serve industry by finding qualified men and women for jobs. Even though the men and women they place are not their employees, personnel consultants are required to complete "I-9" forms on each of them.

Requiring this paperwork is burdensome to placement firms and makes little sense. Companies retain placement firms to find qualified, employable people. An illegal immigrant is not employable under the law. A personnel consultant who refers people who the clients cannot employ risks the loss of that client's confidence. What rational businessman will retain a consultant who gets them into trouble with the Department of Justice? Laws, regulations, and forms are rarely necessary, Mr. Speaker, when commonsense prevails.

Meanwhile, hundreds of thousands of these documents are piling up in placement firms throughout our country. These duplicate "I-9's" serve no useful purpose. When a person is hired, the firm that hires him or her must complete its own "I-9" form within a few days. Thus, people hired through placement firms are the only American workers for whom two sets of employment verification documents must be completed. No good end is served by this duplication of effort. No public purpose is advanced.

This is why I am reintroducing today legislation that I originally introduced in the 100th Congress. This bill would simply relieve the placement industry of this wasteful, duplicative paperwork burden. This is all my bill would do. It would in no way undercut the employer sanctions contained in the 1986 act. All employers would still have to compile and maintain "I-9" files on all new employees. This included all employers and employees in the placement industry itself. No one would slip through the cracks. Regardless, let me emphasize that I continue to support the Immigration Reform and Control Act. It is more important now than ever, as south Florida is once again facing a new influx of immigrants, many of whom are seeking employment.

We in Congress do ourselves and this institution great harm when we impose on American businesses recordkeeping or paperwork burdens that serve no valid public purpose. Some Federal paperwork requirements are burdensome, but necessary. When such requirements serve an overriding public interest, we should support them and deal with whatever criticism emanates from our doing so. When such burdens are unnecessary, however, we owe it to the public to end those burdens. This is such a case.

Mr. Speaker, the text of my bill follows:

H.R. 1269

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. BEVILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my special order follow immediately the special order of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DICKINSON].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

TRIBUTE TO THE HONORABLE BILL NICHOLS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DICKINSON] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Speaker, today I am joined by my good friend and colleague from Alabama, TOM BEVILL, and the Alabama delegation and many of our colleagues in paying special tribute to a very great American and a very dear friend of mine, BILL NICHOLS.

At this time, I yield to the gentleman from Mobile, AL, Mr. CALLAHAN of the First District in Alabama.

Mr. CALLAHAN. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, our Nation lost a great leader this past December with the passing of our former colleague, BILL NICHOLS, of Sylacauga.

Few Members of Congress in our Nation's history have served in this body with more distinction, honor, and integrity than BILL NICHOLS.

His style was soft-spoken and kind and he had a deep understanding for earning respect by first showing it to others.

During his 22-year tenure in the House we witnessed his incredible ability to bring the two sides of an issue together and it was his slow, deliberate, and tempered style that will be so greatly missed in this body.

The best tribute that I can pay to our friend, BILL NICHOLS, is that over the course of his long and distinguished career in public service he never forgot who he was, where he came from, or who the people were that sent him here. He had genuine care and concern for the average working man and woman that is too often absent in public service today. He always remembered that our purpose in this job is to serve the public and he tirelessly dedicated his life and career to that end.

To his lovely wife, Carolyn, who was so good to Karen and I when we first came to Washington, we extend our continued prayers and support. We know her days are still very empty without BILL and we wish for her God's strength and guidance during this difficult period.

Mr. DICKINSON. I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

It is a sad occasion to get together to commemorate the life and the outstanding accomplishments of our colleague BILL NICHOLS, but it is certainly something that should be done because with his passing, he has left a great void in the elected officials of the Nation and certainly his district, the Third District of Alabama.

In life, BILL was both a dear close friend and a dedicated statesman who always stood tall in his patriotism and love of country. There was also another side to this man, that of a kind and quiet gentleman, who found it natural to put the needs of others above his own. If he gave his word, you could take it to the bank. He was solid, and dependable, and absolutely trustworthy.

BILL was a man of many accomplishments who remained remarkably unassuming. As an Auburn University football star, he turned down an offer to go professional. As a brave young volunteer in the U.S. Army, BILL NICHOLS fought gallantly against the Germans in World War II and lost his left leg to a land mine in the Battle of the Hurtgen Forrest. He subsequently underwent 19 operations and learned to walk again. During his 8 years as a representative and senator in the Alabama Legislature, BILL NICHOLS distinguished himself through his efforts in support of the handicapped, education, and improving State highways. For these reasons, the Capitol Press Corps honored him as the most outstanding member of the Alabama Senate in 1965.

In Washington, BILL NICHOLS never put aside the compassion and good common values that he was so well known for back home. As chairman of the Military Personnel and Compensation Subcommittee of the House Armed Services Committee, BILL was dubbed the "friend of the serviceman" for ensuring that America's service members received compensation and benefits comparable to civilian pay. In 1984, BILL NICHOLS chaired the House Investigations Subcommittee probe of Pentagon procurement waste, in which the Defense Department reportedly paid outrageous prices for hammers and for toilet seats.

This was only a small portion of it, though, because the waste and fraud was not in hundreds of dollars but in millions of dollars.

Many regard the hallmark of his career to be the passage of the Goldwater-Nichols Defense Reorganization Act. Labelled as the most far-reaching piece of defense legislation to pass Congress in over 40 years, it called for the reorganization of the upper ranks of the military services. After the failed rescue attempt of the American hostages in Iran, and the bombing of the U.S. Marine barracks in Lebanon, BILL NICHOLS fought hard for the Pentagon reorganization, laying the blame for these tragic events on the lack of authority given to officers placed in responsible positions. That has been changed, thanks to BILL.

Mr. Speaker, BILL was the recipient of a Bronze Star and a Purple Heart.

Before coming to Congress he was a county farm agent, a local school board member, a successful businessman and after coming to Congress here, he was certainly an outstanding and capable Member of Congress. BILL NICHOLS was all of these things. But for those of us who are privileged to know him, he will above all be remembered as a good friend and a good American.

Mr. Speaker, at this time I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MONTGOMERY].

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I thank the gentleman from Alabama for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I want to thank BILL DICKINSON and TOM BEVILL for taking this time so we can pay tribute to our friend and colleague, BILL NICHOLS. I lost one of my very closest friends when BILL died of a heart attack on December 13, and this country lost one of its greatest patriots.

In a very thoughtful gesture, Mrs. Nichols gave me and my colleague, JOHN KASICH the honor of eulogizing BILL at his funeral in Sylacauga, AL. It was a sad day, but I had no trouble coming up with nice things to say about BILL NICHOLS. Ever since he and I met 22 years ago at freshman orientation here on Capitol Hill, I have loved and admired this person.

Throughout his life, BILL NICHOLS was always a leader. He played football at Auburn University and was captain of the team. He had a close relationship with his alma mater. I had the privilege of attending a ceremony a few years ago on the Auburn campus, where BILL was honored by having the ROTC building named after him. Naturally, he was very proud of this.

BILL NICHOLS was a highly decorated veteran of World War II. He was severely wounded in the war, but he and his wife, Carolyn, worked hard to overcome that handicap and they did it with dignity.

I try to talk to Carolyn about every month to see how she is doing. The loss of BILL, of course, is very hard on her, but she is carrying on life and doing the things BILL wanted her to do.

BILL was a leader in our House prayer breakfast group. At one time, he was president of the group and I know he looked forward to those Thursday morning sessions. He would often write down quotes or prayers offered by others on the program.

During my eulogy in Alabama, I failed to tell the story about BILL and former Congressman Jack Brinkley of Georgia and how they took on President Jimmy Carter and won. We were putting a national veterans cemetery in the Southeastern part of the United States. The administration had picked a spot very near the Atlanta International Airport and right below the glide path into one of the runways.

Jack Brinkley and BILL didn't like the site at all. They found a suitable location near the Alabama-Georgia State line and went to work on me and others who had jurisdiction over veterans cemeteries.

By sheer determination, BILL and Jack convinced the Carter administration to agree to the new site. As a result, veterans and their dependents are being buried at this more convenient location.

BILL and I served together on the Armed Service Committee. He was military oriented, through and through. His biggest concern was for the enlisted personnel. He cared more, and did more, for the privates, corporals, sergeants and Navy chiefs than anyone I can remember. When he was chairman of the Personnel Subcommittee, he led the way to increase individual pay; special pay, overseas pay and doctors pay were also implemented. We improved the PX's and commissaries, and he helped start our GI bill on its way to passage. He was truly the enlisted man's friend.

He was also very proud of the Goldwater-Nichols Act that updated the command structure of the military. That was one of the most important pieces of legislation passed in recent years. I am always proud when witnesses before the committee mention the Goldwater-Nichols Act.

When BILL was chairman of the Investigations Subcommittee, that panel wrote a critical report on the loss of our marines in the bombing in Beirut. Some people in the military didn't like the report, but BILL never backed off, and he was right.

BILL NICHOLS was dedicated to his work, just as he was to his family. They know, just as we know, that he was a very special person. We are fortunate to have had the chance to serve with such a great American. We miss him, but BILL is with the good Lord today. Our thoughts are with Carolyn, his three children, Memorie, Margaret, Flynt, and their families.

□ 1245

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to our good friend and colleague from the adjoining district in Florida, the gentleman from Florida, Mr. EARL HUTTO.

Mr. HUTTO. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman very much for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I first heard the name of our departed friend BILL NICHOLS, back in the early 1960's when I worked with television station WSFA in Montgomery, AL. At that time, BILL NICHOLS was a member of the Alabama Legislature, and his name was frequently in the newspaper and on our television station as well as other media throughout the State of Alabama because even then BILL NICHOLS' ability as a leader was being recognized.

I did not have the honor of really meeting BILL NICHOLS until I was elected to Congress in 1978 although I had known his first administrative assistant, Jack Venable, who had worked with me at the television station. When I came to Washington, BILL NICHOLS was one of those who helped take me in tow and was very helpful in my getting the kind of orientation to this body which has been of much benefit through the years. BILL NICHOLS and I had a lot in common. We both came from a rural Alabama background and we were interested in many of the same things. BILL remembered fondly that I had narrated the Auburn University statewide football telecast with Coach Ralph "Shug" Jordan. Since BILL was a former Auburn football player and captain of the team back when Coach Jordan was playing in the early thirties this was a natural point of mutual interest for both of us, and we talked about that considerably. Of course, I don't think there is anyone in this body that did not know that BILL NICHOLS was "Auburn University" through and through. BILL was one of that institution's most distinguished alumni, and he savored every minute of anything that had to do with Auburn.

Perhaps the cry of "war eagle" was uttered by him just about more than any other two words in his vocabulary. His support of Auburn and his leadership throughout the years were recognized by his alma mater on a number of occasions. I remember going with a number of members to attend the dedication of the William F. Nichols ROTC Building on October 2, 1986, and, indeed, this was a proud moment for BILL, Carolyn, and their family. This is a beautiful building on Auburn's campus that accommodates all of the ROTC units there, and it is a fitting tribute to one who has given so much of himself for America and the cause of freedom. And in 1988, Nancy and I attended the homecoming football game at Auburn University where at halftime BILL received the Walter Gilbert Award.

BILL NICHOLS had a distinguished record in the U.S. Army during World War II and was severely wounded. He was a natural for the House Armed Services Committee, and his membership on the committee for over 20 years was a platform that highlighted his many qualities of leadership. BILL's cool demeanor, his pleasant personality and his knowledge of the issues endeared him to all of us members of the committee and indeed to his other colleagues here in the House. Nancy and I counted BILL and Carolyn Nichols among our best friends in Congress, and we enjoyed the company of the Nichols on many occasions. Early in my service in Congress we were priviledged to travel with the Nichols on an overseas trip. This was indeed a good time of fellowship with this wonderful couple as we experienced the culture as well as the political situations in a number of countries.

Earlier I mentioned BILL's close ties with Auburn University and in the last 3 years my family and I have been closer to the Nichols than ever since our oldest daughter, Lori, began her freshman year in 1986 and then this past fall our youngest daughter, Amy, also entered Auburn. The Nichols were very helpful in getting our girls off to a good start and we delighted in attending several Auburn football games together.

Although, BILL had had some health problems in recent years, including heart bypass surgery, he appeared to feel better and apparently was doing extremely well the last couple of years before his fatal heart attack. It was a source of pride to me and I am sure with our other Members to see that some of BILL NICHOLS' best work was done during his last few years in Congress. I had the pleasure of serving with BILL as a conferee on the defense authorization bill for a few years when we were both fighting to preserve the jobs of our civilian employees at military bases and to keep them from being contracted out. BILL commanded the respect of everyone and it was good for me to be in his presence when both of us were going head to head on this issue with some Members of the Senate. As you know, BILL was coauthor of the Goldwater-Nichols defense reorganization bill that provided for the reorganization of the Defense Department. It was not an easy task but Congressman NICHOLS, as chairman of the HASC Investigations Subcommittee, was right in the thick of it and never waivered in the face of stiff opposition from some of those in high offices in the Pentagon. This legislation will be a monument to BILL NICHOLS for years to come and has already been hailed as an outstanding piece of legislation even by those who had opposed it.

Since we have similar constituencies it was not unusual for me, as well as other Members, to sit next to BILL NICHOLS here in the Chamber and to discuss how we were going to vote on upcoming legislation. He always was well attuned to the desires of the folks back home, and that was the thing that mattered most to him. He often had words of wisdom on the right positions to take on the various bills.

BILL NICHOLS was a great American patriot.

BILL NICHOLS is gone from our midst, but he will not be forgotten. He was loved by his family, by his many friends here in Congress, and by many thousands of people in the Third District of Alabama and throughout the State. I believe we all are the better for having a little bit of BILL NICHOLS rub off on us during his sojourn here on Earth. Knowing of his Christian commitment, it is good to know that he has transitioned from this life into Heaven. My entire family, all of whom were fond of BILL NICHOLS, would like to take this opportunity to again extend our deepest sympathy and best wishes to Carolyn and all of the NICHOLS family. May God richly bless each one of you.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. FLIPPO].

Mr. FLIPPO. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DICKINSON] and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BEVILL] for arranging these special orders.

Mr. Speaker, with the passing of Congressman BILL NICHOLS, his wife Carolyn, his family, his friends, and his colleagues have suffered a unique loss. We have lost a great American, a great Alabaman, and a great human being.

BILL NICHOLS was a patriot in the purest sense of the terms, and he led a very useful life. BILL's courage was the courage that was tested by war, and his strength was the strength of character that comes from deep inside that allowed BILL to overcome the serious injuries that he sustained during that war and to go on to become one of Alabama's greatest statesmen.

BILL NICHOLS, as we all know, was a native of Sylacauga, AL, and we know that he served as an outstanding captain of the Auburn University football team, and later in life he enjoyed the distinction of coming back for further service as one of the members of the board of trustees of Auburn University. He was then in fact the chairman of the board and played a very important role in the development of Auburn University as a world-class institution of higher learning.

We know that during World War II BILL distinguished himself in battle. He was awarded, as we know, the Bronze Star and the Purple Heart for his bravery in action. Then after the war BILL came back and distinguished himself in agribusiness, and in 1965 he was named Man of the Year by Progressive Farmer magazine.

BILL served in both the Alabama House and the Alabama Senate, where he was named Outstanding Senator by the capitol press corps.

So BILL NICHOLS' life really exemplified public service at its very best.

As for me personally, when I was first elected to Congress, BILL was always there to offer his help and his guidance. Through his example, we learned a great deal about what it takes to be a good representative of the people. We all know that BILL rose through the ranks here in Congress to become one of America's leading experts on defense matters. We have already heard it said that the passage of the Goldwater-Nichols bill reorganizing the combat decisionmaking process at the Pentagon is a lasting testament to his work here. He has other testaments to his work.

This Goldwater-Nichols bill was important, but it was no more important than the legislation that he helped to get passed as a State senator to help the schoolchildren of Alabama to become competitive in the world.

Our Nation has really lost a great man, but we are comforted by the lasting contribution that he made during his service to America and his service to his fellow man. BILL NICHOLS made a difference, and we will truly miss him.

Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for his contribution.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. PICKLE].

Mr. PICKLE. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I would simply like to take this time to pay my respects to BILL NICHOLS as an individual and a strong American. BILL came to us as a very popular man from Alabama, not alone because he was an outstanding athlete or an outstanding war hero, but because he was more like people than anybody else. I think in this body of 435 people, BILL NICHOLS was more like us than anybody else.

He was simply a man of the people. We praise him for his contributions in the military field, and it is appropriate that we do, and we praise him also for his contributions in the agricultural field, because he was an expert on that subject.

□ 1300

I think there is something perhaps we might mention today that might be overlooked by some, and that is that BILL NICHOLS was a very religious person. Quite often the case is that those men who go forward in battle and become a national hero in the field of combat also have become some of the most religious leaders we have ever had. BILL NICHOLS never missed a Thursday Morning Prayer Breakfast. I do not believe in all the years that he came did he ever miss one, except perhaps when he was ill. He came not because he had any office to hold, he just came because he thought there was solace and help to be found in the discussion by his fellow colleagues about things that affect our Maker and our own services. He was a regular attender and he was a contributor.

Those of us who know him as the expert in the military field or the expert in agriculture also know that he was a man of high principle, high character. If we wanted to know something about a particular bill in his field, I as one would go to BILL NICHOLS and say, "What is our position? What is a good position on this particular bill that is pending before the Congress?"

If it was in his field, he would tell me, and I would believe him.

Now, you may say perhaps we ought to read all these bills, but we do not always have a chance to read them all. We rely on some people to give us their advice and suggestions, a very common practice that is done in this Congress. In his field when you talked to BILL NICHOLS, he would tell you exactly what his position was and why without trying to influence you or trying to coerce you or moving you in one direction, just gave you the facts, and based on that you could make your decision perhaps and know that you had the facts.

Well, I appreciate a man like that. I think the Members of this Congress do. I do not believe anybody ever served here who was not more genuinely respected as a man of the people, a good fierce American who believed in this country and believed in doing right and who exhibited all those traits as long as he was here in this House.

I will tell you, we have lost a good man, a great American, and we will remember him a long time.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague, the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. MARTIN of New York. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Alabama for yielding to me. I appreciate the gentleman taking this special order so we can pay tribute to a dear friend and indeed a hero of mine.

I would also like to be associated with the previous remarks made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PICKLE].

BILL NICHOLS was someone very, very special. When he was chairman of the Investigations Subcommittee of the Armed Services Committee, on which I was lucky enough to serve in my first term in that committee, he was a kind and decent religious man. No one in this body that we served with is more respected on both side of the aisle than BILL NICHOLS.

He was also very, very important to each and every serviceman and woman who serves this Nation in the large part he played on the Morale, Welfare and Recreation Panel, where I served with him, as well as on the Investigations Committee.

Traveling with BILL was quite an experience. It seemed to me that anytime I was traveling with BILL NICHOLS, I found myself in some garden spot like downtown Beirut or Panama.

Of course, BILL had lost a leg in World War II. Of all the places that we trekked through the dust and mud and up and down the stairs, at no time did BILL NICHOLS ever ask for any special attention. You know, after a long, long day and a lot of walking, he would get an opportunity to take that artificial limb off and relax for a few minutes and then it was time to strap it back on and go with the best of young people 15 or 20 years younger than he was.

I learned a lot in long conversations with BILL NICHOLS of what this body is all about, what America's defense should do and where it should not be involved.

Talking about that artificial limb, there is a great story that we enjoy, the people who know BILL and know his sense of humor well. One time he was down at Fort Hood when they were trying to get Congress to learn more about the M-1 tank. After they had been given a description, shown how to drive it and the tank was being fired, it came time for BILL to climb up in the turret. There was a young soldier there to explain what the schedule was going to be, to assist the Member and to teach him a little bit about the tank. With that tremendous strength BILL had in his upper body, he started climbing up on the side of the turrent when his foot struck the track. To the chagrin and amazement of the young trooper, the leg came tumbling down and the poor young fellow did not know what to do about it. He looked up and he said, "Congressman, what should I do?"

BILL looked down at him and he said, "I have already lost one leg in defense of my country. I don't want to lose another. Would you hand me that leg and we will get on with the program." Whereupon he strapped it on and the tank took off.

We have the opportunity to serve with some wonderful people here. BILL was one man I will never, never forget.

I also appreciate the responsibility that he gave to me as a Republican member, both on the Investigations Committee and as a member of the MRW panel. He taught us all a great deal.

To Carolyn and the family, what a lovely lady she is and a tower of strength, I wish them well. I want them to know that they are a part of this family, notwithstanding BILL's passing. We are indebted to her and the family as well.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Speaker, I thank the distinguished gentleman from New York.

Mr. Speaker, in concluding, let me wind up by saying that two of the closest friends that BILL had in the House were TOM BEVILL and myself, because we have known him as long or longer than any and have served so closely with him. For that reason TOM and I have taken this opportunity to share special orders. He will follow me with his own remarks and such remarks as other Members might wish to make.

In winding up, let me share with all of you a couple vignettes about BILL. Two or three remarks have been made about his artificial leg. BILL never let it slow him down. He was a horse. He was a charger. A lot of times it was not comfortable, a lot of times he felt bad, but he never said a word. He just kept on going.

BILL was a great hunter. That was his passion. He loved to hunt. I have been on many hunts with him, sat in a cold, cold duck blind or goose blind with him, sat on a cold stool in a dove field. I learned early on not to stand too close to him, because he would not let many come through. He was a crack shot. He was good. I have to hand that to him.

We were sitting in a goose blind one time on the Eastern Shore of Maryland. It was a terrible snow, ice, and about 2 inches of water in the bottom of the goose blind. I mean, it was cold. One person in the blind looked over and noticed BILL just had on a pair of rough shoes, instead of boots. We all were wearing insulated boots. So his friend looked at BILL and said, "BILL, my gosh, aren't your feet freezing?"

And he said, "Only one of them."

Well, I have been on many a hunt with BILL. I can only say that I have never known a man as popular as BILL, that so far as I know has not one enemy in the world.

The night before BILL died we were at a Christmas party at the White House. As has been commented on, he had open heart surgery about 3 or 4 years ago. He lost a lot of weight. He was taking care of himself. He was watching his diet. He was exercising daily and he was really in good shape.

We were sitting there at the White House at the Christmas party. I walked by and saw him and Carolyn sitting there. My wife and I went over and sat with them. In a little while I turned to my wife and I said, "You know, I have come, I have seen and been seen, and I'm ready to go."

Carolyn said, "BILL is, too. BILL has been up since before 4 o'clock. He went on a goose shoot this morning. He just got back and now he is here. He doesn't stay up until 9:30 very often at night."

That was the last time I saw BILL. He went home. His wife took him to work the next morning very early about 6:30, which he often did. He was found slumped over his desk from a heart attack. The White House party was the last time I had seen him.

I have known BILL and worked with him for 25 years. We had adjacent districts in Alabama. We had adjacent offices up here. We shared constituents. I cannot tell you how many times I have had people from his district, a river separated us from one another as far as districts are concerned, Prattville was in his district, Montgomery is my hometown. So many times people from Prattville I would run into would say, "Congressman, I just want you to know, I voted for you every time."

I would say, "That's fine. Where do you live?"

They would say, "Prattville."

"That's BILL's district."

The same thing would happen to him. We got confused by names quite often, but I was always very proud when that was the case.

My wife and Carolyn are very close friends. They really are very fond of each other. It is with particular sadness that we mark the passing of our good friend, BILL NICHOLS, and wish our very best and God's mercies on Carolyn and the family in the travail and in the heartache that they have endured as a result of BILL's passing.

So Mr. Speaker, at this time I yield back the balance of my time in order that my good friend and colleague, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BEVILL] can continue with this tribute to our good friend, BILL NICHOLS.

TRIBUTE TO THE LATE HONORABLE BILL NICHOLS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BEVILL] is recognized for 60 minutes.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. BEVILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks and to include therein extraneous material on the subject of my special order today.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. BEVILL. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the distinguished gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SISISKY].

Mr. SISISKY. Mr. Speaker, I thank my friend, the gentleman from Alabama, for yielding to me.

Mr. Speaker, I feel fortunate to have served with BILL NICHOLS, both as a Member of the House of Representatives and on the House Armed Services Committee.

All of us can point to ladies and gentlemen with whom we have served who stand out as leaders and mentors for newer Members.

They are people who have been here for a long time, people who know the ropes, people who take a genuine interest in their colleagues.

BILL NICHOLS was such a man. He helped me understand the committee, helped me understand Congress, and gave me a better idea of what kind of Congressman I wanted to be.

He epitomizes high standards of service to this country. With an enviable war record in the European theater, he had a unique understanding of the military.

He also had the business sense that came from running a company, and tried to apply his experience, common sense, and good judgment to congressional decisions.

Bill's commitment to the domestic and national security of this country set a high standard for every Member of this body. His devotion to his family is equally praiseworthy.

All of us who knew him were better off because of it. His wisdom and friendship will be greatly missed. We would all do well to remember BILL NICHOLS is looking over our shoulders.

Mr. Speaker, this Nation has lost one of its finest citizens, and I have lost one of my greatest friends.

□ 1315

Mr. BEVILL. Mr. Speaker, I yield to my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HARRIS].

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, today we honor the memory of our colleague, BILL NICHOLS. Many of my colleagues in this House have served longer through the years with Mr. NICHOLS than I have, but I can say as the newest Member of the Alabama delegation that in my short tenure, BILL NICHOLS was a good friend, and a great help to me, both personally and professionally.

When I took the oath of office in January 1987, it was BILL NICHOLS who furnished the Bible, which he then inscribed and gave to me. No momento of my congressional career will ever mean more, no gesture of friendship will be more fondly remembered.

As one new to Congress and to the Alabama delegation, I had, and still have for that matter, much to learn. BILL NICHOLS was a counselor who was always available, always willing to share from his own experience and wisdom.

Perhaps the greatest lesson I learned from BILL NICHOLS came simply from watching him. At a time when many question the motivations and lack of comity in Government today, and point to rhetoric which replaces rationality, or political posturing which takes the place of sound public policy, the career of my colleague, BILL NICHOLS, shines forth as the example of a legislator who was effective in a quiet and gentlemanly way. BILL NICHOLS had the unique ability to be both loyal to his friends and to maintain total independence of judgment and action. Some may believe that loyalty always means blind loyalty, and others believe that independence in politics requires a critical stand toward all issues and individuals. BILL NICHOLS showed the true qualities of a statesman in his ability to balance and reconcile these potentially conflicting qualities. His work on the Armed Services Committee exemplifies this trait, especially the reorganization of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and the delegation of greater power to area military commanders. BILL NICHOLS was concerned with how instructions worked, even when his friends opposed changes he had come to regard as necessary. As chairman of the Investigations Subcommittee, he again demonstrated his loyalty to those who serve in our Armed Forces, and demonstrated that loyalty by insisting on rendering an independent judgment on the effectiveness of our policies and the actions of those placed in positions of authority.

Mr. Speaker, I'd like also to speak about the qualities of BILL NICHOLS the private citizen. As a man, he also demonstrated loyalty, loyalty to his family, to his church, and to his alma mater. All of us in the House know that a special effort must be made to balance the demands of our public positions with the needs of our families. I think BILL NICHOLS was exemplary in this regard. His wife, Carolyn, and his children, were always at the center of his concerns.

Throughout his years in Washington, BILL NICHOLS remained a member of the First Methodist Church in his home town of Sylacauga. In fact, he continued to serve as a teacher in the men's Sunday school class, and faithfully attended services there. I know that his religious conviction was deep, and that it was a source of strength and inspiration to him.

Mr. Speaker, as I thought about the remarks to make today about Mr. NICHOLS, I took out the Bible which he had furnished for my swearing-in ceremony and read the inscription in it and just opened it up and it turned to a verse of Scripture that I would like to share with the Members and the American people, and it is from Matthew 25, verse 40. Mr. NICHOLS had this marked, and maybe it was marked for me. The verse reads: "And the king shall answer and say unto them, Verily, I say unto you, Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me."

A graduate of Auburn University, BILL NICHOLS was a star athlete, playing on the varsity football team. He continued his interest in his alma mater throughout his life, ultimately serving on its board of trustees.

Mr. Speaker, BILL NICHOLS was a friend, he was an adviser, he was an example of the qualities to which we all aspire, and I know my colleagues join me when I say he will be missed, and also that this world is a better place for BILL NICHOLS having walked among us.

Mr. BEVILL. Mr. Speaker, I yield to our distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONTE].

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, BILL NICHOLS has left us a legacy of competence, diligence and grace that makes every Member of this body feel good even in the face of the bitter loss his passing has brought to this institution. A man of immense courage and imposing presence, he was kind and patient almost to a fault. He was the living definition of the word genteel.

In an era of heros he was the genuine article. He wore his wounds from World War II as badges of courage and fortitude. That same indomitable spirit which made him a great athletic figure at Auburn also made him a leader in the halls of leaders.

His 30 years of public service both in the Alabama legislature and up here in Congress were characterized by unmatched devotion to duty. I always marveled at how fresh and ready he was when we got together very early in the morning for some recreation in the fields.

It was certainly understandable when one realizes that he was in his congressional office for work at the break of dawn every day. He was not a workaholic but no one had more devotion to his public service than BILL. He was always available for his constituents as well as his colleagues.

Whether he supported your position or not, his demeanor was the same. He was as tough as the chew of tobacco he treasured, but he was so smooth that when he won his point, his adversary in the discussion would always come away thinking he hadn't lost anything.

You know the measure of a man in the duck blind or along a stream. BILL had no equal in the love of the outdoors. It came naturally from his roots on the farm and it came instinctively from his ease in the wild. I've walked many a path with BILL. He was an expert shot. He operated outdoors as he did indoors—he seldom got excited and he seldom missed. Yet as much as he cherished birds on the wing, he always deferred to whomever was with him to take the first shot.

He loved his home district. Whether he was fishing in the Coosa or inspecting the tank rehab lines at Anniston, it was a joy to him. The third district of Alabama is blessed with beauty and the finest of our educational institutions, such as Tuskegee and Auburn.

The district represents the grace, beauty, patriotism, and devotion to which we all aspire in this great land. It is no wonder that the citizens of east-central Alabama sent this gracious, beautiful, patriotic man, who devoted his every waking thought to them, back to Congress again and again. He was a beacon of honesty, integrity, and friendship to all of us and we will miss him dearly.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to extend my deepest sympathy to his lovely and beautiful wife, Carolyn, and his lovely three children.

Mr. BEVILL. Mr. Speaker, I yield to my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ROWLAND].

Mr. ROWLAND of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding and my good friend on the other side of the aisle, too.

Mr. Speaker, I came to know BILL, I suppose, during our relationship at the Thursday morning prayer breakfast, since we sat next to each other, and I learned a lot about him then, the kind of person that he was. In fact, I thought I kind of had an in with the Committee on Armed Services, since he was chairman of the Oversight Investigation Committee, and all of the ruckus was going on about overcharging and things of this nature. BILL was really looking after that, and I would get a lot of information from him about that.

BILL has always impressed me as a fellow who would not quit trying no matter what the odds seemed to be. As we all know, he was at the Normandy invasion, and he lost a leg there, but that did not slow him down at all.

I recall, and maybe it was 3 or 4 years ago, when we were out of session and then came back, that during that period BILL had a serious illness. I recall his hair turned white, and I heard that he almost died, but he came back, and with the determination that he had, he regained his stamina. I know I would see him in the morning. We would exercise together in an area where I really saw him putting forth a great effort to do all that he could, and he would often come up to me while he was exercising and he would say, "Doc, check my pulse and see if everything is going all right."

Mr. Speaker, we developed a real close relationship during that period of time, the time that we spent sitting next to each other at Thursday morning prayer breakfasts. He was a true patriot in my opinion, a great American, and as so many other people here have said, he is going to be sorely missed by all of us.

Just this morning at prayer breakfast, I was sitting there and someone else had taken that seat, and some of us sitting around talked about BILL and how we missed him, and we will miss him sorely.

Mr. BEVILL. Mr. Speaker, I yield to our distinguished friend and colleague, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LEATH].

Mr. LEATH of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I want to join with the Members in showing my sympathy and my affection for our dear friend BILL NICHOLS. I know that a lot of people in our institutions know the devotion that BILL NICHOLS had to the Department of Defense, to the defense of this country, and things of that nature.

What they do not or did not know, a lot of them, is the devotion that BILL NICHOLS had to the men and women who served in the Armed Forces. I had the privilege not only to serve with BILL on the Committee on Armed Services for 8 years, but I had the privilege of serving with him on what we call the morale, welfare, and recreation panel, which not even many Members of Congress know exists. That panel has to do with the oversight jurisdiction of the PX's, the commissaries, the recreation facilities, and the qualify-of-life facilities for soldiers and airmen and sailors all over the world and their familes.

BILL NICHOLS spent hours every day working to make sure that that was what it should be, that the quality of life the troops and their families have, regardless of whether they were serving in Texas, Alabama, or Korea, Japan, or the Philippines or whatever, was better than it should be. BILL devoted really a lifetime to it. We would go to a military installation somewhere on a trip, and when everybody else, of course, would obviously want to go look at the troops and tanks and so forth, BILL NICHOLS would gently drift off and go look at the PX, look at the commissaries to see if the food was as it should be.

Mr. Speaker, as I said, when my dear friend, Bob Polk, died, whom the gentleman knew so well, in my lifetime, I have been privileged to know a number of outstanding people, but in that lifetime of knowing a number of outstanding people, I have known only a few remarkable people. I classify Bob Polk in that category, Mr. Speaker, and I classify BILL NICHOLS in that category.

I just want to say to Carolyn and the family that not only does my feeling for BILL NICHOLS go much deeper than affection, it does to love. That is the only term that I known to describe him, and I think that is not only true from me, I know it is true from the gentleman and the Alabama delegation. I know it is true from this House.

Mr. Speaker, no matter how long we serve here, I do not think there are many of us who can leave and have that said about us. We are going to miss BILL NICHOLS more than we know.

Mr. BEVILL. Mr. Speaker, today's tribute in honor of our good friend, BILL NICHOLS, is, for me, one of the saddest experiences I have had as a Member of the House.

I have never known a better man on this Earth than BILL NICHOLS. He and I worked together, side by side, for 30 years. We were elected together to the Alabama Legislature in 1958, and since that time, I looked upon BILL as a brother. He represented the best that is in our country. His loss has left a great emptiness in this chamber and within me, personally.

I am confident that there never has been a more patriotic person to serve in Congress. BILL proved his love of this country on the battlefields of World War II. He nearly died there, fighting for freedom. The wounds he suffered were deep and lasting, but they reenforced in him an abiding love of our land and a deep and lasting reverence for libery.

BILL dearly loved his family, his church, and the people of Alabama's Third Congressional District. He represented them with the greatest energy, commitment and integrity. I remember many times that BILL would leave this Chamber after a late night session, having worked all day, and then drive all night to his district so that he could fulfill a breakfast meeting commitment with his constituents.

I would find wise counsel in talking with BILL about important pieces of legislation on which the House was about to vote. Without fail, he would give good, solid advice. His first and overriding concern with any legislation was: Was it good for America.

And BILL's most significant piece of legislation was a perfect example of how he viewed his responsibility as a Representative and one of the senior Members of the House Armed Services Committee. The Goldwater-Nichols Act has been hailed as among the most significant laws passed by Congress, dealing with the defense of America. BILL worked for 5 years developing this legislation which strengthened the chain of command of our Armed Forces. It made our military and its leadership more efficient and effective.

Today, this country is more secure because of BILL NICHOLS.

BILL's success in Congress, and the love and admiration which his constituents felt for him, never changed his humble character. I am confident he could have been reelected to represent his District as long as he wanted to continue to serve.

I remember when I was inspecting a water project in Maryland, at the request of the local Member of Congress, and I met one of the citizens of Maryland involved in the project. When he learned I was from Alabama, he asked if I'd ever heard of a friend of his from Alabama, by the name of BILL NICHOLS. He and BILL had gone duckhunting together in Maryland for a number of years. I told him that BILL and I had been elected to Congress together and were close friends. He was shocked to learn that BILL, his duckhunting buddy, was a senior Member of the U.S. House of Representatives. In all those years, BILL had never mentioned that he was a Congressman. That's typical of how modest a man he was.

My wife, Lou, my entire family, and I extend our deepest, heartfelt sympathy to BILL's lovely wife, Carolyn, and to his three children. BILL's family gave him love, strength, and happiness. I know how proud he was of them, and how proud they are of his many accomplishments, and in the life that he lived.

BILL NICHOLS remained a kind, down-to-Earth, humble man all of his life. I deeply miss my friend from Alabama.

□ 1330

Mrs. BYRON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEVILL. I yield to the gentlewoman from Maryland.

Mrs. BYRON. Mr. Speaker, let me say first of all that for many of us in this body, today has been very difficult.

When one stands and talks about a good friend a colleague, someone they have looked up to over the years, it is always difficult.

At the same time, many of us as freshman, and each of us has had that first day when we have stood in this Chamber and put up our hand and sworn allegiance to our country, our district, and our fellow Members of Congress, there is always some Member that sort of takes you under the wing and makes sure that you are given the right guidance. Ten years ago I had the opportunity to have BILL NICHOLS take me under his wing. I do not think there could have been a better person to do that. I was new. I was inexperienced. I was naive. He trained me well, I think. I looked at the views and the values that he had toward his country, toward his family, and toward his colleagues in this body, and there is no one who had higher esteem for this institution.

His war record was one that he was so proud of. Many of us journeyed to Europe, to Normandy to visit for the 40th anniversary. BILL was very much a part of that delegation. But he had another mission on that trip. He very quietly slipped off and went up into France and into Belgium and into some of the areas that he had trod as a young man in 1940 through 1944.

We all look back on issues and things that make a man. As many of us know, BILL NICHOLS had a wooden leg. But he was not encumbered by that.

We went to investigate Lebanon during the altercation in the early 1980's. There was a deuce and half that we were to ride into the airport. I made a comment to one of the gentlemen standing there, one of our military Marine Corps escorts and I said, "You know, I think it would be better if Mr. NICHOLS could ride in the cab; it might be a little difficult for him to get up in the back of the truck."

The gentleman said, "Oh, I didn't realize." And I said, "Well, yes, he has a wooden leg."

By the time I had turned around, BILL NICHOLS was the first one on the back of that truck.

One of the things he liked to do, at least he told me so, was to see what our young men and young women do in their jobs out on the front lines. Last summer I had an opportunity with Admiral McKay, the head of our nuclear Navy, to accompany BILL on his first ride on a nuclear submarine. They had figured and rigged a cage to get BILL on because of his leg, and because the other one had a very heavy brace. We got down into the submarine and we were out at sea, and he looked at me with those wonderful, kind eyes, and that big smile, and he said, "BEVERLY,," and I said, "Yes, BILL?" He said, "I really could have come down that tower, couldn't I?"

I thought for a moment, and there is no way that I could have told him that he would have had difficulty, because I know that had BILL NICHOLS made his mind up to go down that tower he would have gone down inside of that tower.

I watched him relate to the young people that we had on board that submarine. He would talk about their mission, talk about how far away they were from home, many of them from areas that were inland, a lot of them never having been to sea before, but they had chosen the Navy and had chosen the nuclear Navy, and had chosen a mission and a role that was very difficult. But he identified with them, he talked to them. He told them his philosophy. I know that each and every one of those young men, as is true of all of the military families that his life had touched, were saddened, and this country is a sadder nation for the loss of BILL.

In the last year I do not think anything gave him more pleasure than to talk about his new Greek grandson. What pride he had to talk about that young child that was coming along, and the joy and the happiness of his family and what that meant to him.

So I want to join with the gentleman in the well and to thank him as well as the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DICKINSON] for taking this special order today to really address what I think is a great loss to this Nation of a very fine American.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEVILL. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I was sitting here reminiscing and ruminating over the many things that come to mind when I think of BILL NICHOLS. As the gentleman commented, he served with him 30 years, and I have served with and been very closely associated with him for at least 25 or more. There are so many little vignettes and so many stories that come to mind.

But I think the story of BILL would not be complete if I did not put it in the RECORD, because it is a true story, an event that took place about 6 years ago as the new Congress at that time was being organized. The Democrats get together and elect who will be the chairmen of the various committees, and BILL was fourth in the seniority, and it normally goes by seniority. To the surprise of many people, there was an upset in the election, a coup if you care to call it that, when Mel Price, who had been the chairman for many years, but was advancing in age, was not reelected. That left a seat open.

The number two man asked BILL to make his nominating speech then since he was next in line, and BILL agreed to do it. Then before it was over, many, many people came to BILL and urged him to run, telling BILL that he was the most popular, and he was, in line of seniority, and knowing what I know after 24 years on the Armed Services Committee, I am convinced it is true, and I think most of my Democratic colleagues would agree that it is true that if BILL had been elected to be chairman of the Armed Services Committee, if he had allowed his name to be put in nomination, and the gentlewoman from Maryland was there, I believe, he would have won, he would have been chairman. I think he knew that.

He said, "No, I have agreed to nominate and support someone else. I have given my word. That is what I am going to do, and I will not agree for my name to be placed in nomination."

As a consequence, BILL was not elected chairman. And again, getting back to what has been said repeatedly here, his word was his bond. If he told you he would do something, he would do it. If he gave his word, you could take it to the bank.

BILL, having given his word, stepped aside and did not compete for the position when I am absolutely convinced that he would have been made the chairman of the Armed Services Committee had he sought it. But true to his word, he supported another candidate, and so BILL wound up as the chairman of the subcommittee on which he served when he died.

That is just one more measure of the man that I think it behooves us all to think about when we talk about service, integrity. He was always a very great believer in the system, and this I think is just one more reason to salute the memory of a great and a true American.

I thank the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I join with my colleagues in expressing my sorrow at the passing of our friend and colleague, BILL NICHOLS of Alabama.

I have served with many Members, but none have stood better with his colleagues than BILL. All of this was so evident at the funeral services where so many who worked with him were there, including what seemed to be the whole town.

We lost a great friend and the Congress a valuable Member.

BILL NICHOLS' record of service to the people of his district, State, and Nation will benefit all for years to come.

To his family we extend our sincerest sorrow at his passing. Truly, he leaves a great record.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I want to join my colleagues who are paying special tribute today to the Honorable BILL NICHOLS, who served in this august body for 22 years before a massive heart attack ended his life in December.

It is a privilege to say that I served in the U.S. House of Representatives with BILL NICHOLS. He set a standard of representation of the people which we should follow. The people of the Third District of Alabama were served well on this floor and in these Halls. He looked after his local people from the Tuskegee Institute and Auburn University to the bedroom counties bordering Montgomery and Birmingham, and they showed their approval by continuing to reelect him for the 12th time shortly before he died.

He served those of us in this institution well by paying close attention to his committee duties. He was a solid rock in the foundation of the Armed Services Committee, not failing to question when the need arose, but a strong supporter of the military. He voiced his concerns about the defenses of the Marine barracks near Beirut before the truck loaded with explosives crashed the gates and killed 241 servicemen.

As a veteran and staunch defense ally, he took the helm of the Subcommittee on Investigations and reformed the procurement process.

As we look back today over his distinguished career of public service, we all can say that BILL NICHOLS could be a formidable foe, a committed ally, but always a gentleman in Alabamian and southern sense of the word.

Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Speaker, we have lost a colleague whose record of service to this Chamber is long and distinguished.

Representative BILL NICHOLS is gone and today this Congressman proudly remembers the great friendship we developed over the many years. Such friendship makes our loss hard to bear, but the memories are great and everlasting.

Both of us were artillery officers during our Army careers. We shared a love of country and patriotism. We had jointly attended the 100th anniversary of the Army post at Fort Sill, OK, and we both felt very strongly about service to the Nation.

In his capacity as a high ranking member of the Armed Services Committee and chairman of its Subcommittee on Investigations, BILL NICHOLS worked tirelessly in the Congress to make military policy work for America in the best possible way.

He put his talents and energy to work on behalf of the enlisted men and women who made the military work. The everyday men and women who provide the fuel for the great engine of our armed services. These people were the focus of BILL NICHOLS's great compassion and efforts.

Now and then a Member of Congress will come our way who shows us the true color of public service through hard work and diligence. Chairman NICHOLS brought that color to its brightest in his support of the U.S. armed services. He was always ready at an instant to help any colleague on any matter and his energy was without end.

To his family we extend our heartfelt sympathies and we want you to know that we valued above all our friendship with this great man. He will not be forgotten by us. We have 1,000 different remembrances and recollections over the years to keep us company. And those are the memories that outlast us all.

Mr. SCHULZE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to pay tribute and remember a good frined and great man, the late Congressman BILL NICHOLS, of Alabama's Third District.

For 22 years, this body had the privilege to know BILL's dedication to public service and love of country. It is only appropriate that today we honor those contributions and commitment he held so dear.

BILL was a hero and leader many times over, even before he came to the U.S. House of Representatives. He showed his courage first on the football team of Auburn University, where he captained the 1940 squad. Passing up a professional football career, he chose to utilize his education in agriculture and agronomy by advising Autauga County farmers and counseling 4-H Clubs.

When his country needed him to serve in World War II, BILL was prepared, having trained for military service in Auburn University's ROTC program. BILL entered the Army in 1942 as a second lieutenant, quickly distinguishing himself in combat. As a result of his heroics at the Battle of the Hurtgen Forest, Germany, BILL earned the Bronze Star and the Purple Heart.

After retiring from the Army as a captain, he returned to Alabama, where it did not take BILL long to find himself giving to the community again. He distinguished himself in the Alabama Legislature with his efforts to improve Alabam's education system, to help the handicapped, and to create better roads in the State. Understandably, BILL received the capitol press corps "Most Outstanding Member of the Alabama Senate" award.

Elected to the U.S. Congress in 1966, BILL took his expertise in agriculture and the Armed Forces to Washington. Frankly, I am certain all of us here today would agree that we benefited from his understanding and leadership on the most important issue facing America—protecting the Union. BILL could always be counted on in the Armed Services Committee to define the proper defensive posture the United States must pursue. For one, I am grateful BILL NICHOLS was watching out for all of us. Certainly, the United States is better for it.

There is no question BILL will be missed in this body, friends and patriots always are.

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Speaker, as we are all painfully aware, in the past few years there has been a barrage of criticism in the news media about the lifestyles of certain Members of Congress. In fact, in today's edition of the Washingtion Times there was an article which capsulized some of the well-known newspaper stories about Members over the past 15 years or so. Of course, as the ranking minority member of the House Committee on Standards of Official Conduct for a number of years, I had to deal with these problems on a first-hand basis.

There is no question that Congress is constantly under a microscope, and in a free and open society this is to be expected. However, as a famous radio and television commentator pointed out, there is always another side of the story. And, our late friend and colleague, BILL NICHOLS, represented the other side of the story. BILL NICHOLS' political career was symbolic of what people expect in their elected officials. He was the model, the very ideal of what Plato and Thomas More had in mind when they described what a public servant should strive to attain.

I served with BILL NICHOLS for the better part of 18 years, and I can say without rservation or equivocation that he was one of the most outstanding public servants it has ever been my privilege to know. His honesty and integrity set a standard that should be emulated by every young person who strives for public office. He set a role model, and when he was taken away from us in such an untimely way, our consolation was that his example will live on in the hearts and minds of everyone who works to perfect the democratic process.

There were so many fine traits of BILL NICHOLS to admire that I hardly know where to begin in enumerating them. First and foremost, he was a gentleman of the highest order and a true American patriot. He loved the institution of Congress, and he always placed the institution above his own personal interests. As a valued member and leader for years of the House Armed Services Committee, he fought a long, hard, and successful battle to reform Pentagon procedures and solidify the chain of command. He understood the military establishment, and he worked tirelessly to help our Armed Forces meet the global challenges of the latter half of the 20th century.

BILL NICHOLS was proud of his native State of Alabama. He was a civic, business, and political leader in Alabama for years before taking his House seat in 1967. He was known throughout Alabama, and indeed, the entire South for his advocacy of agriculture and the need to expand the Nation's food and fiber production. Also, while working on his degree in agriculture at Auburn University, he excelled on the football team and was named team captain. What a lot of folks may not know is that he was actually offered a professional football contract. Of course, as most of us know, his football playing days ended for good when his left leg was shattered during World War II during the Battle of the Hurtgen Forest.

BILL NICHOLS was a genuine American hero. The product of the strong values of rural America, he possessed the true grit, determination, and courage that our great Nation must always have in its leaders. You cannot replace the BILL NICHOLS' of this world: you can only hope that such men will come to the forefront during times of crisis.

Mr. Speaker, I will miss the friendship, wisdom, and counsel of BILL NICHOLS. To his dear wife, Carolyn, and their three children I extend my heartfelt sympathy and deepest appreciation for sharing with us their husband and father who was an inspiration to us all.

Mr. ASPIN. Mr. Speaker, there are a few rare individuals who because of their character, standards, behavior, and physical presence indelibly influence the actions of others. They are the type of individuals by whom you and I judge our own actions. BILL NICHOLS was one such individual.

If I were asked to name an example of an American hero, it would be BILL NICHOLS. As a young man he excelled as a student leader and athlete. He was the captain of the 1940 Auburn University football team. His physical courage and bravery were demonstrated on the European battlefields of World War II where, like so many others of his generation, he was called upon to sacrifice himself in the service of his country. Sacrifice he did. Severely wounded, he lost one leg and the use of the other was severely limited.

Because he never talked about his injuries and learned to walk and carry on a normal life, many people who knew him later were unaware of the extent of his disability. But in remembering him we should reflect on the lasting physical courage that his very presence represented. As chairman of the Investigations Subcommittee he traveled a number of times to Central America during the midst of the hostilities—to El Salvador, Nicaragua, and Honduras. He visited the Marines in Beirut during the 1983 crisis and the Persian Gulf in 1987 at the outset of the recent incidents there. Despite his physical impairment, he rode in aircraft, helicopters, submarines, tanks, and even on flatbed trucks. Many Members will recall seeing him completely exhausted at the end of the day on one of these always-hurried trips, but somehow refreshed and ready to proceed the next morning. His leadership of the Defense Department reorganization effort in 1986 was interrupted by a quintuple heart bypass operation. He was back on the job in less than 8 weeks. BILL NICHOLS, throughout his life, courageously sacrificed his personal well-being for others.

But he exemplified much more than physical courage. He was a serious person—not humorless, but sincerely committed to making a contribution. A man of character, of strong conviction, he was also open to reasoned dissent. He had a presence that commanded respect—quiet, humble, extremely polite, sensitive to the feelings of others, and very dignified. He was a religious person with rigorous standards of conduct. He cared deeply for the people of Alabama and the members of the Armed Forces. Common sense, natural talent, hard work, and diligence combined to make him one of the best judges of defense issues any of us have known. It would be difficult to look back with the advantage of hindsight and fault his judgment on any major national security issue. Many have commented that it is difficult to think of the Committee on Armed Services without the presence of BILL NICHOLS.

Above all, BILL NICHOLS was a hero because he had the moral courage to take a stand on the major issues. Despite his principled, career-long support of a strong national defense, he took on the entire Pentagon, and the President, when he became convinced that change was necessary. The result was the Goldwater-Nichols Department of Defense Reorganization Act of 1986. It was my privilege to propose the amendment naming that Act for BILL. It is his ultimate legacy to the American people—the legacy of one who made heroic efforts on their behalf. It ranks in importance with all previous national security legislation, fittingly establishing BILL NICHOLS' proper place in the history of our country.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, it is a sad occasion for me to take note of the recent passing of my colleague and friend, BILL NICHOLS, with whom I served in Congress for over 20 years. Congressman NICHOLS was a fine and decent man whose concerns for the interest of his constituents in the Third District in Alabama were reflected in all of his activities.

As chairman of the Subcommittee on Military Personnel and Compensation he earned a reputation as the "Friend of the Serviceman" for his dedication at making the quality of life for military personnel the best it could be. BILL did a great deal for the military, but his concern for the less fortunate and his fellow man were well known and is a memorial in itself.

I join with you in commemorating his life and mourning his passing.

Mr. STOKES. Mr. Speaker, I want to thank our colleague, the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BEVILL] for reserving this time for us to pay tribute to our good friend, the late BILL NICHOLS. With his passing, the Congress and our Nation lost a dedicated and committed individual.

BILL NICHOLS was well loved by the Third Congressional District of Alabama. He won reelection time again with ease, and he never had any serious opposition. He worked well with his colleagues in the House, earning their respect, and he worked diligently and tirelessly for the Third Congressional District.

Mr. Speaker, BILL's energy in the House was spent mostly on matters dealing with the military. BILL NICHOLS fought valiantly for his country during World War II, losing a leg during a land mine explosion. It was fitting and appropriate for BILL NICHOLS to begin and end a career spanning two decades as the fifth ranking member of the House Armed Services Committee.

BILL NICHOLS career on the committee enabled him to assume several leadership positions. His first chairmanship was of the subcommittee that handles personnel matters, pay and benefits. Although he never served as chairman of the full committee, the accomplishments of this southern Democrat on the Armed Services Committee were significant. After the 1982 election, BILL became chairman of the Investigations Subcommittee. As a result of BILL's probe of procurement practices, a desire to change the basic structure of the Pentagon led to the passage of a substantial reform package in the House. BILL NICHOLS leaves a legacy of intelligent and compassionate leadership. His absence will surely leave a void.

Mr. Speaker, I have many fond memories of BILL. He was soft-spoken, courteous, and a real southern gentleman. He always conducted himself with dignity and was highly respected by his colleagues for his legislative skills.

I recall on one occasion calling upon BILL to assist with a problem one of my constituents had in Alabama. He was immediately receptive to the problem and worked on the case as if the constituent were his own. The matter was favorably resolved because of the personal attention BILL gave to the case.

Mr. Speaker, I am proud to have counted among my friends and colleagues a man such as BILL NICHOLS. I will miss him greatly and I hope that it is some comfort to his wife, Carolyn, and his many friends, that so many others in this Chamber share that emotion.

Mr. BATEMAN. Mr. Speaker, BILL NICHOLS' passing was a loss not just to his family and friends and his Alabama constituents, but surely to this institution, the House of Representatives, in which he served so tirelessly for 22 years.

It should be no surprise to anyone who is familiar with BILL NICHOLS record prior to his congressional service that he became such a distinguished member of the House, BILL NICHOLS excelled in virtually all aspects of his extraordinary career, from Auburn University where he received a masters in agronomy and was captain of the football team to his military service where he received a Bronze Star and Purple Heart after losing a leg in the Battle of Hurtgren Forest to the Alabama legislature where the capitol press corps named him the most outstanding member of the Alabama Senate.

I, came to know him late in his career as a colleague on the Armed Services Committee. I gained a quick admiration for his tireless support of the rebuilding of this Nation's defenses.

At the same time, as chairman of the Investigations Subcommittee, BILL was determined to see our military run more efficiently. He led the inquiry into the bombing of the Marine compound in Beirut and a probe into the Pentagon procurement program.

His expertise came to the fore in 1986 with the passage of what is known as the Goldwater-Nichols Department of Defense Reorganization Act, the most sweeping military reform in 40 years and one which BILL called his "proudest achievement."

Mr. Speaker, Thoreau once wrote,

Even the death of friends will inspire us as much as their lives.* * * Their memories will be incrusted over with sublime and pleasing thoughts, as their monuments are overgrown with moss.

I know that, in life, BILL NICHOLS inspired us in this House. I hope that his passing will also inspire us to live up to the high standard of public service he set and also to continue to fight for those beliefs he held so dear—among which was his belief that a strong and efficient military is vital to deterrence of war and the defense of freedom at home and abroad.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Speaker, our late colleague BILL NICHOLS was a Congressman's Congressman, a person therefore who was a fountain of good judgment for each of us who served with him.

He was also a spiritual leader, whose contribution to good fellowship in the House was well illustrated by his leadership in the House Prayer Breakfast group.

He was a magnificent man—we all miss him.

Mr. MYERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, it is with heartfelt deep sadness that I join the many friends of BILL NICHOLS in remembering his life and service to the U.S. House of Representatives and to his country.

BILL always distinguished himself whatever he did or wherever he was. He served in Europe during WW II as an artillery officer, losing his leg by stepping on a land mine. After a long hospital stay he came back to his home in Alabama.

After serving in the Alabama House and Senate he was elected to the 90th Congress and my friendship with BILL began. We were freshman among 69 new Members. Now there are only seven of us still serving in the House from that group.

Remembering BILL and his many years in this body, two things continue to come up. His loyalty and his integrity. It didn't really make any difference to BILL whether a colleague was a Democrat or Republican, he would share his time and suggestions with all.

This House, his beloved State of Alabama, the Nation are better today because BILL lived, he cared, and he shared.

It has been an honor for me to have known BILL and to have had the privilege of serving with him here in the House for 22 years.

My wife Carol joins us in extending our prayers to his wife Carolyn and their family.

Mr. MATSUI. Mr. Speaker, it is with great sadness that I rise today to pay my last and most sincere tribute to BILL NICHOLS. I know every Member of this House was shocked and saddened by the sudden death of BILL. His steadfastness and unswerving loyalty were traits that we all tried to emulate.

BILL's career in this body was remarkable. He always voted his conscience and fought for what he felt was right. BILL was a staunch defender of a strong and ready America and he did all that was in his power to ensure that America was strong, was ready.

BILL was always proud of the faith and trust emplaced upon him by his constituents. Their faith, as we all know, was not misplaced. BILL always had the members of his district in mind, arguing for a healthy steel and textile industry, providing for rural Americans, and extolling the joys and beauty of the South.

Mr. Speaker, this House has lost a true friend. There are many of us who looked to BILL for leadership and counsel. He never failed us. I offer my most sincere condolences to BILL's wife Carolyn and his children. Their grief is greatest but they had the joy of knowing BILL so closely for so many years and this hopefully will be of great comfort to them. I salute BILL NICHOLS for his selfless life and I salute his family for they all carry BILL in their spirits.

Mr. MILLER of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I want to join my House colleagues today in paying appropriate tribute to the late BILL NICHOLS—our good friend and distinguished colleague from the great State of Alabama. It is difficult for me to add to the words already expressed here today about BILL. He has been fondly remembered by Members from both sides of the aisle, and I want to endorse their fitting comments and wonderful stories about a terrific man.

BILL NICHOLS will be missed greatly in the Chamber. We have just celebrated the 200th anniversary of the Congress and, with all the bicentennial attention, I find it regretful that our friend BILL NICHOLS—who really reflected the very best that this House stands for and has stood for over 200 years—is not here to share this moment with us.

As we recall those who have labored long and hard for the good of their districts, the benefits of their respective States and for the best of the Nation, at large, we must remember BILL among those who provided the leadership America needs and deserves. He was a hero of World War II, and defender of the very principles of democracy that we are sworn to uphold daily, and the champion of what's right and proper about this Nation.

I came to Congress with BILL and I can assure his family that he had my deepest admiration and respect by any measure of the man. I extend my sympathy to his lovely wife Carolyn, and the Nichols family.

Mr. HORTON. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to share for a few moments some thoughts on our colleague BILL NICHOLS who passed away last year. I also want to relay the thoughts of the members of the 108th Infantry, 2d Battalion Association.

BILL NICHOLS will best be remembered for his dedicated and outstanding service as a member of the Armed Services Committee. Throughout his career, BILL made sure that our fighting forces were equipped for their missions. He was always a friend of GI's and worked to ensure that they and their families could lead comfortable lives.

BILL will also be remembered for his efforts to improve the efficiency and competitiveness of the Pentagon's procurement process. As the 101st Congress looks into the current problems with procurement, we should look to BILL's legacy for guidance on how to improve the current situation.

BILL's commitment to our Nation's defense started long before he came to the Congress in 1967. As many of us know, he was a decorated combat veteran who lost his left leg as a result of a land mine explosion in the Hurtgen Forest. Despite this setback, BILL led a fulfilling life.

Mr. Speaker, I also want to take a moment to share the thoughts of the men of the 108th Infantry 2d Battalion Association. These veterans developed a special relationship with BILL since they trained for the Second World War at Fort McClellan which is in the Third District of Alabama. In October of last year, the association recognized BILL's contributions to our Nation's defense with their "Award of Appreciation." BILL was also granted an honorary membership in the 108th Infantry 2d Battalion Association. My good friend Joe Taddeo, who is the association's president, asked me to pass along the group's condolences to BILL's lovely wife Carolyn.

My wife Nancy and I want to join in that sentiment when we express to Carolyn our most heartfelt thoughts and prayers. Mr. Speaker, the 101st Congress suffered a tremendous loss even before it began. It is my hope that the memory of BILL's dedication to this Nation will guide the new Congress toward excellence.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, I rise to join with my colleagues in the House of Representatives in paying tribute to Congressman BILL NICHOLS, whose sudden death on December 13 was a tremendous loss to the people of this Nation.

Congressman NICHOLS dedicated his life to public service, and I was privileged to have served with him during the entire 22 years he served as a Member of the House of Representatives.

Before coming to Congress, BILL NICHOLS served our country with distinction during World War II. He received both the Bronze Star and the Purple Heart for his heroic actions during this war. Also, he served in the Alabama State House from 1959 to 1963, and then was elected to the Alabama State Senate in 1963.

Elected to the 90th Congress in 1966, Congressman NICHOLS ably represented his constituents from the Third Congressional District of Alabama. His exemplary service as chairman of the Subcommittee on Investigations of the House Armed Services Committee helped to uncover faulty procurement procedures in the Defense Department. He also served as a member of the Subcommittee on Military Personnel and Compensation and the Subcommittee on Readiness, and was highly respected by his colleagues for his expertise on defense matters.

Congressman NICHOLS was a fine legislator, and a man of great compassion and courage, who will be sorely missed by all of us in the House of Representatives who had the opportunity to work with him.

Mrs. Annunzio and I extend our deepest sympathy to his widow, Carolyn, and to the other members of his family who survive him.

Mr. ERDREICH. Mr. Speaker, the death of my friend and colleague, BILL NICHOLS, has left a tremendous void in the lives of all those who knew him. His death was a great blow to his family and loved ones, but it has also had a tremendous impact on so many others. I certainly will miss his friendship, advice, and counsel, as will the rest of the Alabama congressional delegation.

His excellent and wise representation of the Third District of Alabama will most certainly be missed by those he so faithfully served, as will his honesty and integrity be missed by the entire Nation.

BILL NICHOLS always put the best interests of his State and country at the forefront of his political agenda. He was assigned to the 8th Infantry Division as an artillery officer during World War II, and distinguished himself in combat. He was critically wounded in 1944 and removed from action. For the bravery he displayed while risking his life on behalf of his country, he was awarded the Bronze Star and the Purple Heart.

Following his return to private life, and at the urging of his friends, BILL entered the political arena, and was elected to the Alabama House of Representatives in 1959 and the Alabama Senate in 1963. Again, his outstanding service won him many honors; in 1965, he was voted "Most Outstanding Member of the Alabama Senate" by the Capitol Press Corps.

BILL moved on to the national political arena in 1966, and was elected to the U.S. House of Representatives. After securing a position on the House Armed Services Committee and serving with distinction as a committee member, he rose to the position of chairman of the Subcommittee on Investigations and headed it through the end of the 100th Congress. The subcommittee examinations he initiated into defense issues led him to join Arizona Senator Barry Goldwater in introducing the Goldwater-Nichols Reorganization Act of 1986, which many have called the most far-reaching piece of military-related legislation to be approved by Congress in over 40 years.

During his 22 years in the House of Representatives, BILL served with a sense of fairness, always taking into account the concerns of the people he served in the Third District and entire State of Alabama. He was a good friend to all of us, and our State, and we have all benefited from his wise counsel. Our Nation is better off because of his leadership and we will all miss him tremendously.

Mr. QUILLEN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to join my colleagues in remembering our friend BILL NICHOLS who suffered a fatal heart attack and passed away last December 13.

Congressman NICHOLS represented the people of Alabama's Third Congressional District in the House for 11 terms with genuine distinction. It was an honor to serve with BILL NICHOLS during those 22 years and his passing is a great loss to all of us.

Congressman NICHOLS is probably best remembered as a hard-working, straightforward Member who was devoted to the armed services and the national security of the United States. He was a World War II veteran who lost a leg in combat and it was on the House Committee on Armed Services that Congressman NICHOLS made his mark during his long and distinguished congressional career.

Although he was without peer in his dedication to our armed services and their mission, Congressman NICHOLS was responsible for leading the effort which reformed the procurement system at the Pentagon and he also played a crucial role in the 1986 Defense Department Reorganization Act.

I will miss BILL NICHOLS. He was a fine and decent man, he was a patriot, and he was an outstanding Member of Congress. In this time of sorrow, I want to extend my condolences to BILL'S lovely wife, Carolyn, and their children.

Mr. CRANE. Mr. Speaker, the passing away of BILL NICHOLS leaves this Chamber with a loss it will long suffer.

BILL NICHOLS was a fine gentleman, a great patriot and an outstanding Member of Congress. He served as an Alabama Congressman for over two decades after his first election to the House of Representatives in 1966. Almost all of those years were particularly devoted to the workings of the House Armed Services Committee. He used his military background well in seeing that the Nation's defenses were built up to preserve our freedom from outside violence. He trained for military service in Auburn University's ROTC program prior to his graduation from that fine scholastic institution. Called to active duty following this country's entry into World War II, he served with the 8th Infantry Division and distinguished himself in combat in France and Germany until critically wounded in the Hurt-gen Forest. His courage under enemy fire won him the Bronze Star and Purple Heart decorations.

Not only did he strive to make our defenses strong, but he did his utmost to improve the quality of life for military personnel. Because of his endeavors, enlisted volunteers in America's armed services receive compensation and benefits more realistic to their worth than before BILL NICHOLS took up the task.

We were privileged to call BILL NICHOLS a special friend. He was a witty, intelligent Southern gentleman with whom we spent many pleasant moments.

BILL NICHOLS will long be remembered for the great service he gave to his country both in peace and in war.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Speaker, Representative BILL NICHOLS was not only a colleague but a good friend. We all share in the sorrow at the passing of this great man. He was one of the most beloved Members with which I have had the honor to serve. He was a devoted husband, father and spoke often of his family. He was a very devout man who without question was prepared to meet his God. He was a source of inspiration each Thursday morning when I looked across the table and saw him at the weekly Member's Prayer Breakfast. It was a comfort and a joy to know that he was always there. Not only did we look forward to this time of inspiration and breaking bread but we also shared a love for rural America and agriculture. Perhaps BILL is best described in this poem by Ben Burroughs:

IT SHOWS IN YOUR FACE

You don't have to tell how you live each day;
You don't have to say if you work or play,
A tried true barometer serves in the place,
However you live, it shows in your face.

The false, the deceit that you wear in your heart
Will not stay inside where it got its start;
For sinew and blood is a thin veil of lace,
However you live, it shows in your face.

If you have battled and won in the game of life,
If you feel you've conquered the sorrow and strife;
If you've played the game square and you stand on first base,
You don't have to tell it, it shows in your face.

If your life's been unselfish; for others you live;
And not what you get but what you can give
And you live close to God, in his infinite Grace,
You don't have to tell it, it shows in your face.

There is no question as to where BILL NICHOLS stood. His face reflected love for his fellow man. For him, an unselfish manner was the standard not the exception. Many that have come to serve in this great institution have found the system attempting to change their actions and motives. My friend BILL was in full control. And that, I believe, to be because of his relationship with his God. Well-done BILL, you have been a good servant of the people and you will not be soon forgotten by this great institution. As for me, I will carry fond memories and be thankful that BILL NICHOLS passed my way.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, it is with profound sadness that we gather to honor the memory of our late friend and colleague, BILL NICHOLS.

It somehow seems fitting that BILL'S last moments were spent in his office, at his desk, working at the job to which he devoted so much of his time and energy. For 22 years he served the people of Alabama, and his Nation, with honor and distinction. The BILL NICHOLS I came to know personally was not only a quiet but effective legislator, but also a man of rare courage and conviction.

As one of the ranking members of the Committee on Armed Services, and as chairman of the Investigations Subcommittee, BILL came to be widely regarded as a leader in defense policy issues. His tenure in the Congress was marked by a resolute commitment to strengthen and improve the readiness of our defense forces.

Mr. Speaker, for over two decades, from the depths of the cold war to the promise of glasnost, BILL NICHOLS was a central figure in shaping America's response to events in a dangerous world. We are a stronger nation as a result of his dedication, and I know I speak for all of us when I say that this House will sorely miss his expertise and his wisdom. I want to join with my colleagues in extending our deepest sympathies to his family and his many friends.

Mr. DARDEN. Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DICKINSON], the ranking member of the Armed Services Committee, for sponsoring the special orders for BILL NICHOLS.

No other Member of this body exemplified the dedication to fair play and justice than did Chairman NICHOLS. He was always known for his ability to calm the storm and reach a bipartisan solution, which was always in the best interest of the Nation.

Mr. Speaker, I write a weekly newspaper column for the news media in Georgia's Seventh District. Following Chairman NICHOLS' death I believed it fitting to express my feelings about BILL to my constituents, and more importantly, point out the impact he had on the military strength of our great Nation. I ask to insert a copy of this column in the RECORD:

[A report to the Seventh District, week of February 13, 1989]

BILL NICHOLS LEFT LEGACY OF NEW STRUCTURE FOR THE NATION'S ARMED SERVICES

(By Congressman George (Buddy) Darden)

Bill Nichols once told someone that he "put in a little time in the service—combat time." He did not add that a land mine explosion in World War II cost him a leg.

Bill knew, from personal experience, the everlasting damage that war brings. That may well have been why he worked so hard to make sure his country's armed forces were so strong and well-organized that they would discourage any potential adversary from mounting a challenge; he wanted to save future generations from having to share his experience.

Until his death just before Christmas, Bill was Alabama's 3rd District Congressman. He was a valuable member of the House Armed Services Committee, and the Chairman of its Investigations Subcommittee. And, in the five years we worked together, he became my good friend.

Bill died suddenly and unexpectedly on a Tuesday morning. He had easily won reelection to a 12th term only five weeks earlier. At age 70, and with a history of heart trouble, you might have expected him to take it easy while Congress was out of session. But he had gone to his Washington office before sunrise to begin getting ready for the 101st Congress, and it was there that a fatal heart attack struck.

Just the night before, Bill and his wife Carolyn attended the annual White House Christmas party; Lillian and I had an enjoyable time discussing with them our plans for the coming year. President Reagan took time to greet Bill and thank him for his strong support of the President's defense budget.

Bill's credentials as a proponent of a strong national defense were unassailable, and that reputation served to his—and the nation's—advantage in recent years as he demanded reform of the Pentagon's management structure and procurement system. He knew that only a strong America could survive military challenges; he also knew that strength could not be maintained if inter-service rivalries took precedence over well-coordinated military operations, or if public support for the armed forces was undermined by reports of outlandishly high costs for weapons and other supplies.

Through his leadership of the Investigations Subcommittee, he pressed the Pentagon to pay more attention to program and weapons costs. He became the primary House sponsor of legislation to streamline the military chain of command and give the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff more power to impose unity among the service branches. That reorganization measure came to be known as the Goldwater-Nichols Act, honoring Bill Nichols and its leading proponent on the other side of Capitol Hill, then-Arizona Senator Barry Goldwater.

Bill Nichols was always courteous and considerate of all his colleagues, whether they were senior or junior to him. I consider him a positive example for all members of Congress to follow, because he had that admirable ability to disagree without being disagreeable. He was a true gentleman, but he never failed to express or vote his convictions.

Mr. DYSON. Mr. Speaker, I thank my distinguished colleague, the ranking member of the Armed Services Committee for offering me this opportunity to remember a true American patriot, BILL NICHOLS. I again extend my sympathy to his wife, Carolyn, his family, his many friends, and the people of his district whom he proudly served for over 20 years.

I am honored that BILL considered me his friend. His leadership will be missed, not only in the House Armed Services Committee, where he distinguished himself as the chairman of the Subcommittee on Investigations, but by all of his colleagues and the Nation to which he dedicated his life.

I will always remember BILL NICHOLS as a gracious Southern gentleman. He was never too busy to give his advice when I requested it and he was never carried away with the trappings of his office.

In fact, I was recently told a story about BILL that I would like to share with my colleagues. On a recent stop at a small country store in my district, the owner told me that BILL NICHOLS had been a regular customer when he was goose hunting on the Eastern Shore. As a matter of fact, BILL had been going to that store for almost 15 years. This merchant knew him by sight and by the name of BILL NICHOLS. He knew his name because BILL had introduced himself on his first visit and because BILL always had the time to stop and converse when he visited this store. It was nearly 15 years before this storeowner learned that BILL NICHOLS was a Congressman.

When he recounted this story, my constituent told me that he would forever be impressed with Congressman NICHOLS because he was, and I quote, "One incredibly nice man."

I believe that is just the way that the thousands of people who met BILL NICHOLS in his career felt as well. BILL NICHOLS will always be remembered for his outstanding leadership and work in the reorganization of the Department of Defense, an accomplishment which will forever be remembered as the Goldwater/Nichols bill. In addition to his many legislative achievements, he will be remembered by most as a man who cared. He cared about his country and he cared about the people he served.

It was a privilege to serve with BILL NICHOLS. He was a leader among leaders and his service in this great body of government has permitted our country to become a stronger and safer nation.

Mr. REGULA. Mr. Speaker, BILL NICHOLS was a patriot, a good family man, a cherished friend to many of us, a respected colleague dedicated to the well-being of our Nation and his constituents, and a believer who lived by the golden rule.

We miss his wise counsel and the warmth of his friendship.

Mr. RAY. Mr. Speaker, BILL NICHOLS is remembered as a farmer, scholar, athlete, soldier, businessman, church-member, State legislator, U.S. Representative, and House subcommittee chairman. However, in my opinion, the best description of BILL NICHOLS is that of patriot.

BILL NICHOLS was born on a small farm in Mississippi. Soon afterward, his family moved to Sylacauga, AL, where he grew up. BILL graduated from Sylacauga High School and attended Auburn University. At Auburn, he was the captain of the 1940 football team and was accepted to three honorary fraternities: The Blue Key, Gamma Sigma Delta, and the Scabbard and Blade. BILL received a B.S. degree in agriculture and a master's degree in Agronomy.

BILL NICHOLS entered the army in 1942 as a second lieutenant and was assigned to the 8th Infantry Division. During the battle of the Hurtgen Forest, Germany, BILL was critically wounded. He was awarded the Bronze Star and the Purple Heart, and was retired at the grade of captain.

After the war, BILL returned to Sylacauga and entered private business. He became active in community affairs by serving on the Sylacauga School Board and on the board of stewards of the First Methodist Church of Sylacauga.

BILL NICHOLS was elected to the Alabama House of Representatives in 1959 and to the Alabama Senate in 1963. The Capitol Press Corps voted him the "most outstanding member of the Alabama Senate" in 1965.

BILL NICHOLS was first elected to the U.S. House of Representatives in 1966. Throughout his 11 terms of service he worked to keep the Armed Forces strong and efficient. He sought to improve the quality of life for our military people and earned the reputation as a "friend of the serviceman." Of his numerous legislative accomplishments, one of the most outstanding was the Goldwater-Nichols Reorganization Act of 1986 which restructured the Department of Defense. Many have said that this bill was the most far-reaching piece of defense-related legislation in more than 40 years.

I am proud and honored to have served with BILL NICHOLS these past 6 years. We worked closely on behalf of the people of the Third District of Georgia and the Third District of Alabama, and I always found BILL to be hard working and dedicated to his constituents. He was more than a colleague, he was a friend.

Mr. BEVILL. I thank my colleagues for their kind remarks and I yield back the balance of my time.

THE SAVINGS AND LOAN SCANDAL

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York [Mr. OWENS] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. OWENS of New York. Mr. Speaker, today is the day we celebrate the 200th anniversary of the Congress, and I think that it is a day when we should not speak about negative matters on this floor. I rise to speak again about the savings and loan association scandal because I think it is not a negative matter. I think it is a very important matter for this Congress at its 200th anniversary to confront this major problem, a problem unlike any other we have ever seen before, and confront it openly and with a maximum amount of discussion.

My great fear, my concern is that we are going to be presented with a bill on the floor and be asked to act upon it very speedily, and there will be a minimum of discussion instead of a maximum discussion needed among ourselves.

In addition to discussing the savings and loan association swindle among ourselves, there is a need to have a maximum dialog with the American people, because the American taxpayers are being asked to pay a bill of enormous magnitude. It is still climbing; is $154 billion now, and estimates are that it may go as high as $357 billion before it is over.

That is a tremendous amount of money and the taxpayers will have to pay a greater share of that. For that reason we need to maximize the dialog with our constituents.

I am not particularly interested in banking. I am not on the Banking Committee, but I am interested in the budget as a whole because in order for me to honestly have a dialog with my own constituents, I need to tell them the truth about what is happening with the savings and loan associations swindle. I need to tell them that when they complain to me as they did this morning, where I was in a breakfast this morning discussing the tremendous cuts being proposed for health care, $5 billion in cuts, and how that cut will impact on the hospitals of New York City.

I learned to my surprise the hospitals in New York City are among the most efficient hospitals in the country.

We are not happy with our hospital service, but it seems that in terms of the cost of service per patient our hospitals are doing a good job. But they cannot continue as they are, and they cannot certainly continue to survive if they have to take a huge Federal cut.

In addition to health care we have the problem of education. I serve on the Committee on Education and Labor. I was looking forward to the proposals to be presented by the incoming President, Mr. Bush. He said he wanted to be known as an education President. I looked forward to his proposals. Surely we would go forward, I thought, and tackle the tremendous problems we face in education in this country.

Because I serve on the Committee on Education and Labor and because I am the chairman of the Subcommittee on Select Education of that committee, I am very much aware of the magnitude of the problems in our schools.

We have two very serious problems. On the one hand the very best schools in America are not good enough in terms of world competition. When our young people are matched in tests, the very best are matched in tests for science and math with youngsters in other parts of the world, they come in either at the very bottom or near the bottom.

That is one problem, that our very best schools are not good enough and we need to tend to that.

The other problem is at the other end of the scale our worst schools are totally collapsing. The school systems of Chicago and New York, the inner-city school systems are collapsing. They are not able to come to grips with the problems with which they are faced. No matter how they doctor the statistics, how much lack of truth there is in reporting, you still see the tremendous surge in the number of young people who are dropping out of school.

Then ever worse than that is that the number who stay in school; with the kind of education they get, it places them educationally at the same spot as the persons who dropped out. When they come out of the 12th grade, they cannot read nor write any better than those who dropped out at the 9th or 10th grade. It is a very serious problem.

Articles have appeared, studies have been made which indicate that schools are collapsing in the inner cities to the extent that they do not have enough chalk or erasers.

Now, we know about the large class sizes, we know about the deteriorating infrastructure, the buildings falling apart, we know that; but it has gotten down to the fact where teachers do not have chalk, they do not have erasers. Libraries in most inner-city schools are completely obsolete. They are libraries with geography books that do not show the nations which have become independent in Africa over the last 10 years because the geography books are more than 10 years old.

On and on it goes. I could go on with the horror stories.

I am not here to make the case for education. I think it is pretty much accepted that we have to make up for a tremendous deficit, a loss in education, a deficit in education over the last 8 years when our schools fell behind in terms of the effort being made by the Federal Government to assist in the improvement of the schools.

We are all disappointed that our President, who says he wants to be the education President, has come forth with some proposals that looked good when we first heard them, when the President stood there and presented his budget message. I like most of the other Members of Congress was pleased that here at last we do not have a President who is boasting about the fact that he has made tremendous cuts in education or other domestic programs.

Lo and behold when the euphoria wore off, and we looked at his proposal, or the great things he proposed, at the same time he proposed that we cut all of the domestic programs by $11.4 billion; all the nondefense programs are going to be cut by $11.4 billion. You have to spread the cut out.

The great deception of the President's message was that while he proposed increases, he did not say that in order to get these increases in certain areas you are going to have to have decreases in other areas.

Education, in order to get the benefits of the increases proposed in education alone, you have to decrease and cut off other programs in education. Education will take a hit there.

Education will take another hit because education is the largest of domestic programs that does not have entitlement programs.

Many of the other domestic programs have entitlement programs where people must be given service. So only the programs which do not have entitlement programs, such as education, are the ones that could be cut in order to get the $11.4 billion cut.

That means that education in the first year of the reign of the education President, education will be taking a larger cut than anybody else. And the public out there would be the last to understand this, because though they heard the President's speech as we did, they do not have the details.

Now that all the analyses have been made, this is where we are: education faces worse cuts, health care faces worse cuts. There is no chance we are going to be able to bring relief to the senior citizens out there who are concerned about the surtax and the catastrophic program. On and on it goes.

I have to face my constituents and tell them that I do not really think they are going to appropriate enough money to make the war on drugs reasonable.

I have to face my constituents and tell them that I do not think that there will be any relief from the Federal Government in terms of low-income housing.

I have to face my constituents and tell them all this because we say we do not have the money. That is what I have been doing for 7 years. This is my seventh year and I have been going back and saying we have a deficit, we do not have the money, we do not have the money for job training programs, the money for education, the money for women, infants, and child care; we do not have the money and we are in a deficit. We are trying to get rid of a deficit.

I have told them these things while at the same time, of course, I have had to watch while we found money for other things we wanted to find, money for. We wanted to bail out the millionaire farmers with a drought relief bill. We brought a $4 billion to the floor and we gave drought relief to everybody including farmers who were making $2 million gross per year.

The patterns of finding the money for defense, the Star Wars, for millionaire farmers, that pattern of finding the money for those who are powerful while you tell those who have no power that there is no money, that pattern is a pattern that I am thoroughly fed up with.

Now I see it again in the S&L scandal which is shaping up here where we are saying we are going to have to find the $157 billion to take care of the bankers, the financiers, people who are the least desirable ones in terms of subsidies from the Government; the least deserving recipients of Government subsidies, financiers and bankers.

Yet that is what it amounts to when you look at the savings and loan situation.

They have failed, they have a problem because people have stolen the money. In most cases they have stolen the money or they have been too incompetent and have managed the money badly.

The line between incompetence and mismanagement and thievery is very thin, especially in a business like banking.

Anything related to banks you assume that anybody who is in the business is not allowed to even put his foot in the door unless he has a certain degree of competence. He has to know arithmetic, know how to keep books, basic things which cannot go wrong in a banking setup, especially since the Government, the Federal Government steps in and says we are going to guarantee $100,000 deposit; everybody who has deposits up to $100,000 knows that the Federal Government would pay up to $100,000.

The Federal Government is involved and I do not see them allowing incompetent people to come in to run banks. So I do not buy the line that there is a lot of incompetence and mismanagement that has generated this crisis. I say thievery. Thieves, thieves stealing—with middle-class people they usually call it embezzlement—but these are thieves who are stealing and they have generated the present crisis.

We have to go back and tell our folks that no, there will be no relief, we have nothing to look forward to. The American education system will depend on the Federal Government for no help because we have to take care of the savings and loan association scandal, swindle, bailout.

The savings and loan association scandal is probably the worst of its kind that this Nation has ever faced; the worst ripoff, the worst raid on the Treasury.

I said this a few days ago and since then I have noticed there are some other people who have come forward with documentation that makes it quite clear that a number of the things I said a few days ago make sense.

One of the things I said a few days ago was we should get to the heart of this matter by emphasizing prosecution. Instead of being soft on white collar crime as this Congress always is, we scream and yell about other kinds of crimes, but when it comes to white collar crimes Congress is generally quite soft.

Let us take about up to 25 years in jail for anybody who has committed economic crimes on the magnitude and scale that will help to wreck the economy of the Nation. That is what has happened. This savings and loan scandal can really set in motion a process, a domino process which will do serious harm to the economy.

So people who have been involved in creating this situation should be considered criminals; they should be tried and they should face many years in prison.

I say if they are faced with a situation where they are being prosecuted and properly treated as the criminals that they are, then you will find more answers will be found in places where they do not seem to have the answers; that many will come forward, and the tradeoff could be that. Instead of prison you pay back everything that has been taken out. Instead of the taxpayers being asked to pay back what the thieves have stolen, let those thieves go back to their Swiss bank accounts and their hidden assets and come forward with the money.

In American Banker of February 28, not too long ago, the date is February 28, American Banker has this account of a felon who was convicted in a fraud case related to the savings and loan association. And the felon is going to make restitution up to $20 million, which they found that he has that he can pay back.

The man's name is Mr. Renda.

Mr. Speaker, I read from the American Banker article:

Restitution is a key element of the settlement reached last weekend in the suit against Mario Renda by the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation and Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation. Mr. Renda was President of First United Fund Ltd., a now-defunct money brokerage firm in Garden City, New York. Mr. Renda, 47, already pleaded guilty to two criminal charges stemming from S&L fraud. At the sentencing on March 10 in Federal Court in Kansas City, he faces up to two years in prison.

I think he should be facing more than 2 years in prison. That is just one more indication of how we are soft on white-collar crime.

But anyway, to go back to the article and I quote again:

The civil suit relates to Mr. Renda's admitted role in defrauding Indian Springs State Bank and Coronado Federal Savings and Loan Association. Both institutions, based in Kansas City, Kansas, were declared insolvent as a result of the fraud scheme.

Now listen to this quote:

It is relatively rare for courts to require forfeiture of personal assets by individuals who plead guilty or are convicted of fraud.

Why is it relatively rare? In our judicial system obviously we are also soft on white-collar crime. That is a basic correction that is needed which Congress should take a look at.

But, again, to quote from the article:

But it will become more common as government focuses on prosecuting fraud at financial institutions, according to officials of the FDIC and the FSLIC. The agencies also hope the threat of restitution will prove to be a powerful deterrent to fraud.

In a weekend speech to Iowa bankers, FDIC Chairman L. William Seidman said his agency will push for court ordered restitution in cases involving fraud at banks and S&L's placed under FDIC supervision.

We think such orders should be requested and granted as a matter of course to minimize the cost of criminal acts to the appropriate insurance funds.

The article continues:

"Court ordered restitution is one of the key prongs in the FDIC's efforts to stop a bank fraud," said Christopher A. Byrne, senior attorney with the FDIC. We are actively engaged in a program to sensitize local prosecutors and the courts to the importance of restitution.

Now I say this, not reading the whole article, but my point is that instead of Mr. Bush tacking on $50 million at the end of his plan to bail out the savings and loan associations, as an afterthought almost, the money for the prosecution should be up front. That should probably be much more. If prosecution goes forward, taxpayers will probably have to be asked to bail out or to pay a much smaller share of the money that has been stolen from the S&L's.

Also, I would like to call attention to an article of the New York Times of February 20 where they are discussing an S&L that has failed and the regulators made a statement at that time. I take exception to the statement.

And I quote:

Regulators found no evidence that fraud had been committed. They attributed the institution's failure to "loan-underwriting deficiencies, a failure to maintain appraisal reports, poor maintenance of books and records, and insufficient internal routes and controls." In short, laxity in the approval process for real estate loans during the boom years of the Texas economy ultimately produced huge losses when the economy turned down.

□ 1400

That paragraph is the kind of thing that the Federal officials have been saying for much too long. They found no evidence of fraud, but they found great evidence of poor bookkeeping, laxity of controls, and insufficient checking of loans. I say that if there was a red flag which goes up that lets us know stealing is taking place, it is when people begin to keep the books carelessly; it is when the procedures get loose. All that is a setup to steal. It does not happen when people do not want to steal. Everybody knows how to keep books; everybody knows the routine. If there is actually poor bookkeeping, then I take exception to the fact that regulators will say there is no evidence of fraud or no criminal activity went on, but we have all this incompetence. Whenever there is incompetence, I think some representation should be made by the Government that there is fraud. Instead of asking the taxpayers to pay this money back, they ought to assume there is fraud and go after the people with prosecutions, and then much more of the money would come back.

I would also like to take note of an article that appeared in the Barron's of February 20, 1989. That article is entitled, "Steal of the Century?" This article, entitled "Steal of the Century?" is written by an economist, Benjamin J. Stein, who is an economist and writer based in Los Angeles. Mr. Stein uses the word, "steal," but he wants to make it clear that what he is describing is really not criminal activity. And I agree with him. I have shifted now. Anymore when I talk about criminal activity, I want to take just a moment to say that I am talking about the magnitude of the giveaway and how all taxpayers had better be alarmed and informed about what is happening, and they should also be very angry at the Government regulators who have done this, because Mr. Stein describes how three large legitimate firms—one headed by William Simon, one by Robert Perelman, and one by Robert Bass—legitimately bought out some S&L's that were failing, and they did nothing wrong. They legitimately bought them out, but the deal made by the Government, by Chairman Danny Wall, head of the FSLIC, and his gang gave away so much that this article has been written as a protest against how all this taxpayers' money was given away.

How was it given away? In two ways. First, as tax losses. They allowed these people to assume tax losses of a tremendous magnitude for doing nothing. A moment after the deal was concluded, those companies were richer because they could write off all the tax losses of the failed S&L's they bought.

The second way the taxpayers lost was this: They guaranteed them against future losses so that in the companies they bought, if something went wrong in the future and they did not get their money back, they had a guarantee that the taxpayers are going to bail them out.

I am going to quote directly from Mr. Stein's article. He is talking about what it all adds up to when you do that:

By my humble calculations, just the forgone tax cost to the Treasury from the Bass-American Savings deal would have paid for several thousand regulators and investigators for about 5 years.

This is just the tax losses from one of these three deals that would have paid for several thousand regulators and investigators for a 5-year period.

I quote again:

The forgone tax collections from all of the S&L deals would have paid to hire a thoroughly competent staff of regulators for the balance of the century.

I continue the quote as follows:

One of the tragedies associated with these transactions is that they display such astounding inequity between hundreds of millions of ordinary citizens and a few billionaires. But the tragedy that should make taxpayers truly gnash their teeth is that the giveaways do not ultimately save a dime—and in the long run will be far more expensive than just paying off the depositors would have been.

Continuing with the quote:

Over time, the net worth deficit of the S&Ls—that is, the gap between the value of their assets and the value of their liabilities—will still have to be paid off by the taxpayers. The mergers, acquisitions and bailouts will not improve that situation by one iota. The bailouts, in fact, make it worse, in that the taxpayers now have to make up the tax subsidy as well as the portfolio losses. Further, to add to the government's losses, which is the taxpayer's losses, the bailouts are so cumbersome and attention-getting that they divert the government from closing down the hundreds of other S&Ls still open. Those S&Ls, like their fallen comrades before them, are still offering huge rates on government insured deposits. That skews the whole rate structure of the financial sector. As the dying S&Ls bid up the cost of capital to keep themselves afloat day by day and meet minimum asset requirements, the healthy, well-managed S&Ls are forced to compete and to pay irrationally high rates. In turn, this drags other S&Ls into financial trouble, and starts again the whole cycle of return on assets not keeping pace with cost of liabilities. As it is, the present cost is high enough: $100 billion or more. In the whole history of the United States; there is no precedent for a loss of that magnitude in a single episode of mismanagement and idiocy. One hundred billion dollars is more than the total wage of all the public school teachers in America. It is about the total income of all the active-duty soldiers, sailors and airmen in the U.S. armed forces.

I might point out, Mr. Speaker that at the time this article was written, the acceptable figure, referring to the $100 billion, was $150 billion. I specifically want to emphasize the last part of the foregoing article.

I have been quoting, of course, from Barron's February 20, 1989, an article written by Benjamin S. Stein.

I have two other items I wish to bring out, and I will close. An article in "In These Times" of March 1 of this year, just released yesterday, talks about the possibility of another solution. This is offered instead of Mr. Bush's solution, which is basically to sack the taxpayers, that is, the man who said, "Read my lips, no new taxes," the man who is going to find a deceptive way to make the taxpayers pay through the nose for what they have taken. That is the only way we can describe what has happened.

"In These Times" says this, and I quote:

> Meanwhile, consumer groups are beginning to attack the notion that taxpayers must foot the bill. On February 15 Ralph Nader proposed $40 billion in new taxes to shift the bailout burden from average taxpayers to the wealthy and corporations. Another plan will be proposed by the Association of Community Organizations for Reform Now (ACORN) and Rev. Jesse Jackson.
> Nader's plan advocates a 10 percent surcharge on corporate income taxes; 0.5 percent tax on stock sales, increasing the top marginal tax rate to 33 percent from 28 percent; and imposing new taxes on mutual funds, junk bonds, leveraged buyouts and luxury home mortgages. Nader says, "It's folly to place the burden of the S&L scandal on the backs of the average taxpayer instead of on the backs of those far more able to pay."

I disagree with Mr. Nader. I think we should not place the burden on any taxpayers. I think a way should be found to guarantee that the banks, the S&L's, the people who have stolen the money, will be forced to pay back the money and retrieve the money. If we are going to tax corporations and if we are going to tax the people who earn $200,000 or more a year, that money ought to go into education, it ought to go into health care, and we ought to use the money for women, children, and infants. There are many ways to use new tax money other than to pay for a bailout of the S&L's, which in essence is paying for the subsidization of thieves. We are subsidizing those who deserve to be subsidized the least.

My final document is one that I hope will become a part of every Congressman's reading material over the next few weeks. I hope they will pay due tribute to the new chairman of the Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs Committee, Mr. HENRY B. GONZALEZ. I hope they will read Mr. GONZALEZ' little statement called "Making the Bailout Workable." It is an analysis of the administration's plan to solve the current crisis. In the days and weeks since I have been searching for information which throws light on this very difficult and frigthening subject, I have found that this is a most useful and most thorough piece of information.

Mr. GONZALEZ lays out the facts here. Although he is the chairman of the Banking Committee, Mr. GONZALEZ states that he has received the Bush proposal and the bill has been introduced in the Senate, but as chairman of the Banking Committee he will not introduce the bill; he is only going to offer amendments when the bill comes to his full committee. Those amendments will seek to ensure the long-term viability of the Federal Deposit Insurance; second, that the Federal insurance depositer institutions will be kept free of fraud, insider dealing, and gross mismanagement to improve regulation; point 3, institute, quick, certain, and severe penalities for those who abuse, misuse, or defraud federally insured institutions; point 4, a flow of mortgage moneys that meets real housing and community needs; point 5, that the greater burden of the cost of the bailout will be borne by the industry and the affluent and not by the small depositor or the low- and moderate-income families; and point 6, access by individuals and communities to family services on a nondiscriminatory basis.

On that last point, it is very interesting to note that these very same banks or savings and loan associations that are now going bankrupt, that are now failing because of their mismanagement, because of their risky loans, are the ones who also refuse to give loans to local persons who need to get loans to buy homes. They are the ones who are guilty of racial discrimination most often, and recent studies have shown that redlining on the basis of race continues en masse in our big cities.

There is one section of Mr. GONZALEZ' statement which is called "Financing the Plan, the Need for the Full Truth," and I quote from that section:

> The bailout of the savings-and-loan industry is massive and requires the understanding and support of the American public. That support depends on the public's perception that they are being told the full truth, and that the day of smoke-and-mirrors projections has ended. It is essential that cost estimates be based on solid assumptions, not on calculations that have no chance of becoming reality.

And to do that, Mr. GONZALEZ further, in support of all that, offers a table and two simple charts in the back of his statement which say in essence that the cost to the taxpayer at this point of bailing out the savings and loan associations, if we take the $100 billion figure, is likely to be $45 billion. If we get premiums from the savings and loan association accounts and we sell off some assets, whatever we do, under his estimates, we are still going to have to have $45 billion of taxpayers' money concerned, and that will be the case only if we are honest, only if the President is honest and says that we need $45 billion now. If we buy them out right now, it will cost $45 billion, but if we do what the President is proposing to do, the same $45 billion expenditure will go up to $183 billion.

He is proposing to set up a separate corporation to sell bonds and use those bonds to pay off, pay interest on those bonds, and when they get through with that deal, the same people who ripped us off before will be richer than they were before, and they will be involved in that procedure also and take the profit from that, too.

□ 1415

But Mr. GONZALEZ, the chairman of the Banking Committee, says:

> Pay it now. Face the music. Do something to get $45 billion and you will save $138 billion, because the total cost if you don't do it that way, if you do what Mr. Bush proposes to do, will be $183 billion.

I close, Mr. Speaker, by saying that I am angry, I am outraged, I hope the whole Congress will understand the implications of what we are doing.

Nothing can be done about the deficit if we have to go and search for billions of dollars to bail our undeserving thieves and incompetents. Nothing can happen in terms of new initiatives to do anything about the problems we face.

We are going to have a dragon that eats up every dollar, every dime that is available, and that dragon is a despicable dragon. It is a dragon made up of thieves and incompetents, who do not deserve a single penny from the American taxpayers.

It is our duty on the 200th anniversary of the Congress to make certain that the people's interests are protected, that whatever happens we guarantee that the taxpayers are not the ones who are left footing the bill and suffer what thieves have done.

SENATE—Thursday, March 2, 1989

(Legislative day of Tuesday, January 3, 1989)

The Senate met at 9:15 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the Honorable TIMOTHY E. WIRTH, a Senator from the State of Colorado.

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray:

Eternal God, sovereign Lord of history and the Nation, we thank Thee for our Founding Fathers—their wisdom, their vision. Their intent is often debatable—their convictions are not. Help us take seriously those convictions, fundamental to their vision for nationhood.

On this significant day, we recall "We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights, that to secure these rights governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed."

Eternal Father, help us understand that a Creator God is basic to human rights, government dedicated to preserve those rights, and a sovereign people from whom that government derives its authority. We ask this in His name who is King of Kings and Lord of Lords.

APPOINTMENT OF ACTING PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will please read a communication to the Senate from the President pro tempore [Mr. BYRD].

The legislative clerk read the following letter:

U.S. SENATE,
PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE,
Washington, DC, March 2, 1989.

To the Senate:

Under the provisions of rule I, section 3, of the Standing Rules of the Senate, I hereby appoint the Honorable TIMOTHY E. WIRTH, a Senator from the State of Colorado, to perform the duties of the Chair.

ROBERT C. BYRD,
President pro tempore.

Mr. WIRTH thereupon assumed the chair as Acting President pro tempore.

RECOGNITION OF THE MAJORITY LEADER

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the majority leader.

THE JOURNAL

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Journal of the proceedings be approved to date.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SCHEDULE

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, at 9:45 this morning the Senate will recess in order to accommodate the 10 a.m. joint meeting with the House, which will commemorate the 200th anniversary of the Congress' first meeting.

Following the joint meeting the Senate will reconvene at noon. There will be a period for morning business between 12 noon and 12:30 p.m. with Senators permitted to speak therein for up to 5 minutes each.

At 12:30 p.m. the Senate will begin its deliberations on the nomination of John Tower to be Secretary of Defense.

In accordance with the schedule for Senate proceedings which I announced in January, it is my intention that the Senate will remain in session through this evening, Thursday being the late day in the schedule which I announced.

And as I indicated at the request of the distinguished Republican leader yesterday, it is my hope to take up the Derwinski nomination later this evening if the committee with jurisdiction acts prior to that time and recommends the nomination to the Senate.

RESERVATION OF LEADERSHIP TIME

Mr. MITCHELL. I reserve the remainder of my time and I reserve the leader's time for the distinguished Republican leader.

QUORUM CALL

Mr. MITCHELL. I now suggest the absence of a quorum.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. REID. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

THE DANGER OF CHEMICALS

Mr. REID. Mr. President, we utilize state-of-the-art chemicals in the manufacturing of materials for our Nation's defense. We pride ourselves on the results, which reflect enhanced performance and quality. But in the past year, things have gone astray.

Last May, I was made painfully aware of the danger of chemicals. In the town of Henderson, NV, where I graduated high school, right outside the heavily populated metropolis of Las Vegas, Nevadans witnessed the explosion of the Pacific Engineering and Production Co. The blast, triggered by chemicals used for the shuttle and other rocket systems, demolished everything in its path.

A blue ribbon panel, headed by then Lieutenant Governor—and now Governor—Bob Miller, studied the situation and concluded in a report that "the most unsettling fact we learned was that we have such limited knowledge regarding the identification, location, utilization and transportation of hazardous materials."

The Henderson study focused on the community's right to know about the potential hazards of chemicals utilized in plants near their homes. This is a perfectly valid concern, but let us not lose sight of an employee's right to know the dangers of the chemicals he comes into contact with on a daily basis.

At some point, impact on the employee spreads to others in the community. One man who was adversely affected by chemicals in an aerospace manufacturing plant comes home at night and is afraid to hug his 5-year-old son. The man fears that the chemicals will rub off on his son's skin, inflicting the same problems he himself suffers.

This man, and over 100 others like him, is the catalyst for a hearing I will chair Monday before the Senate Environment and Public Works Subcommittee on Toxic Substances, Environmental Oversight, and Research and Development. The hearing will focus on the potentially deadly chemicals handled by aerospace and defense employees.

These workers utilize new chemical compounds found in composites—a plastic-like material of great strength that is supplanting the use of metals and other materials. Scientists say composites will replace much of the metal now used in aircraft and automobiles within the decade.

These chemical compounds represent a new and improved technology—a definite boon to our production and manufacturing capabilities.

The effect has not been so positive for those who work with the chemical compounds. These people have experienced sickness, recurring pains, and—in some cases—tragic deaths from cancer.

I wonder, Mr. President, if we are promoting a strong defense at the expense of our hardworking citizens? Some of those plagued by health problems are involved in the manufacture of the Stealth Fighter, an aircraft that will be based in Nevada at the Tonopah Test Range Airfield. There is no question that this is good for Nevada, and good for the country.

But what happens to the people who build these planes—who work in a secretive environment referred to as the "Black World."

When employees aired their grievances, they were threatened with prosecution for national security violations.

Inspectors at the Occupational Safety and Health Administration are denied access to manufacturing facilities. They are kept from investigating safety conditions because of the top secret work that goes on behind closed doors.

Congress must ensure that Americans who work to keep our country safe are protected themselves.

Boeing's chief medical officer says: "Every single chemical we use is dangerous." Juxtapose that statement, Mr. President, with an editorial written by Lockheed's president of Aeronautical Systems in his company's employee newsletter.

He writes,

I cannot emphasize too strongly that we have seen nothing to indicate the materials we work with are fundamentally unsafe or pose a health hazard.

With these conflicting signals, it is clear that the present controls governing new materials and employee safety and health are inadequate.

We cannot dismiss what is happening now, as Lockheed does. Company officials claim they are barraged by mere "nuisance dust complaints."

If that is the case this certainly must be the most debilitating, damaging dust known to the world.

I hope that on Monday, with the spate of witnesses who will appear before the subcommittee, we can begin to shed some light on what is really happening, and what we can do to make sure that our defense workers are safe in their own country, and in their own workplace.

THE TOWER NOMINATION

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, later today we are going to move to the Tower nomination and I hope that we can have a good debate. As I said last evening, it is our hope that we can persuade our colleagues on both sides of the aisle to confirm the nomination. We will be addressing the reasons that we believe the nomination should be confirmed and I would also add that it is my hope that some on both sides, obviously, have open minds. We understand there are a number of each side who do have. We can make the case for John Tower.

I must say, also, that it is a bit more difficult when we pick up this morning's Washington Post and find a couple of well-leaked stories on the front page.

It is interesting to note that these leaks would appear today, the day the debate starts. They are not even included in the FBI report but available to some in the Senate Armed Services Committee and I assume someone there must have been the source.

So I would just hope as we get into this debate, we are going to base it on the merits, not on the leaks, not on more falsehoods and more rumors about John Tower, on some uncorroborated statement by somebody somewhere about incidents in 1976 and 1977.

He does not deserve that. The institution does not deserve that. And Members of this body do not deserve that.

While we hope that we can keep this debate on a high plane, it is going to be more and more difficult if we continue to see more and more information leaked to the press by someone—obviously, someone who wants to do in John Tower.

If we are going to have a high-level debate, as I trust we will, and if we can still find this spirit of bipartisanship, as I believe we can, then we have to be prepared to accept some responsibility on both sides for unfair tactics. Certainly leaking to the press matters that were not even in the FBI report, in my view, borders on being quite unfair.

I reserve the remainder of my time.

I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

JOINT MEETING OF THE TWO HOUSES—COMMEMORATION OF THE BICENTENNIAL OF THE U.S. CONGRESS

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 9:45 a.m. having arrived, under the previous order, the Senate stands in recess until 12 o'clock noon.

Thereupon, the Senate at 9:45 a.m., recessed until 12 o'clock noon and proceeded to the Hall of the House of Representatives to commemorate the Bicentennial of the U.S. Congress.

(For the ceremony in Commemoration of the Bicentennial of the U.S. Congress, see today's proceedings in the House of Representatives.)

At 12 noon, the Senate, having returned to its Chamber, reassembled, and was called to order by the Presiding Officer [Mr. SIMON].

MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, there will now be a period for the transaction of morning business for not to exceed 30 minutes, with Senators permitted to speak therein for 5 minutes each. The majority leader is recognized.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(The remarks of Mr. CHAFEE pertaining to the introduction of legislation are located in today's RECORD under "Statements on Introduced Bills and Joint Resolutions.")

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. President, may I inquire of the time limitations?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is under instructions from a previous standing order that at the hour of 12:30 the Senate will go into executive session. As a result, the Senator has about 4 minutes.

Mr. SANFORD. I think that I will wait until later to make my presentation then.

THE BUDGET DEFICIT

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. President, since we have 2 or 3 minutes, I will simply point out that I want to begin talking about the budget, about the deceit in the budget, about the fact that in spite of claims that we are reducing the deficit, we are not reducing the deficit, and that the debt is continuing to climb.

I view this as a matter of dishonesty. The debt is bad enough, and the deceit is even worse.

I think it is a matter of national honor and a matter of simple honesty. I want to talk about it when I can take the full time, and so I yield the floor.

JOINT MEETING OF THE CONGRESS CELEBRATING THE 200TH YEAR OF CONGRESS

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that remarks I delivered on the floor of the House of Representatives on this day be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the remarks were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REMARKS OF SENATOR STROM THURMOND ON THE HOUSE FLOOR, JOINT MEETING CELEBRATING 200TH YEAR OF CONGRESS

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, it is with great pride that I stand before you today as a Member of this historic body now celebrating its 200th year of service to our Nation. When 55 delegates to the Constitutional Convention met in Philadelphia in the summer of 1787 to structure a Government that would ultimately bind our 50 States, they faced a momentous task. How could they create a body which governed the people, and yet was governed by the people? James Madison perhaps said it best when he stated, "in framing a government which is to be administered by men over men, the great difficulty lies in this: you must first enable the government to control the governed; and in the next place oblige it to control itself."

This concern was addressed in the Constitution, our Nation's most important document. As designed by our ancestors in Philadelphia, the Constitution clearly states the role government should play in our lives. For more than 200 years our Constitution has provided the framework for a government which has survived and prospered through the frailties of man and the metamorphosis of a nation. We as the elected Members of this congressional body must never lose sight of the intentions outlined in this document. If we fail to abide by the limitations and directives put forth by our forefathers, then we fail to carry out the spirit upon which our Nation was founded.

Our past has been rich in growth and prosperity, a circumstance Members of the First Congress tried to envision when writing the Constitution. Although their task was daunting, their success was unquestioned.

Our future rests with abiding by the principles laid out in this historic document. Straying from its confines, which occurs all too frequently, can be dangerous.

As we celebrate this historic anniversay today, let us not forget both the spirit and intention of the brave men who penned the Constitution.

HAIL TO JAMAICA FOR THE PEACEFUL ELECTORAL PROCESS

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, the election held in Jamaica a few weeks ago in which Michael Manley once again was chosen to head the Government was indeed a significant event. It was especially noteworthy because of the peaceful electoral process, underlined by the absence of the bloody violence which took place in the election of 1980 but also by the remarkably civil manner in which Michael Manley and defeated Prime Minister Edward Seaga handled the outcome on election night.

Bruce Sundlun, a businessman from Providence and the Democratic candidate for Governor this past fall, was an eyewitness to this most positive process. Mr. Sundlun, with his experience as a member of the OAS election observer team in 1980 in his thoughts, describes in very clear detail election day in which Jamaicans peacefully voted to return Manley to power.

I recommend that my colleagues read Bruce Sundlun's piece which appeared in the Providence Journal on February 16 in order to gain a sense of the meaning of the peaceful election to Jamaica. I ask unanimous consent that the article be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WITNESS TO CHANGE: JAMAICA WILL MAKE IT

(By Bruce Sundlun)

HOPEWELL, JAMAICA.—In relative peace, Jamaica changed its government last week, in remarkable contrast to the violence this small country suffered during a change in power several years ago.

Michael Manley and his Peoples National Party won big, with 44 of the 60 seats in Parliament. He had previously headed the government from 1972 through 1980, when he lost to Edward Seaga and the Jamaica Labor Party in a violent election. Seaga won again in 1983 in a quickie election which Manley and his party boycotted, and this time Seaga was seeking an unprecedented third term. That and "time for a change" became major issues against him.

Last week's election was much different from 1980, when Manley was under Fidel Castro's influence, Jamaica was full of Cubans and guns, and 750 people were killed by thugs working for both parties. This time one woman was shot, apparently accidentally, by police; nine died during the whole campaign.

In 1980, I was with an Organization of American States observer team here in Hopewell, a hilly town of 15,000 voters on the northwest coast, near Montego Bay. Thugs had stolen all the rental cars from the airport and were riding around with rifles. There was fear of a military coup, tension in the streets, and hatred between each party's workers.

But last week in Hopewell, everything was calm, even dull, as 70 percent of eligible voters went to the polls under pretty good political organization. The polling places were secured by spic-and-span Jamaican police, soldiers in full battle dress with automatic rifles, and special constables with billy clubs. But all that force was not needed.

The people clearly wanted peace. Manley and Seaga had formally signed a peace accord guaranteeing no violence by their party workers, and the media had advised everyone to go home after voting, not to leave home with anyone claiming to be a policeman unless identification was sure, and to take down the license numbers of strange cars in the neighborhood. The process seemed to work well, and aside from some screaming and yelling at a few polling places in Kingston, there was an eerie quiet throughout the nation.

Early on election day, Seaga went on television to claim fraud, but there did not appear to be any evidence. Manley pointed out that the Election Commission was independent, with representatives from both parties, and its chairman was reporting things going smoothly.

At eleven in the morning, I went to JLP headquarters in Hopewell and had a friendly talk with Stanton Russell, headquarters manager, and Franklin D. Jackson, the JLP candidate from Hanover Parish. They told me there were 80 polling places in the parish, and they had seven people working each location, and four portable radios. The voting lists were computerized, and poll watchers were "guesstimating" the JLP to be ahead, 99-94.

At PNP headquarters, on the second floor of an abondoned building, there was a crowd of people who could not figure out why I was there, but politely let me through. Cleveland Wright, campaign manager and union representative, showed me his papers which forecast a PNP victory for Aston King by 1,700 votes. (He won by 1,424.) Wright was concerned that the JLP might try to vote the names of Jehovah's Witnesses, who don't vote, or people who had moved to the United States. His count showed the PNP ahead, 452-259.

At polling place 41-B, in a small church, there were four ballot boxes, each on a bridge table with an officer and a checker from each party—all women. They could not have been more pleasant, and showed me how voters dip their fingers in a semi-permanent dye, and mark their paper ballot behind a screen. The soldier and policeman on duty were relaxing in the shade.

At 3:30, PNP headquarters showed their party leading 920-523, and the JLP claimed to be ahead 2,113-1,530. Obviously, somebody was kidding himself; the results later showed the JLP to be wrong. At 4:15, a check at three polling places showed about 70 percent of the eligible vote in, with 45 minutes to go. There was no one in line.

The returns came in fast on the government-owned television station, and from the beginning, PNP candidates almost everywhere were winning. The commentators were very good, but the production reminded me of the 1950s. The news reports were terrible showing over and over the one pushing and shoving incident that occurred in Kingston, and disregarding the big story: The peaceful election.

Throughout the evening, the PNP lead was never in doubt, establishing a 57-43 percent advantage at 8:15 and holding all night. Commentators filled the gaps between returns with agreement that it had been bad to delay the election into the tourist season, that the acrimony during the campaign had been excessive, and that negative ads had been ineffective and rejected by the voters. Commentators pointed out that the results were the same as in the 1986 local elections, so not much had changed in two years.

Prime Minister Seaga graciously conceded at 10:30, relieving those commentators who had feared he might be bitter, critical and antagonistic. Prime Minister-elect Manley, who in 1980 had been called a communist, went out of his way to start his victory speech with a prayer by an Anglican priest. He, too, was gracious, saying it was "not a time to crow," and thanking the people for a second chance to lead the country.

He particularly praised the security forces for a peaceful election, and made clear that the winners in the election had "a responsibility to those who lost." He asked for a quick meeting with Mr. Seaga to discuss housing, education and training for the young, and closed by asking for God's help. It was an impressive speech.

The day after the election was a holiday in Jamaica, sunny and tranquil. The nation did well.

THE REFUGEE ACT

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, it has been less than 10 years since we passed the Refugee Act. That law was intended to eliminate our former ad hoc approach to refugee situations and to insure greater equity in our treatment of refugees. We believed it would eliminate the former discriminatory treatment of refugees by providing the Nation with a new definition focusing on the humanitarian plight of the refugees themselves—as opposed to national origins and political considerations.

The Refugee Act provided for a normal refugee flow of 50,000 persons per year with provisions for the emergency admission of additional refugees whose lives were placed in immediate jeopardy where their personal safety was threatened, or where there was an imminent possibility of their loss of freedom. The Refugee Act of 1980 was to establish for the first time a coherent and comprehensive U.S. refugee resettlement and assistance policy.

But the Refugee Act has not worked quite as well as we might have wished. While the bill raised the annual limitation on regular refugee admissions from 17,400 to 50,000, we have far exceeded the 50,000 in every year since the bill's passage. While we adopted the international nonideological definition of refugee, we have had great difficulty in eliminating our former bias in favor of persons fleeing Communist countries. While we intended to provide Federal support for the resettlement for all refugees entering the United States, we have been unable to find sufficient funding for all who we agree to admit.

There are so many complex reasons for the difficulties we are experiencing as we apply the Refugee Act to the current refugee situation. These include our foreign policy initiatives, domestic political pressures, and the current budgetary constraints. However, a significant factor in today's problems is the pure gimmickry involved in the law and the process. We are always so susceptible to gimmickry. We Americans. We have some Vietnamese who risk their very lives and that of their families in an unseaworthy boat trying to get to Thailand so they can find a brighter economic future in the United States; some Soviets who find that glasnost offers an opportunity to leave the Soviet Union for a freer life in America; and some middle-class Nicaraguans facing 20,000-percent inflation in their country who pay a huge sum to a smuggler to get them to America.

But those folks are all looking for "a better life" in America; they are not fleeing political persecution at home. They all have advocacy groups here in the United States who are pleading their cases and, in some instances, condemning the Federal officials enforcing the law who are charged with determining whether these peoples meet the definition of "refugee"—that being a person with "a well-founded fear of persecution based upon race, religion, nationality, membership in a particular social group, or political opinion."

The distinction among refugees, asylumees, immigrants, economic migrants, and humanitarian parolees is lost in the clamor as we stubbornly and sentimentally cling to the former definition of refugee—"escapees" from Communist or Communist-dominated countries.

While the Refugee Act intended the selection of refugees to be ideologically neutral, domestic pressures have resulted in one set of standards for refugee selection being applied in one part of the world, and quite different standards being applied in another.

While there is so much pressure to take large numbers of refugees, there is little or no support for private funding and voluntary resettlement of the refugees, as the Federal coffers dry up.

So now here we are as of yesterday, with a proposal, S. 489, to take the funding which we appropriated to reimburse States for the costs of providing education and other assistance to newly legalized immigrants. The funds are requested so that we can accept more refugees and fund the transportation, reception and resettlement costs of these refugees. While these funds are apparently not needed by the States in the current fiscal year, we specifically provided that the unused balance would continue to be available in subsequent fiscal years to address the expected higher level of need in the final years of the program.

A number of State governments, including my own, inform me—and justifiably so—that tapping the legalization reimbursement funds would not be wise policy. The States have programs in place, they can spend the money allocated to them, and to transfer it elsewhere would be to renege on a deal that was struck with them on the Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1986.

I am fully aware that for foreign policy reasons we will have persons leaving their homelands who we may wish to accept, whether or not they are truly refugees. I have no objection to making a special provision for that type of immigrant. I suggested to the Secretary of State a year ago that we needed a new category of foreign policy immigrant for persons such as some of those now receiving exit visas from the Soviet Union. Some individuals may have relied on statements of our Government which led them to believe that the United States would always accept them if they were to emigrate. Others we may wish to accept simply to make a foreign policy statement.

I look forward to the legislative proposal which the administration is preparing in order to deal with this type of immigrant. It will be very difficult to establish the criteria for use of this type of visa. What may work for the Soviet Union may not be suitable for Asia and Latin America. Some interest groups will always oppose it if Federal funding for the settlement of these immigrants is not included. Such a category will likely not be large enough to include all immigrants of this type who may wish to enter—just as we cannot accept all of the true refugees who may wish to enter, or all of the normal flow of immigrants who wish to enter.

We are facing some tough situations just like the current one in the Soviet Union where only a few hundred persons were receiving exit visas last January, but by December, 4,000 persons were given exit visas. Some estimate that as many as 100,000 Soviets may be allowed to leave in the next year. We cannot take them all, and it is so very important to acknowledge that unlike so many others in the world, most emigres leave the Soviet Union with a visa to enter Israel. They are not faced with the alternative of admission to the United States, or return to the Soviet Union. Most Soviet emigres have two "safety nets:" First, visas to Israel; and second, offers of parole into the United States, if their refugee application is refused. No other refugee group has these safety nets. We must explore this further along with so many other aspects of the issue.

I do look forward to receiving the new legislation from the administration, and I especially look forward to the opportunity it will give us to have a new, full and complete debate on our refugee policy.

DR. LOUIS W. SULLIVAN, SECRETARY OF HEALTH AND HUMAN SERVICES

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, yesterday we confirmed Dr. Louis Sullivan. I had not come to know Dr. Sullivan until he was tapped by President Bush to become Secretary for Health and Human Services. But I have come to know him since that announcement. He is a fine man with stunning qualifications.

I believe that Louis Sullivan will serve his President and his country with great honor and distinction. He comes from outside the Washington arena—beyond the beltway—as the insiders have come to call it. So he brings with him a lively and fresh perspective on the myriad of issues he will deal with—and he brings a new approach to managing the monstrous bureaucracy that is his agency.

As a newcomer, Louis Sullivan found that the roads here can be somewhat bumpy. But throughout the entire process—that at times had to be so personally tough for him—I believe he demonstrated all the great determination and sound good judgment necessary for his new role.

As Secretary for Health and Human Services, he assumes one of the hottest seats in Washington. For his agency deals with so very many of America's greatest problems.

Just some of the priorities: evaluating the benefits as well as the real benefits versus perceived shortcomings of the catastrophic health care law.

Promoting and developing legislation to ensure that rural health care providers receive adequate and equitable Medicare reimbursement under the Medicare Program. And working to assure that rural Americans have access to needed health care.

Determining the appropriate role for the States and the private sector in providing long-term health care.

Reassuring many skeptical Americans that Social Security will survive far into the future in its present form—and dealing with serious questions involving possible inequities between generations of Americans in the allocation of the domestic budget.

It is an agenda that is staggering in both its weight, scope and complexity—and I have named but a few issues.

Louis Sullivan takes on great responsibility—and he leaves behind a job in the private sector that he has enjoyed so greatly. He indeed characterizes the spirit of public service. He is a splendid man. A man of intellect and ultimate patience, kindness and gentle good humor. We welcome he and his charming wife Ginger to the new administration.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senate will now go into executive session to consider the nomination of John G. Tower, to be Secretary of Defense. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read the nomination of John Goodwin Tower, of Texas, to be Secretary of Defense.

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, today the Senate begins its consideration of the nomination of our former colleague John Tower for the position of Secretary of Defense. Last week, I joined with a majority of the members of the Armed Services Committee in recommending that the Senate not confirm Senator Tower to that position. It is with a sense of sorrow that I begin my duties on the floor as manager in opposition to this nomination.

This nomination has been a painful experience for the nominee and for his family and for all of his friends. It has been difficult for the Members of the Senate who served with Senator Tower and it has been particularly difficult for the members of the Armed Services Committee because most of us worked closely with the nominee when he served on the committee and know him well as a friend and colleague.

I might add that most members of the committee, I think, were favorably disposed toward his nomination when our proceedings started. I know that, when the proceedings started, I intended and felt that I could at the conclusion of the hearings in good faith support the nominee. My mind was changed by the facts that were presented to the committee.

We must, however, carry out our constitutional responsibility. The Constitution reflects the firm conviction of the Founding Fathers that the investiture of an individual in a position of great governmental authority is not the exclusive domain of the President. They clearly set forth the principle that this responsibility is shared between the executive and legislative branches, with the President nominating, choosing, and the Senate confirming by advice and consent.

The committee report on this nomination, including the executive annex, which is available to all Senators in the Office of Senate Security in S-407, contains a full explanation of the committee's action on the nomination and the reasons for the committee's action. I urge all of my colleagues to review both the public report, which has been available now for a couple of days, as well as the executive annex in S-407.

I might add that the minority has a report that is public and they have also an executive annex which is in S-407. So between reading the two public documents, one by the Republican side, the minority, and one by the majority on the committee, and reading the executive annex, I think a Member will be able to get a full flavor and a full understanding of where each respective side is coming from in reaching this important conclusion.

I want to take a few minutes to outline the process this committee used to review this nomination; to discuss the important role of the Secretary of Defense; and state clearly the committee's concerns with respect to this nomination.

Although the responsibility for nominations rests primarily with the President, the Senate's constitutional power to advise and consent establishes a responsibility for the Armed Services Committee to ensure that high standards are applied in the appointment of persons who are entrusted with the Nation's security and the Nation's defense. The committee's review on this nomination has in my view been the most thorough review of any nomination to come before the committee in my memory.

The responsibility for ensuring that the nomination is in compliance with applicable laws and executive branch regulations governing conflict of interest rests with the executive branch primarily. The Armed Services Committee, however, has traditionally held nominees to a higher standard than that required by conflict of interest laws and has conducted rigorous oversight of the financial interests of nominees to senior Department of Defense positions.

This has occurred under several different chairmen: Senator Stennis, Senator Tower, and Senator Goldwater. It is not new for us to be very careful on conflict of interest problems.

As part of the confirmation process the committee obtained Senator Tower's financial disclosure forms for this nomination and for his service as START negotiator as well as the financial disclosure forms available in the Senate Office of Public Records; his tax records for the last 3 years; copies of his campaign expenditure of fund filings and certain receipts; copies of all his defense consulting contracts and related documents; filings under the Federal Regulation of Lobbying Act; additional materials submitted by Senator Tower at the committee request, as well as his military service record.

The committee also received the letters required to be submitted by the nominee for White House counsel, Office of Government Ethics and DOD general counsel on the conflict of interest and related matters.

Prior to submission of a nomination to the Senate the Federal Bureau of Investigation conducts a background investigation of the nominee for the purpose of providing the President with information about the suitability of the prospective nominee. The report of the investigation is submitted to the counsel to the President who is responsibile for preparing appropriate advice to the President.

Sometimes it happens, in a transition period, that it is provided to the counsel for the transition.

The determination as to whether an individual should be nominated rests with the President of the United States. Thus, the preparation and review of the background investigation, financial disclosure statements and other initial material bearing on suitability rests with the executive branch.

The executive branch is responsible for the quality and the effectiveness of the background investigation. Not only does the administration control the conduct and direction of the FBI investigation, it also controls the underlying information. The material provided to the committee consists only of the FBI's summary of its interviews. The underlying interviews are not submitted to the committee and everyone should understand that.

What we have in S-407 is the summary of interviews the FBI conducted. They prepare the summary. We do not see nor do we have the underlying interviews.

The FBI considers the White House its client from the beginning through the conclusion of the background investigations. Moreover, the FBI believes that it must receive permission from the White House to proceed on any committee request. The White House has insisted—and this is consistent with past practices, there is nothing new about this—they have insisted that all requests for followup investigations from the committee be given to the White House first or at least simultaneously with our conveyance of those requests to the FBI itself.

On one occasion an attorney in the White House counsel's office during the course of this inquiry showed the nominee an allegation provided to the committee before that allegation was transmitted to the FBI. I must say that I was very concerned about that. Senator WARNER and I shared that concern. I took some steps, based on that concern. We were able to rectify it by direct conversations with Mr. Boyden Gray and we were able to put that process back on track.

But I think everyone should understand, the FBI does not feel that the Senate of the United States is their client. Their client is the White House and the information flow, both to the FBI and from the FBI, comes from the White House.

I think it is also important to point out that throughout the entire process the FBI report remains the property of the executive branch. The executive branch controls who sees this report and under what conditions. The terms under which the FBI report on Senator Tower have been made available to the Senate are very specific. The White House has insisted that it be reviewed only by Senators and by a very small number of staff in a secure room in the Capitol.

We were not able to get staff access for some time during this course. Only Senator WARNER and myself looked at the report for several weeks. Then it was broadened and finally we had a staff set up immediately before recess because we knew it was going to take a tremendous amount of work to be able to prepare the report in a form that people could understand as well as possible.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the letter to me from White House counsel C. Boyden Gray on February 14, 1989, outlining the agreement between the White House and the Armed Services Committee giving the members of the Armed Services Committee access to the FBI report be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, February 14, 1989.

Hon. SAM NUNN,
Chairman, Committee on Armed Services, U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: With respect to our conversation last Friday regarding access by the Senate Armed Services Committee to the Federal Bureau of Investigation's (FBI) summary of its background investigation of Senator Tower in connection with his nomination as Secretary of Defense, I am gratified that we have now reached an understanding on the way in which we will proceed.

I believe the fact that all of the Committee's subsequent deliberations involving the FBI summary on Senator Tower's nomination will occur during Executive Session only, that this nomination has significant national security implications, and the unique nature of the allegations concerning Senator Tower warrant a one-time only exception to the procedures governing access to FBI background investigations by Committee members.

The documents we will provide are extremely sensitive. Their disclosure could jeopardize the privacy interests of Senator Tower and others, the confidentiality of FBI sources, the FBI's ability to conduct background investigations, and our ability to recruit qualified candidates for positions of governmental service. Therefore, I am pleased that we have agreed on ground rules for Committee access that suit our purposes and yours. The enclosed Terms of Access sets forth procedures for access, custody, storage, and return to the Executive branch of the FBI background summary. With this understanding, we are prepared to deliver copies of these documents to your Committee immediately.

I believe that this understanding will make it possible for the Committee to proceed expeditiously on this nomination once the FBI has completed its investigation.

Sincerely,

C. BOYDEN GRAY,
Counsel to the President.

TERMS OF ACCESS TO THE FBI SUMMARY OF ITS INVESTIGATION OF JOHN TOWER (NOMINATION AS SECRETARY OF DEFENSE)

FEBRUARY 14, 1989.

The Counsel to the President has agreed to make available to the Senate Armed Services Committee (SASC) four copies of the Federal Bureau of Investigation's summary of its background investigation of Senator John Tower. (The FBI summary consists of the following parts: (1) summary memorandum (undated [December 13, 1988]); (2) summary memorandum (December 23, 1988); (3) summary memorandum (undated [January 6, 1989]); (4) summary memorandum (January 13, 1989); (5) summary memorandum (undated [January 25, 1989]); (6) summary memorandum (February 8, 1989); and (7) summary of the ongoing investigation not yet completed by the FBI.) Since these documents are the property of the Executive branch and involve extremely sensitive information, they will be made available only through the Office of Senate Security located at Room S-407, United States Capitol. Only Senators on the SASC and not more than 6 designated SASC staff members (as determined and designated by the Chairman, SASC, and the Ranking Minority Member) and designated members of the Executive branch shall be granted access to these documents at this location. The names of the designated staff members shall be provided, in writing, to the Counsel to the President prior to their being given access to the documents; and the names of the Executive branch officials shall be provided, in writing, to the Chairman, SASC, prior to their access at this location. A record of all persons using these documents in Room S-407 shall be maintained.

Access to these documents will be limited to Senators on the SASC and the 6 designated SASC staff members. These documents may be reviewed in Room S-407 only; no additional copies may be made; and no documents may be removed. Any notes derived from these documents shall be treated as sensitive and shall be used only in connection with the Committee's Executive Session deliberations (and vote). At the conclusion of the Committee's deliberations (and vote), any notes shall be destroyed or considered part of the FBI documents for purposes of this Agreement.

Within 14 days of the conclusion of the Committee's deliberations (and vote) on Senator Tower's nomination, these documents will be returned to the Counsel to the President unless another agreement has been reached with the Senate leadership.

Sam Nunn, Chairman, Senate Armed Services Committee; John W. Warner, Ranking Minority Member; C. Boyden Gray, Counsel to the President.

Public release of this document authorized by C. Boyden Gray, Counsel to the President, March 1, 1989.

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, this is a letter from Mr. Gray explaining the conditions under which we received this information. It is also a signed document here, signed by myself as chairman of the Armed Services Committee, as well as Senator WARNER as ranking minority member, and signed by Boyden Gray, counsel to the President. This stipulates the exact conditions under which we will be able to handle this report and have been able to handle it.

I might add that there has been a subsequent, I believe, oral agreement. The leadership will have to speak to this. It is an oral agreement with the leadership, Senator MITCHELL and Senator DOLE, which expands this agreement, because this agreement provided only for Armed Services Committee members and our staff and now, of course, other Senators, all Senators are permitted to view the report.

There are some who have suggested that the FBI report should be made public. I am sure we are going to hear that again during the course of this debate. I want to make it clear as far as our agreement with the President, I am not permitted to make that decision. Nor is Senator WARNER. This decision, as far as we are concerned, is entirely the President's decision since the executive branch considers the FBI report, quoting from that letter from Mr. Gray, "the property of the executive branch."

I should note what the White House counsel said in his letter to me on February 14, that is the letter I have just put in the RECORD, quoting from that letter:

> The documents we will provide are extremely sensitive. Their disclosure could jeopardize the privacy interests of Senator Tower and others, the confidentiality of FBI sources, the FBI's ability to conduct background investigations, and our ability to recruit qualified candidates for positions of governmental services.

I will just add that I think most members of the Armed Services Committee have respected the agreement of confidentiality under which the Senate was given access to the FBI report. Unfortunately, there have been some leaks of information contained in that report. Last week White House officials began characterizing the contents of chapter 7 of the FBI report on the evening of February 20, the day it was made available to the Senate. I can have a whole series of articles put in the RECORD quoting who had said what, in terms of category, about those various observations from the report.

There were leaks last week, some from Senators by name and some from unnamed White House officials, which culminated in a rather detailed description by a White House official in Sunday's New York Times on seven allegations against Senator Tower contained in the FBI report.

They were not direct quotes. They were basic explanations from the White House of their view of these allegations. But there were details given.

Of course, I took objection to that. I feel if anyone is going to put out any kind of paraphrasing or summary of an FBI report, we should make sure that it is a fair portrayal to the American public so there will not be misimpressions and I think that works both ways. It works as well for those of us on our side who do not favor this nomination.

We have an obligation not to put out anything related to that FBI report unless there is a common agreement to it and unless the President of the United States releases us. That is the obligation I have. That is an obligation I am going to keep.

I cannot speak for anyone else here. I think we all should remember, though, as important as this seems right now, and it is important, it is even more important that we preserve the ability of the Executive and congessional branches of Government to work together in keeping matters classified, whether they are classified for personal reasons or whether they are classified for national security reasons.

If we have a breakdown of that relationship during the course of this nomination, no matter who wins the nomination, the loser is going to be the national security of our country. It is up to the President to decide to release that report. It is not up to us. I would caution every Senator against revealing information in that.

Temporary tactics and advantages must not come in front of the national security. From my point of view it will not. I know I speak for Senator WARNER. I know he feels just as strongly as I do about this, because we have worked together as a team.

We come to different conclusions, but he has handled himself with total honor, total integrity. He has done his job in making sure that his side of the aisle has been protected and we have had almost a unique relationship during the course of this whole deliberation, as tough as it has been. As bad as it has been in many respects, I can assure everyone, if he and I and our staffs has not formed a joint approach to this and if we had not shared all the information simultaneously when it came in, whatever the problems, whatever the difficulties of this nomination, we could multiply it by a hundred.

I want to tip my hat to Senator WARNER. We are going to have vigorous debate during the course of the next 2, 3, 4, 5 days, whatever it takes. He has handled himself with total integrity, total honor and so has his staff and chief counsel, Pat Tucker. I salute both of them. I praise them for their efforts in this, even though we did reach different conclusions.

Mr. President, today's most recent leak, a story in the Washington Post, did not come from me and it did not come from my staff. I do not know where it came from. There are apparently two accounts of this incident: One summary prepared by the committee, which has been available to Senators, and as well an interview by the FBI, which was never contained in the FBI report, delivered to us and sent to the Senate, and thus not available to the Senate.

So I do not know where the leak came from. But I repeat, any leak of confidential information in inappropriate, it is unfortunate, it is unfair to the nominee, it is unfair to the Senate, it is unfair to the President, whether it comes from the executive branch or whether it comes from the Democratic side or Republican side; it is simply not fair. If we are going to have a process of giving information in an FBI report, I think it must be done in terms of under Presidential guidance, and it must be done officially, not by leaks.

Mr. President, the committee's access to the FBI report provides an important element in the constitutional system of checks and balances that is reflected in the Senate's advise and consent function. After all, if the President uses the FBI report as part of the information he uses to decide whether to nominate someone to a position, the Senate must be able to use the same information in giving its advice and consent to the nomination.

I hear people, and I know there is legitimate frustration about this in the news media, "How can the Senate of the United States use people who don't have names to evaluate whether we should give our advice and consent?" Everyone should understand, that is the same information the President of the United States uses to determine whether he nominates, and I think people ought to keep that in mind. If the process is flawed, it is flawed both in terms of the President's review, as well as our review.

There are many people turned down for executive branch positions in this administration, probably in the future, certainly in past administrations, probably in the future, certainly in past administrations, and who have been turned down by the same type of information that we are using here. Do I like it? No, I do not like it. I do not like the way we are basically having to proceed. Do I have a clear answer to it? No, I do not. Would there be a better method? We will all have to search and see.

I am a trial lawyer from a small town. I was brought up where you have a confrontation with your challenger. If someone is going to say something about you, you put them on the stand and cross-examine them. That is the way I like to do business. We have never done business that way. We have followed the normal procedure in this situation.

Everyone has to understand—I will address this later in the debate—if we decide to go that route, we will eliminate confidential information in virtually all cases coming to the Senate. We will probably by logic eliminate it in some fashion from the executive branch. That will greatly impede the ability of the FBI and the President of the United States from making a determination about selecting people for these posts.

Whether we like it or not, a lot of people will not give information unless their names are guaranteed to be confidential. I do not like that, but that is the process. That is what we are saddled with here. We are going to hear a lot of people criticize it. I will be the first to say I do not think the system is perfect. I think it can be improved, and I hope we can improve it in the future. But I do not have clear alternatives.

I think people, when they challenge the way we operate now, should also be required to point out how we should operate and still be able to give the President the best information he can have available to make sure that he does not put someone in a key position in Government who has a background that would not show up unless we did it in this kind of procedure where the FBI reports, as well as the Senate. We have to look at the same information.

Mr. President, the role of the committee with respect to the FBI report is to review the process and the information provided, determine if clarification or supplementation is needed, and apply the committee's own standards and procedures to the material and determinations provided by the executive branch. The committee also looks to ensure the material conforms to existing rules, regulations and laws. All members by now have had an opportunity to review the FBI report in the Office of Senate Security. They can reach their own judgment about the contents of this report.

I would be the first to say, as Senator Warner has said so many times, that people of good will can reach different conclusions based on that information. People of good will can come to different conclusions.

On December 16, 1988, when President-elect Bush announced his intent to nominate Senator Tower, the FBI report had not been completed. Indeed, the President-elect was provided with a document described as, "Summary Memorandum Containing the Partial Results of the Investigation of John G. Tower."

That is what is now called chapter 1 of the FBI report. Chapter 2 was completed on December 23, 1988. Chapter 3 was completed on January 6, 1989. It was at this point that the transition counsel informed the committee that the FBI summary of the investigation was available for review. That is when Senator WARNER and I got into the act.

We were provided that report in the form of chapters 1, 2, and 3 on January 7, 1989. We were together when we received that. Subsequently, at the request of both Senator WARNER and myself, additional information, known as chapter 4, was added to the FBI report, January 30, 1989, and then was provided to the committee. Chapters 5 and 6 of the FBI report were provided to the committee on January 25 and February 8, respectively. On February 7, the counsel to the President asked Senator WARNER and myself to delay the committee's vote on the nomination until new allegations that had been brought to the attention of the White House and the Justice Department could be investigated by the FBI. We were asked to delay, and we did. I think it was a proper request by the White House.

On February 14, 1989, the White House agreed to make the FBI report available to all members of the committee and a limited number of staff. Chapter 7 of the FBI report was made available to the committee on February 20. Chapters 8 and 9 were made available on February 28.

Beginning with the initial review of the FBI report on January 7, the committee worked with the FBI, the White House, as well as the nominee, to obtain additional materials to clarify certain information and to conduct the committee's own review. That process continued through the hearings and deliberations of the committee on the nomination. In the course of the committee's consideration on the nomination, the committee received hundreds of letters and phone calls concerning this nomination. To ensure that the FBI's background investigation was not burdened with useless or cumulative information, a procedure to screen allegations was set up by our staff. The staff first screened all material to determine which items contained allegations of misconduct as opposed to simply statements of opinion. The committee then conducted a followup to determine whether there were sufficient details to indicate that the allegation raised new matters and whether further investigation was warranted.

The staff determined that over 50 of the written and verbal allegations received presented no basis for further investigation. These materials were available for review, and they still are, by any member of the committee. But they were not used for the basis of any action by the committee.

There were various other allegations which were determined to be cumulative, other matters already set forth in the FBI report. These were contained by the committee for use in conjunction with its review of the FBI report. The committee continues to receive a significant volume of mail and telephone calls on this nomination. At the time this report was filed, the committee's screening process has resulted in nine charges forwarded to the White House and the FBI out of the hundreds of communications received by the committee.

On January 20, 1989, President Bush formally submitted to the Senate the nomination of Senator Tower to be Secretary of Defense. The committee met in executive session during the morning of January 25 to receive a briefing by myself and Senator WARNER to discuss procedures for acting on the nomination. The briefing covered the FBI report and the conflict of interest issues.

Public hearings began on the afternoon of Janaury 25 with testimony from Senator Tower on national security issues. Senator Tower testified again on the morning of January 26, when the discussion concentrated on his relationship with defense contractors. That afternoon, the committee received further testimony from Senator Tower on national security issues. On that day, the chairman, myself, also announced that testimony would be received from outside witnesses on January 31, noting that all requests to testify would receive appropriate consideration.

At the hearing on January 31, the committee received testimony from three public witnesses. During the afternoon on January 31 the committee met in executive session with two public witnesses, and then met in executive session with the nominee to consider conflict of interest and background matters involving conflidential or proprietary matters. The committee met again with the nominee in executive session on the morning of February 1, and then met in open session that same morning with Senator Tower to conclude its hearing on the nomination.

On February 7, the counsel to the President requested that the committee delay further consideration of the nomination until the FBI completed an investigation of a new allegation that had been brought to the attention of the White House. This new allegation concerned the "ill-wind" investigation into DOD procurement practices and whether Senator Tower was in any way involved in that. The committee has been advised by the White House and the FBI that no substantiation of this allegation has been developed in this investigation. The FBI's examination of this allegation as part of the background investigation is available to all Senators in the Office of Senate Security. The committee resumed its consideration of the nomination in executive session meetings on February 22 and 23. On February 23, the committee completed its deliberations on the nomination in a public session.

Mr. President, I should add at this point that on this question of the ill-wind business, we have not, I repeat not, we have not monitored the facts in those cases. We have taken the conclusions reached by White House counsel and the Attorney General and we have accepted those conclusions based on the tremendous sensitivity of this investigation, the number of people that are involved, the overall scope, and the fact it is ongoing. We did not feel we should get into our own oversight of the executive branch on those particular allegations. So we have basically accepted the word of the Attorney General and White House counsel as to when we should proceed and as to when those matters have been cleared up.

THE IMPORTANCE OF THE OFFICE OF SECRETARY OF DEFENSE

The importance of the office of Secretary of Defense is something that we should not underestimate in terms of this nomination. This is not simply another Cabinet position. All Cabinet positions are important, but the Secretary of Defense is part of the national command authority. Together, the Secretary of Defense and the President, they make decisions that concern the deployment of forces in the world, the questions of nuclear command and control; they make decisions that can affect not only the United States but the two of them together can change and alter world history with a mistake or any kind of action that is not taken with great consideration. So this is not just another appointment. This not simply a Cabinet position. This is a position that has unique responsibilities.

The Secretary of Defense is in the chain of command for military operations which runs from the President to the Secretary of Defense to the unified and specified combatant commanders in the field. The President and the Secretary of Defense constitute what is called national command authority for U.S. military forces as well as nuclear weapons.

The Secretary of Defense is, in essence, the deputy commander in chief. Just like the President, the Secretary of Defense must be prepared to carry out his military command responsibilities 24 hours a day. Many crises over the last 20 years demonstrate the round-the-clock military command duty of the Secretary of Defense. For example, the seizure of the U.S.S. Pueblo by North Korean forces which occurred shortly after midnight, Washington time, on January 23, 1968; the bombing of the Marine Barracks in Beirut, Lebanon, which occurred at 11:22 p.m. Washington time, on Saturday night, October 23, 1983; the shooting down of the Iran Air flight 655 by the U.S.S. Vincennes which took place at 2:55 a.m., Washington time, on Sunday, July 3, 1988.

In addition to commanding military operations, the Secretary of Defense is also the leader of our military establishment. He must be able to inspire the highest standards of behavior on the part of his subordinates. Indeed, his ability to lead depends in large measure on whether he commands the confidence and respect of his subordinates. Because lives, careers, battles and indeed the security of our Nation are at stake, we have consistently insisted on the highest possible standards of moral conduct and integrity from the professional military officer corps. The example that the Secretary of Defense sets will significantly influence whether these high standards are maintained.

COMMITTEE'S EVALUATION OF THE QUALIFICATIONS OF SENATOR TOWER

Senator Tower has a substantial understanding of national security policy and internationl security affairs. His 20 years service as a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee, including 4 years as chairman, his service as chief U.S. negotiator in the strategic arms reduction talks, known as START, and his chairmanship of the Tower Board have provided Senator Tower with a solid background on national and international security issues.

But the Secretary of Defense must be a person suited by personal conduct, discretion, and judgment to serve second only to the President in the chain of command for military operations; to set the highest leadership example for the men and women in uniform and civilian employees of the Department of Defense and to restore public confidence in the integrity of defense management.

Although Senator Tower has a number of strong qualifications for the position of Secretary of Defense, the committee concluded that Senator Tower cannot meet these standards and therefore should not be confirmed as Secretary of Defense.

The committee's major concerns focused on Senator Tower's standards of personal conduct, discretion, and judgment. These findings included excessive use of alcohol; the provision of consulting services to defense contractors on the probable outcome of ongoing, confidential arms control negotiations shortly after serving as an arms control negotiator himself, which created the appearance of using public office for private gain, and, I would add, a number of incidents of indiscrete behavior towards women.

I agree personally with each of these findings.

ALCOHOL ABUSE

The committee examined in detail the issue of Senator Tower's use of alcohol. There are serious allegations in the FBI report based on a number of firsthand, personal observations by named individuals with no known motive to lie. There are also allegations by unnamed individuals. These include incidents in the recent past.

There is also evidence on the other side of this question, and I will point that out right at the beginning. There is the record of Senator Tower's performance as the chief U.S. negotiator for the START talks in Geneva and on the Tower Board. By all accounts, Senator Tower performed well in these assignments. There are also a large number of testimonials by distinguished Government officials as well as Members of the Senate. As a matter of fact, I have a testimonial, I am sure, when he retired from the Senate, and I meant every word of it when I said it at that time. But the record of alcohol abuse by the nominee cannot be ignored. The committee had to determine whether Senator Tower has shown a pattern of excessive drinking in the past; if so, whether he has acknowledged and dealt with this problem; and whether this pattern continues into the recent past or even today. The record of the FBI report and the committee's own review show a clear pattern of excessive drinking and alcohol abuse by Senator Tower during the 1970's. Senator Tower and his close associates and friends have now conceded that he had a drinking problem in the 1970's. Even the administration has acknowledged that the nominee had a pattern of excessive drinking during this period. I must add that this was not the position of either Senator Tower or the administration at the beginning of this process.

There is substantial evidence that this pattern continued in the 1980's. I believe personally that Senator Tower has had a serious drinking problem in the 1970's and the 1980's including in recent years. The committee searched in vain for a point in time when the nominee himself acknowledged this problem and dealt with it decisively. The nominee made it very clear that he has never sought medical assistance for his drinking problem. There are significant inconsistencies in what Senator Tower told the FBI in the first report ready by President Bush in his first announcement, what Senator Tower told the FBI in subsequent reports, his executive session testimony to the committee, and his public statements.

There are inconsistencies in these statements, and these are addressed in the executive annex to this report which is in the majority report in S-407. Any Senator wanting to take a look at this train of statements will be able to do that.

Department of Defense Directive 1010.4 states very clearly that alcohol abuse "is incompatible with the maintenance of high standards of performance, military discipline, and readiness." Military commanders state that the selection and assignment of military personnel to sensitive positions of command or those involving responsibility for nuclear weapons are so rigorously controlled that alcohol abuse would result in immediate disqualification or transfer of anyone in that nuclear chain of command.

I think everyone ought to recognize this. Everyone ought to recognize we are not talking about the Secretary of the Interior. We are talking about someone that is next to the President, at the very top of the nuclear chain of command.

Senator WARNER and I spent 3 years or 4 years working on what we call "risk reduction," the risk of nuclear war. We have even succeeded partially in getting a risk reduction center set up between the United States and the Soviet Union. Every step we can take to reduce the risk of nuclear war, to reduce the mistake, must be taken, and I think all Senators need to consider the importance of this chain of command as well as the importance the military themselves given this chain of command, and the example we set here in this nomination is going to work its way down in the military forces of our Nation one way or the other—one way or the other.

If we do not care about these matters at the top, how can we expect the military people to care about them as it works down the chain of command? And I think every Senator should keep that in mind, and they may come to different conclusions. But I confess that has a great deal to do with my opinion. My view on this matter is cumulative. It is not one concern, not just this concern because there are others and I will enumerate them.

But I will make no apology for being concerned in this area and for setting this as one of my principal concerns and one of the principal qualifications that I believe we must have as a Secretary.

It is not only a question of behavior, even if that behavior is beyond question. It is a question of example. It is a question of example all the way down that chain of command. No one should diminish the importance of example in the military of our country.

Department of Defense Directive 5210.42—Nuclear Weapons Personnel Reliability Program—and implementing service regulations provide for the screening of all personnel selected for or assigned in positions responsible for nuclear weapons.

The DOD Directive sums up the Personnel Reliability Program screening and disposition policy with regard to alcohol abuse as follows:

Disqualifying. Any of the following traits or conduct shall normally be considered disqualifying.

Top of the list: guess what it is?

a. Alcohol abuse.

Alcohol abuse is defined in the DOD Directive as:

Any irresponsible use of an alcoholic beverage causing misconduct or unacceptable social behavior, or impairing work performance, physical or mental health, financial responsibility, or personal relationships.

That is the definition. I am going to read it again:

Any irresponsible use of an alcoholic beverage causing misconduct or unacceptable social behavior, or impairing work performance, physical or mental health, financial responsibility, or personal relationships.

If the Senate of the United States believes that is not important then we had better consider that in this debate.

Again, make no mistake about it. What we do here will have repercussions throughout the military services.

With regard to selection for, and assignment to, command positions, senior military commanders indicated there is no tolerance for alcohol abuse. Each of the military services views these assignments as special positions in the chain of command that must be filled by individuals who are not only professionally peerless but who are in control of their faculties at all times. They further indicated that command jobs at all levels are demanding in this respect; that all who aspire to command know this; and that rotations into and out of these positions recognize the demanding nature of these jobs.

The committee determined that Senator Tower's pattern of excessive use of alcohol in the 1970's and 1980's would disqualify him from being assigned to many sensitive positions in the Department of Defense. The committee determined that these disqualifying standards should be applied to the most sensitive position in the Department of Defense—the position of Secretary of Defense.

SENATOR TOWER'S ACTIVITIES AS A DEFENSE INDUSTRY CONSULTANT

From mid-1986 until December 1988, Senator Tower provided consulting services to a number of defense and aerospace firms, including LTV Aerospace & Defense Co.; Martin-Marietta Information Systems; Rockwell International, Inc.; Textron, Inc.; British Aerospace, Inc.; Hicks & Associates; and Jeford-McManus International, Inc. Senator Tower received a total of $1,028,777—gross receipts—from these firms during the approximately 2½ years he provided such services.

In the 13 months prior to his employment as a defense consultant, Senator Tower served as the chief U.S. negotiator for the strategic arms reduction talks [START] in Geneva. Shortly after leaving those ongoing talks, he became a consultant to companies, such as Martin-Marietta, Rockwell International, and Textron that are engaged in programs that are related to or under discussion in START, including the MX missile, the Midgetman missile, the Titan II and Titan IV space boosters, the advance launch system, enhanced guidance and control for the Minuteman missile, research and development on advanced missiles and reentry vehicle systems, support and follow-on activities for the B-1B bomber, and systems related to the strategic defense initiative [SDI].

Mr. President, this subject is addressed in the State Department directives which the State Department has issued giving guidance and in governing possible employment activities by people in the State Department which includes, of course, arms control negotiators.

These directives caution against disclosure of "inside" information as well as classified and administratively controlled information. Former employees are advised to take care not to communicate any confidential information to subsequent employers. We are not talking about simply classified information. We are talking about inside information. It is covered by the State Department's own directives.

Although Senator Tower's consulting clients had an enormous stake in programs which could be directly affected by the outcome of the START talks, he did not take care to avoid discussing the probable results of the talks with them. According to his testimony before the committee, he provided advice to his clients on the "implications of INF and other arms control negotiations on * * * future product development."

Those are not my words. Those are his words. Again, he provided advice to the clients on—quoting him—"implications of INF and other arms control negotiations on * * * future product development."

Senator Tower also testified that he advised his clients on the "probable outcomes" of the arms control talks.

That is valuable information coming from someone on the inside; extremely valuable information. If you are a producer of the MX missile, the Midgetman missile, or an SDI system, it is very, very valuable. You do not have to disclose classified information to be extremely valuable in providing a judgment based on inside information. You do not have to give up a secret in order to be of extreme value if you know what the bottom line of the U.S. negotiating position may be with respect to a certain defense weapon.

Although Senator Tower told the committee that his advice was based on "enlightened guesswork" and publicly available information, the rapid shift from status as a negotiator to status as a consultant—giving advice on the probable outcomes of ongoing negotiations—created the appearance of using inside information for private gain. That is what we found.

As a result of his involvement in START negotiations and access to the parallel INF and space and defensive systems negotiations, Senator Tower possessed the most sensitive information that could be obtained on the impact of the negotiations on a contractor's "future product development." Senator Tower, as a key arms control envoy, would have been aware of U.S. negotiating strategies, real U.S. goals, fallback positions, and potential quid pro quo tradeoff offers that were proposed and debated by the U.S. interagency process, whether or not the particular options were approved. He would thus have gained considerable insight into the likely future directions of the negotiations after his departure. This would include clear understandings regarding those U.S. START positions that were nonnegotiable, and those positions from which we were or might be prepared to retreat, under some conditions.

Senator Tower's position gave him insight into the U.S. position of unresolved issues within the general START framework, including banning all mobile ICBM's, establishing "counting rules" for bombers, dealing with strategic defenses, and determining allowed numbers of nondeployed missiles.

Furthermore, access to the interagency deliberations would have provided Senator Tower with insight into the views of the Office of Secretary of Defense, the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and the individual military services on proposed budget levels for strategic systems or new START decisions for individual weapons system proposals.

I want to state this, because I think it is very important: The committee has long recognized the importance of a healthy interchange between the public and private sectors, particularly in terms of encouraging people from industry with technical and managerial skills to engage in public service. That is crucial. We have to have experienced people. But Senator Tower's decision to provide consulting services on arms control matters, just after serving as an arms control negotiator, in the view of the committee, and in my personal view, crossed a line with regard to the revolving door which is of great concern to the committee.

In short, Senator Tower, in our view, showed poor judgment by placing himself in a situation where there was such an obvious tension between the information he acquired as an arms control negotiator and his obligations to his consulting clients. The committee and I want to emphasize this: The committee does not have evidence, and we make no charge, that Senator Tower provided his clients with classified information. We did not find that. In the committee's judgment, however, this situation created the appearance of using public office for private gain and casts doubt, particularly at this juncture in our history, on his ability to command public confidence in the integrity of the defense acquisition system.

In his own testimony before the committee, Senator Tower noted the importance of public confidence. Quoting him:

> If we are to maintain a strong defense establishment in this country, we must restore public confidence, not just in the Pentagon, but in the national security process.

He also testified, quoting him again:

> We do have to be concerned about public perceptions, because I think the essence of what is required for democracy to succeed is public confidence in their institutions, popular confidence in public institutions, stated better.

Again, he says we do have to be concerned about public perception. I think he is right. The committee thinks he is right. As President Bush noted earlier this year, quoting President Bush:

> Government should be an opportunity for public service, not private gain.

He noted as a guiding principle that Government employees must "avoid even the appearance of what is wrong." Senator Tower possessed a wealth of inside information on the arms control negotiations. Because of his position, his advice to clients on the effect of, using his words, "probable outcomes" of these negotiations on their product development, was obviously very valuable to his clients. In that circumstance, he created the appearance of using public office for private gain.

It is critical that the new Secretary of Defense act vigorously to reform the defense acquisition process, which has been plagued by allegations of illegal and unethical practices, and restore public confidence in the integrity of defense management. Senator Tower's own activities would greatly complicate efforts to accomplish these tasks. His post-START consulting employment reflected insensitivity to the appearance that he has used inside information for private gain. His activities would weaken public confidence that defense acquisition decisions would be based solely on the public interest.

BEHAVIOR TOWARD WOMEN

The committee examined a number of allegations concerning the nominee's behavior toward women. The committee's record on this issue demonstrates no findings of liaisons with female foreign nationals and, hence, no security violations that such activities would entail. Nor does the record support the allegation that the nominee exerted sexual pressure on employees and associates of the opposite sex.

These were the two areas we focused on. We were not trying to determine if Senator Tower had a perfect record. That was not what we were looking at. We were trying to determine whether there was a security violation, and we found none. I think it has been unfair to the nominee that there have been so many stories about alleged security violations in Geneva, relating to his personal conduct with foreign nationals.

I tried my best, and I did it on at least three occasions, to warn the news media away from these allegations. I expressed over and over again that they should be cautious. So if anybody is going to say that Senator Tower has been treated unfairly in this process, on that particular count, I would agree.

I have done what I could to prevent that, and it is regrettable. We found no evidence—and I will repeat, no evidence—of Senator Tower having any kind of liaison with any foreign national.

I also want to clarify the record, that we were not searching for a saint. I do not believe we should look for sainthood in terms of the Secretary of Defense. We were not trying to see if his record with women was perfect. We were looking at those two matters. First was a security violation. The answer is that we do not find one. Second, was there a record to support the allegations that have floated around that the nominee exerted sexual pressure on employees and associates of the opposite sex? We felt this one was also important. Men and women in the military now, together, are working on our national security. Women have to be treated fairly. The military understands that, and they are doing everything possible. We did not find that Senator Tower exerted sexual pressures on employees. We found no pattern of that.

I will add that, in the course of looking at those matters, and in the course of looking at the alcohol matters, we did find a number of examples of personal conduct which the committee found indiscreet and which called into question Senator Tower's judgment.

These examples add to the cumulative body of concern the committee has about this nomination. They were not decisive. They add to the question of judgment and the question of example, particularly when we have so many women in our military today. I must say that we depend on them for our national security.

So we have to be concerned about example. We have to be concerned about the treatment of women in the military service, and we have to be concerned about the relationships between men and women in the military. It is not easy. We have had top-ranking officials, in the last 2 years, who have been basically either court martialed or kicked out of the military for what is known as fraternization. It is not something the military winks at, and I think we ought to also understand that.

The committee is also concerned about the personal example the Secretary of Defense must set for efforts of the Department of Defense to end discrimination toward and any sexual harassment of women. The U.S. Armed Forces have been asked to fully integrate women into the force. That is what we told them to do: treat them equally, except for combat eligibility. Serious problems still exist, however, with the status and treatment of the women in the military. In this regard, the Secretary of Defense's own conduct must be able to set an example.

There is much in Senator Tower's record which is highly commendable. I believe that John Tower is a loyal, patriotic, dedicated citizen of this country, who has a solid record of public service.

That is my belief. I also sincerely believe that John Tower is dedicated to our Nation's security. I do not have any doubt about that. That is not what this debate is about.

But for me and the majority of the Armed Services Committee, that is not enough.

The committee is skeptical as to the nominee's ability to restore public trust in the Pentagon management system, which is absolutely imperative, if we are going to have a strong national defense. We have to have confidence that the Pentagon is being managed correctly and wisely. We have to have confidence that the taxpayers' money is being spent wisely.

The committee is concerned as to his ability to command the confidence and respect of his subordinates and set the moral standards for men and women in uniform.

Finally, the committee concluded that we could not in good conscience recommend that the Senate confirm an individual to serve at the top of the chain of command when his history of excessive drinking is such that he would not be selected to command a missile wing, a SAC bomber squadron, or a Trident missile submarine.

I do not think there is any doubt on that question.

Mr. President, I think it is significant that four publications that cover the Department of Defense very closely—Army Times, Navy Times, Air Force Times, and Defense News—have all come out in the last month in opposition to Senator Tower's nomination. I will ask unanimous consent that these editorials be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

Mr. President, leadership must be established from the top down. Standards must be set from the top down. If we want the sergeant at his post on the DMZ in Korea or the lieutenant standing alert with her SAC refueling tanker in the Midwest to meet the high standards asked of those who wear our Nation's uniform, we must make that clear here in the U.S. Senate.

Mr. President, the Armed Services Committee has recommended that the Senate not confirm the nomination of Senator Tower to be Secretary of Defense, and I urge my colleagues to vote against this nomination.

The material I am putting in the RECORD is significant because it presents the views of respected defense publications that are read by our men and women in uniform. The editorials and columns consist of the following:

First, an editorial from Defense News:

Second, editorials from Army Times, Navy Times, and Air Force Times;

Third, two columns by the distinguished military historian, Col. Harry G. Summers, Jr., U.S. Army (retired); and Fourth, a commentary by NBC correspondent John Chancellor on the importance of these defense publications' views.

I hope that my colleagues will find this material helpful.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Defense News, Feb. 6, 1989]

TOWER SHOULD STEP ASIDE

Mr. John Tower should withdraw his name from consideration to be defense secretary of the United States. It would be a service to the country and to the president. Withdrawal would be the act of a seasoned politician who understands that the best interests of the nation sometimes require personal sacrifice by those who would help lead it.

Withdrawal is necessary because the record of Mr. Tower's professional life raises substantive doubt that he can perform with utmost effectiveness at a time when defense priorities and the Defense Department each are undergoing periods of vital, but delicate, change.

The nation's ability to mount a robust defense depends, over the long term, on the support of the American people. Support for defense spending is declining. The public is raising legitimate questions about the relationship between the Defense Department and the defense industry. Further, defense no longer is the nation's top priority as was the case in 1981 when President Reagan accelerated the defense buildup begun by his predecessor. Today, defense is one of a number of national priorities, which include reduction of the federal deficit and improvement of the nation's trade balances.

What is needed is a defense secretary with the political skills to raise public confidence in the Pentagon and the acquisition process. He should have the vision to unite NATO's quarrelsome allies and address their changing and diverging defense priorities in light of Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev's entreaties. The new secretary must possess the diplomatic and leadership skills to build an international consensus for the president's defense agenda.

While in the Senate, Mr. Tower earned a reputation as a tough, abrasive deal maker. Even his allies do not characterize him as one much interested in the opposing views of others. He demonstrated little interest in improving the acquisition system or in balancing the appetites of former Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger with other, equally important, needs of the nation.

But it is his job since 1986 as a defense consultant that is most troubling. In about two years, Mr. Tower earned $1 million as a consultant for Rockwell International, Martin Marietta, LTV, Textron, British Aerospace, Astrotech and Hicks and Associates, a consulting firm that advises, among others, the Northrop Corp. These firms are makers of the B-1 and B-2 bombers, the MX and Midgetman missiles, and a wide array of the Pentagon's most important conventional weapons.

Sen. Sam Nunn, chairman of the Armed Services Committee summarized the issue this way: "Frankly, the difficulty here is not the fact that you have worked for a defense contractor or been a consultant" but that Mr. Tower represented "five or six or seven of the major corporations . . . If you were to [excuse] yourself from [Pentagon discussions involving] all of them, you couldn't be secretary of defense . . . We have a perception problem. The question of conflict is one that usually relates to continuing financial interests. The other is perception . . . I know you to be an honest person. But I do worry about the perception."

The Senator worries because he knows that today's public perception is tomorrow's political reality. That is why President Bush established ethics in government as a priority of his administration. After 24 years in the Senate, Mr. Tower also understands the link between the public's perception and its support for defense. His decision to become a defense consultant was an explicit statement about the path he had chosen for himself.

The principal task of the next defense secretary is to build public confidence that the Pentagon is being well managed and that defense dollars are being carefully spent. The defense secretary must be an independent voice of force, authority and reason.

There is ample reason to doubt whether Mr. Tower is the man for these times.

[From the Army Times, Feb. 13, 1989]

TOWER SHOULD GO

John Tower should withdraw his nomination to be the next secretary of defense.

Out of concern for the military, which the former Texas senator clearly loves, he should step side. Tower's public position has been so compromised by the agonizing process by which he was nominated and is being confirmed—as of this writing the Senate Armed Services Committee has postponed its vote on the matter—that he cannot be the strong spokesman the Defense Department needs now.

We are reluctant to pass judgment on Tower's character per se. It takes a judge with more moral clarity than we would claim to reach a definitive verdict on the charges of womanizing and high living that have surfaced along Tower's troubled road to the Pentagon post. Edward Kennedy has survived much more serious charges to serve a long term in the Senate. Are the standards for a defense secretary so much higher than for a senator?

More troubling and more at issue is Tower's position as a consultant to defense contractors. No one has claimed Tower acted illegally in receiving big fees from defense firms in return for what, by Tower's own description, was precious little real information. But the speed and greed with which Tower spun through the revolving door is appalling.

Though the charges against Tower may be unproven, they undeniably create the impression of a man much too cozy with the Pentagon's worst ways of doing business. Indeed, he is almost a caricature of how most people see the Defense Department, a kind of Mr. Military-Industrial Complex.

Balancing this is the "Nixon-goes-to-China" argument. That is, Tower will be able to tame the Pentagon's wasteful ways and make reforms stick because he is such a long-term supporter of the military. In his confirmation hearings, Tower said, "I understand we must live within constraints. I am not such a mindless hawk that I would come to you and ask you for a substantial increase in defense expenditure when I know it is not going to happen."

Tower recognized that he would be viewed with suspicion in asking for defense increases. But how then can he credibly support the current defense budget, which calls for a 2 percent real increase in spending? And how can he make the argument—which needs desperately to be made by someone—that national security may be more important than this year's Gramm-Rudman number? The United States is about to enter the two most important arms negotiations in history and needs to stick to its guns to reach a successful conclusion.

And to maintain a national consensus on military spending, the Pentagon badly needs to have its image resurrected from the Golgotha where spare parts scandals and Operation Ill Wind and pique at our allies and many other problems have marooned it. Is John Tower the man to do that?

Alas, no.

It seems cruel to deprive a man with the skills to do a job he desperately wants to do of the opportunity to make good. And we may be making a moot point, as the Senate seems intent on confirming Tower come hell or high water.

But George Bush, who says he cares deeply about ethics in government, might want to reconsider. The president's sense of loyalty may be too strong.

Or Tower may summon personal courage of his own—it would take uncommon courage to refuse now the job he wants so much—to step aside. It might be the best help he can give to his friends in the military.

[From the Navy Times, Mar. 6, 1989]

THE TOWER VOTE

President Bush gambled and apparently lost on the nomination of former Sen. John Tower to be secretary of Defense. The Senate Armed Services Committee sent the nomination to the Senate floor with a recommendation not to confirm.

The vote split along party lines—11 Democrats against Tower, nine Republicans voting in favor of their former colleague. If the partisan pattern holds, the nomination will be defeated in the Senate where Democrats hold a 55–45 majority.

Critics of committee chairman Sam Nunn, D-Ga., say with some bitterness that he allowed rumor and innuendo about Tower's social life to rule the day. They suggest that Nunn had his way with Defense when Frank C. Carlucci was secretary, and now he bristles at the thought of so formidable an adversary as Tower taking over the post.

These charges themselves seem the fruit of politics and bruised egos. As Navy Times went to press, no version of the FBI investigation into Tower's personal habits had been released. The public has no way to assess the material that swayed Democratic conservatives like Nunn and Sen. John Glenn, D-Ohio, to vote against the nomination. But Sen. John Warner's observation that reasonable men can disagree on the implications of the FBI reports is no ringing denunication of Nunn's leadership on this issue.

Both Nunn and Tower care deeply about national security and those serving in the armed forces. Tower served with distinction in the Senate for 24 years. He's been a strong supporter of the Sea Services. As a master chief in the Naval Reserve, he holds a special affection for the Navy.

But the Senate has an obligation to vote down a nomination when sufficient questions of character are raised. All those investigations were opportunities to allay the Democrats' concerns. They did not.

The vote in committee came down to two issues. The first is whether Tower is a good choice to handle the tough decisions ahead for defense. He has the brains and background to handle the job.

The second, however, involves leadership, and that includes personal habits. "Will we demand less of our secretary of Defense than we do of our people in uniform?," Glenn asked.

We shouldn't. And military people need to know we won't. The Defense secretary should be, and should be known to be, a man of upstanding character. President Bush should nominate another to lead the Defense Department.

If he does not, the full Senate should reject the nomination.

[From the Air Force Times, Feb. 20, 1989]

NOT TOWER

The armed forces are under great pressure. They are being forced to find ways to hold down spending without endangering the nation, and they must rebuild public trust in the flawed procurement system. To do this, they need a strong, widely respected leader.

John G. Tower is the wrong man for the job.

Let's set aside for the moment the questions that have been raised about his drinking habits and his relationships with women. And let's even assume that the most recent FBI investigation into his financial affairs yields no evidence of illegality. There are other, compelling reasons Tower should not be secretary of defense.

It is clear that defense spending will be constrained and that the secretary of defense will have to engage in intricate and delicate negotiations with Congress and within the executive branch. To assure that the resources devoted to defense are adequate, but not excessive, the nation needs a Pentagon leader who is credible.

Tower is not. He has accepted more than three-quarters of a million dollars in payments from U.S. defense contractors for various consulting services he has rendered to them since he retired from the Senate.

In testimony before his former colleagues, he has offered to "recuse" himself—that is, not be involved in—certain decisions involving projects with which he was directly associated. But that is not a feasible solution. It would mean, in effect, that every time such a project required a decision by the secretary of defense, he would have to leave the room. That's no way to run the Pentagon, especially now, when excruciatingly difficult decisions must be made. There is too much at stake to allow vital decisions to be handled by underlings because the secretary of defense's chair is empty.

Unfortunately, Tower's lack of credibility is not limited to issues on which he worked as a consultant, and that is the most significant problem.

Tower is so closely associated with the defense industry that many people will question virtually any statement he makes on defense issues. His supporters argue that Tower knows defense issues and he knows Congress. That is true. But this knowledge is worthless if it is percieved to be tainted by bias.

Why should the people of the United States accept as the leader of their defenses a man whose effectiveness has been impaired by his past? Surely there is one person among the 250 million Americans who is both qualified to be secretary of defense and unfettered by ties to the defense industry?

Tower's nomination shows poor judgment by President Bush. It should be withdrawn. Failing that, it should be rejected.

[From the Navy Times, Feb. 20, 1989]

TOWER APPOINTMENT WOULD SET WORST POSSIBLE EXAMPLE

(By Harry G. Summers, Jr.)

"How can I justify my title of Honest Old Abe with the appointment of a man like Cameron?" lamented President Abraham Lincoln of his secretary of War, Simon Cameron, a Pennsylvania politician who was so splendidly and notoriously corrupt that even Congress took notice and voted him a formal record of censure.

"Honest Old George" Bush may well find himself asking the same question if the Senate Armed Services Committee votes to confirm former Sen. John Tower as secretary of Defense and the full Senate concurs in that nomination. Unlike Simon Cameron, John Tower has yet to be accused of selling diseased horses to the cavalry (perhaps because there's no horse cavalry around anymore), but "Jumpin' John" Tower has been publicly accused of being a drunkard, an adulterer and an influence peddler to the tune of three quarters of a million dollars from various and sundry defense contractors.

Whatever the fire underneath all the smoke that has been raised over the Tower nomination (and some flames—the specifics of the alleged influence peddling, for example—have emerged already) he is a strange candidate for a president who ostensibly "sought out individuals of the highest integrity" to serve in his Cabinet, and who has insisted that he would tolerate "not even a perception of wrongdoing" in his administration. Nowhere are such moral standards more important than for the secretary of Defense.

For one thing, along with the vice president and the secretary of State, the Defense secretary is a statutory member of the National Security Council, which Bush has pledged to revitalize as the nation's power center on matters of war and peace. Here, where the survival of the world may well hang in the balance, a clear head unfogged by alcohol or excess is essential.

For another, the secretary of Defense manages a multibillion-dollar budget already under attack on charges of fraud, mismanagement and corruption. In Tower's case, that aspect of his duties has already been compromised to some degree by the $763,777 he raked in as a "consultant" for defense contractors while he was out of office.

Whatever the legality—and Washington's "sleazoid" lawyers can prove anything legal if the fee is right—the ethics of the matter are odious enough to call into question Tower's credibility as an "honest broker" when it comes to matters of Defense Department procurement and acquisition. But that's not the main reason his appointment is so wrong.

The worst aspect of this appointment is the message it would send to the men and women of our armed forces. It is not generally recognized that, thanks to the ill-conceived restructuring of our defense establishment after World War II, the secretary of Defense is not only the equivalent of the former Cabinet-level secretary of War and secretary of the Navy, he is also the operational commander of the armed forces, in effect the general-in-chief and admiral-in-chief of the Army, Navy, Air Force and Marine Corps. As with any military commander, the secretary of Defense sets the moral standards for those subordinate leaders under his command.

There is an abominable irony in the fact that the Senate would even consider for the post of "general/admiral-in-chief" an individual who—if guilty of the behavior alleged to Tower—would be rejected outright (in fact, not even considered) were he a serving military officer in the zone for promotion. The truth of the matter is that if Tower were a colonel, he might long ago have been cashiered.

While drunkenness and womanizing are no more unknown in the military than they are in civilian society, in the military they are far less condoned when brought to official attention. Over the years any number of generals, admirals and other senior officers have been quietly called on the carpet for such misbehavior and told to retire or face a military court-martial. Especially in recent years there has been a severe crackdown on alcohol abuse and sexual harrassment throughout the services.

To appoint as secretary of Defense one accused on national television of chasing his secretary around the desk and tugging at her skirt, allegedly in a drunken stupor, while serving in Geneva as the arms control representative of the United States, not only makes a mockery of such crackdowns, it sets the worst possible example for the leaders of America's sons and daughters now serving in our armed forces.

As a father and a grandfather, and especially as America's commander in Chief, President Bush ought to be ashamed of himself for nominating such an individual in the first place, and so should the members of the United States Senate if they allow this nomination to be confirmed.

TAKING THE PLEDGE, WITH A LIMITED WARRANTY?

(By Harry Summers)

Looking right into the camera on ABC television's "This Week With David Brinkley" last Sunday and keeping a straight face the whole time, former Sen. John Tower took the pledge to abstain from alcohol and backed it up by swearing, "I've never broken a pledge in my life." Sure.

If one of his former wives and those who served with him in Geneva are to be believed, he obviously was not talking about the solemn pledge of fidelity he made during his wedding ceremony. And he could not have meant to include his earlier pledge not to peddle his influence as chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee to defense contractors once he was out of office.

This seems to be strictly a limited warranty pledge, and a pathetic one at that. Here was a man aspiring to operational command of America's armed forces throwing his dignity to the winds and swearing to a nationwide audience that he would give up "demon rum" for the duration. Even Carry Nation's credulity would have been strained, for the performance had all the sincerity of a sinner anxious for a handout taking the pledge at a temperance rally. All that was needed was Sam Donaldson laying on hands and a Salvation Army band in the background belting out "Put a Nickel on the Drum, Save Another Drunken Bum . . ."

It was only a month ago that Mr. Tower was pledging that one of his "overarching objectives" was "to restore public confidence in the Department of Defense." Instead, what he has succeeded in doing is undermining public confidence not so much in the Pentagon but in the White House and Capitol Hill.

Mr. Tower has certainly done President Bush no favors. Like Abraham Lincoln, who appointed Pennsylvania politician Simon Cameron as secretary of war to pay off a campaign debt, Mr. Bush understandably nominated Mr. Tower to be secretary of defense. But unlike Mr. Lincoln, who shipped Mr. Cameron off as ambassador to Russia once his true character was revealed, Mr. Bush has stood by his man. White House toadies no doubt have convinced Mr. Bush that he's demonstrating loyalty, in contrast to President Carter, who ran for cover whenever any of his appointees got into trouble.

But what Mr. Bush is really doing is convincing the American people that he doesn't have enough backbone to enforce his own pledge to "seek out individuals of the highest integrity" to serve in his Cabinet. Today those fine words are seen as just so much political hogwash.

By this time common sense should have told Mr. Bush that when it comes to a floor fight to confirm Mr. Tower, even if he wins, he loses; for if Mr. Bush wins he'll be stuck with what many perceive to be a moral degenerate in his Cabinet. No matter how many pledges Mr. Tower makes, one thing he will never be able to do now is "restore public confidence in the Department of Defense."

And by continuing to support Mr. Tower, Mr. Bush has done Senate Republicans no favors, either. By making the nomination a test of party loyalty, Mr. Bush has not only compromised his own integrity, he has forced Republicans in the Senate to compromise their integrity as well. One might suppose it would be liberal Democrats like Ted Kennedy defending Mr. Tower's "swinger's rights," while conservative Republicans like John McCain fought for a restoration of moral standards—but instead the arguments have to be reversed.

When the best argument the Republicans can muster in support of the Tower nomination is that one shouldn't "undermine the presidency," it should be clear to all concerned that Sen. Sam Nunn not only has the votes on his side, he and his fellow Democrats occupy the moral high ground as well.

One reason this point is not as plain as it might be is that some in the media have denied that a moral high ground exists. According to them, morals and character have no place in determining fitness for public office. Citing past presidential peccadilloes as evidence (peccadilloes that some of these "reporters" helped hide from the American people), they deny any connection between private and public behavior. Such attitudes merely confirm the American public's suspicions that the media are so jaded and debauched that they have lost the commonsense ability to tell right from wrong.

But if the issue is properly addressed, telling right from wrong is not difficult. Military officers traditionally use a simple test to judge the fitness and suitability of superior officers, a test that could cut through all the double-talk and hypocrisy that now surrounds the Tower nomination. The question is not "Could I serve in his unit?"—for most believe they could take care of themselves in the worst of circumstances. Instead they would ask the much tougher question, "Would I want my son or daughter to serve under his command?"

If you want to know whether John Tower, pledges and all, should be confirmed, imagine your son or daughter is assigned to the office of the secretary of defense. The answer will be apparent.

JOHN CHANCELLOR, NBC NEWS "COMMENTARY," RE: TOWER NOMINATION, MARCH 1, 1989

It's an old and honorable tradition in America that the military doesn't get involved in politics. So we've heard nothing about John Tower from the people who may have to work for him in the Pentagon and the armed forces. But if these men and women can't get into the Tower debate, there is a chain of newspapers that speaks to them and sometimes for them: the Army Times, the Navy Times, the Air Force Times, and Defense News, four influential publications read throughout the military, each with its own editorial policy. All are opposed to the nomination of John Tower.

The editorial in Defense News says that Tower should withdraw because of his work as a consultant to some of the biggest defense contractors, companies that produce, among other things, the B-1 bomber, the B-2 bomber, the MX missile and the proposed Midgetman missile. Senator Tower says that when contracts involving his former employers came up, he may take himself out of the bargaining. Defense News says, if he takes himself out, he can't be a full-time Secretary. If he is involved in the bargaining, there will be questions about conflict of interest. Either way, Tower has a problem just when the Pentagon needs a boss who will be popular and presuasive with the Congress and the country.

Publications serving the Defense Department, the Army, Navy and Air Force should know more than most about who should be Secretary of Defense, and when they all come out against John Tower, you've got to pay close attention.

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, in turning the floor over to Senator WARNER I repeat that we have handled this matter from the very beginning as a total partnership. We have formed a joint staff. Everything that came in to the majority went immediately to the minority.

Senator WARNER has conducted himself with total integrity and total honor and for that we all owe him a debt of gratitude and I personally express that gratitude to him and to Pat Tucker.

We will have a lot of back and forth here in the next few days, but that record will be unassailable.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished chairman from Georgia for his remarks.

I, too, shall refer to the work that we have done jointly for these many weeks in the course of my statement.

I rise to oppose the recommendation of the Armed Services Committee and to endorse with pride the recommendation of the President of the United States that John Tower, former U.S. Senator, receive the advice and consent of the U.S. Senate to become Secretary of Defense.

Mr. President, I shall be somewhat brief in my opening remarks to accommodate a colleague who has a schedule conflict and at a later time I will go back and I will address the incalculable contributions of this distinguished American as a public servant, 24 years as a Member of the U.S. Senate, the personal selection by a President to be an arms negotiator.

"Truth and fairness," those are the words that should be ever present in this Chamber as we commence this historic debate and discharge the duties of the Senate.

I mention Senator Tower's public service because in the Senate today are 70 U.S. Senators who served with him through those years by day, by night, and not one, Mr. President, has thus far come forward to challenge in any way the discharge of his duties as a U.S. Senator, not one. There is a silence, so far, on that critical point in this Chamber. That silence is a tribute to our former colleague.

Mr. President, when he departed, I remember very well, because my seat was at that time right over there and behind me sat Senator Goldwater, who succeeded him as the senior Republican and the leader on the Armed Services Committee, and this Chamber received quite appropriately accolades from both sides of the aisle as this fine American said good-bye and went his way. I remember so well, thinking at that time, that at long last he could devote more time to his family, and to those many interests that all of us have but which Senate duties have precluded the pursuit thereof.

But, a short time thereafter, again came the call for public service from the President of the United States to participate in the most critical of all challenges, the relationships between the United States of America and the Soviet Union, that adversary who potentially could inflict the greatest harm to this country. John Tower stepped forward and volunteered.

It was not the highest post in the delegation. It was not commensurate in power with the chairmanship of the Senate Armed Services Committee, but that did not cause him the slightest pause, for it was another challenge to go forward and perform a public service to the Nation he loves.

I shall return to this distinguished American's career, but I go now to the statements by our distinguished chairman about the performance of the work of the committee. And indeed, in the weeks that we worked together in the preparation of the record, and with our two staffs headed up by Patrick Tucker on the minority side, Arnold Punaro and Andy Effron on the majority side, it was total teamwork, a sharing of all the information. All decisions were made jointly. The chairman worked with honor and fairness in our personal relations. I returned the same.

Senator NUNN and I recognized, from the first moment we read that FBI report, that this nomination would be a challenge to us, to the members of our committee, and to the Senate as a whole. We decided, and I believe quite correctly, to pursue our respective responsibilities in a nonpartisan way as we prepared a record for the committee and the Senate.

Then came the night of decision, Thursday, February 23, when the Senator from Georgia and the Senator from Virginia concluded their committee work on the record. The road forked and we went separate ways on the vote. I was proud to stand with all eight of my colleagues on the Armed Services Committee as we unequivocally stated our support for the President of the United States and his choice for Secretary of Defense, John Tower.

The public must think S-407 is some secret chamber. Indeed, it does have a cloak of secrecy and a security about it. But it is that room to which Senators must go, at times when we have matters of national security interests, or matters of privacy that we must accord communications from fellow citizens, to examine these documents. Today, in that room, is a "collection" of material. I do not dignify it with the word "evidence." As I said, on Thursday night at the vote, this "collection" represents the most incredible cobweb of fact, fiction, and fantasy that I have seen in the decade I have been privileged to serve in this institution. Somewhere therein are elements of truth, and it is our responsibility, individually and collectively, to search out the truth. Every Senator has taken upon himself or herself to go to S-407 and perform that degree of study they believe necessary to find that truth.

Given the conflicts in the material in S-407, this Senator turned to another source of evidence. It was the persuasive factor with this Senator. I mentioned earlier that John Tower served with 70 Members of this body who are still serving today. There is another group, perhaps 30 to 40, who have departed this institution. Some 100 Senators know John Tower.

Not one has come forward to challenge his work while performing his duty. Not one has come forward to challenge with facts their own personal observations—that at any time John Tower's conduct, with respect to other individuals, or his daily lifestyle, or personal habits, ever interfered in any way with the effective performance of his work as a U.S. Senator. Not one has said, "I saw John Tower do this or that, in such a way as to undermine his ability to make controlled, sound decisions as a public servant." To me, Mr. President, therein, is the burden of evidence upon which Senators should judge this case.

In the days that unfold, as we debate, I shall listen carefully and wait to see if just one of the approximately 70 currently active Senators will come to this Chamber and relate their personal observation to the contrary, for that evidence should he accorded great weight. Of those who have retired I shall faithfully transmit any of their messages I might receive.

We heard this morning the chairman, in a very fair manner, address the personal tragedy that has been inflicted on John Tower, the members of his family, and the members of his staff, as a consequence of press leaks. Well, those of us who have served here in Washington understand the art of leaks. I am confident, however, of the credibility of the work that the chairman and I performed through last Thursday.

I am not going to point fingers. I have no knowledge. One can never determine, almost without exception, how the leaks occur. But it is interesting that those leaks have all been of a nature that are negative, that are sensational, that are based upon those allegations which rivet the attention of people who are watching from the distant States of our Union.

This morning's newspaper carries a story. The chairman referred to it. I guess we will hear more about it. I sincerely hope that it can be disproved. Some facts relative to that are in S-407. But before this Senator attaches any credibility, a great deal of corroboration will be necessary.

But I thought I would bring out today, not a secret document, but another, I think, credible source of evidence. I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD in its entirety.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FEBRUARY 17, 1989.

Hon. SAM NUNN,
Chairman, Armed Services Committee, U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: We have known Senator John Tower professionally and personally for a number of years. We are very aware of his 26-year record of outstanding public service to his country.

He served the people of Texas in the United States Senate for 24 years. They endorsed his performance in office by re-electing him three times, in each instance over a well-financed and strong opponent.

After retiring from the Senate where he held important policy and leadership positions, Senator Tower was asked by the President to handle some of the toughest and most delicate problems facing our country. He received public acclaim for his work as Chief Negotiator for the U.S. Strategic Arms talks in Geneva, and for his fairness and candor as Chairman of the President's Special Review Board which studied National Security Council operations in light of the Iran-Contra matter.

We all know the Senator well. Many of us worked as volunteers in his campaigns or as members of his staff. Many of us counseled with him on domestic policy or on sensitive matters of national security and defense. Others of us are simply his friend. But we all are convinced that President Bush has made an excellent choice in nominating Senator Tower as Secretary of Defense.

We urge you to bring his nomination to a prompt vote in the Senate Armed Services Committee and to recommend his confirmation as Secretary of Defense.

Sincerely,

Honey Alexander, Member, Corporation for Public Broadcasting, Nashville, TN; Carol E. Dinkins, Former U.S. Deputy Attorney, General, Houston, TX; Anne Armstrong, Former Ambassador to Great Britain, Armstrong, TX; Elizabeth H. Dole, Secretary of Labor, Washington, DC; Patricia Hill, Member, Texas House of Representatives, Dallas, TX; Kay Bailey Hutchison, Former Chairman, National Transportation Safety Board, Dallas, TX; Cyndi T. Krier, Member, Texas State Senate, San Antonio, TX; Beryl B. Milburn, Former Chairman, Higher Education Coordinating Board, Austin, TX; Cynthia Root Moran, Former Assistant Secretary for Legislation (Acting), Department of Health and Human Services, Washington, DC; Jocelyn L. Straus, Member, National Council on the Arts, San Antonio, TX; Carla A. Hills, U.S. Trade Representative, Washington, DC; Jeane J. Kirkpatrick, Leavy Professor of Government, Georgetown University, Washington, DC; Sally F. McKenzie, Vice Chairman, Texas Women's Commission, Dallas, TX; Catherine Clark Mosbacher, Attorney, Houston, TX; Anna Mowery, Member, Texas House of Representatives, Fort Worth, TX; Irene Wischer, President and CEO Panhandle Producing Co., San Antonio, TX; Greer Garson Fogelson, Dallas, TX; Jessica Catto, Builder, Woody Creek, CO; Nancy Kissinger, New York, NY.

(Mr. ADAMS assumed the chair.)

Mr. WARNER. This would be characterized as evidence favorable to John Tower. And since this morning's sensational story related to alleged mistreatment of members of the opposite sex, I challenge all to examine this letter. It was forwarded to the chairman of the committee, Senator NUNN of Georgia, signed by a dozen or more women who have made their mark in the history of America. Former Ambassadors, Cabinet officers, all of them have climbed that challenging and difficult ladder of success that confront women in professional life. They state:

We all know this Senator well. Many of us worked as volunteers in his campaigns or as members of his staff. Many of us counseled with him on domestic policy or on sensitive matters of national security and defense. Others of us are simply his friend. But we all are convinced that President Bush has made an excellent choice in nominating Senator Tower as Secretary of Defense.

Many Members of this body will recognize these names. But, as I put this in the RECORD, I will be interested to see whether it makes page 1 of America's papers like the negative leaks. Will this letter merit the attention and heralding presswise as have the negative stories that we have seen thus far, negative leaks which have begun to create something of a mindset across the Nation.

That is why this debate is so important—it is essential to seek that truth, to seek fairness, and to seek participation by the American people in this historic decision. We are not just deciding the fate of John Tower to be the next Secretary of Defense, we are deciding the fate of many Americans who will follow him, who will be called by not only President Bush but by the next President and the next President, to come to the Nation's Capitol to take on responsibilities as Cabinet officers. They will want to know they will be treated fairly by the U.S. Senate.

Yes, we are going to establish a historical precedent with this case and we do so, I hope, with utmost care.

So how does this Senator reach his decision? I mentioned my own experience with the Senator. I traveled with him in various parts of the world, served with him on the Armed Services Committee. When I first entered the Department of the Navy 20 years ago this month as Under Secretary of the Navy, I came before this body for advice and consent. And the first hand that was extended to me, other than that of John Stennis, was that of John Tower to guide me and help me get started in the Navy Secretary's Office. And for these ensuing 20 years I have had the privilege of working with him.

So my decision is based on my own observations. My decision is also based on the uncontested observations of some 70 other Senators serving here today and those who have departed. But, lastly and most importantly, my decision is based on the judgment of the President of the United States, a man who was elected overwhelmingly by the people of this country. And they said in that mandate, "Mr. President, take office, form your Government, and lead this Nation." And we are here to give such advice and consent as is necessary.

We do have a duty under the Constitution, and I would like to read the provision: Article II, section 2, referring to the powers of the President of the United States:

He shall have power, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, to make Treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, shall appoint Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, Judges of the Supreme Court, and all other Officers of the United States. * * *

We celebrated this morning in the joint meeting the bicentennial of the Congress of the United States—200 years. And in that period of time some 540-plus individual Americans have been selected by the successions of Presidents to serve in the Cabinet of the United States. This body has seen fit to superimpose our judgment—a veto—on a President of the United States for only eight of these individuals. And now the majority of the Armed Services Committee of the U.S. Senate recommends to the U.S. Senate that this individual become the ninth in the history of our country to be rejected.

In the last 100 years, only twice—I repeat, only twice; once under the Presidency of Calvin Coolidge and once under the Presidency of Dwight Eisenhower some 30 years ago—has this body exercised its constitutional right to veto the choice of a President. But to me that body of 200 years of tradition—precedents—provides the guidance the Senate needs in determining the weight of evidence needed to overturn a President's decision.

Time and time again in the course of debate in the proceedings of the U.S. Senate, we go to the desk to seek the advice of the President of the Senate who, in turn, seeks the advice of the Parliamentarians of the Senate. This institution operates on precedent. Much of the precedent was established by Thomas Jefferson. Incidentally, as a footnote to history—the first time the power of advise and consent was exercised was on the 16th of June 1789, when George Washington sent a Virginian by the name of Short to be Minister Plenipotentiary to France and allow Thomas Jefferson to return as the first Secretary of State.

Two hundred years of precedent, 540 different Cabinet officers. Therein is a body of evidence on which Members of the U.S. Senate today as well as yesterday could base their decision to support a President.

Mr. President, I will accommodate other Senators here and conclude my remarks by saying that I am confident that this body will discharge its search for the truth and fairness in a manner that will comport with the dignity of this institution for its 200 years. For, if we allow ourselves to get into the style of a soap opera, or we begin to engage in a civil war, the truth will perish somewhere in between. And that we must avoid.

Yes, if we allow ourselves to go either of those routes, then the Senate itself will be on trial. I pray that that does not occur.

We must judge John Tower with the same fairness and objectivity we daily judge ourselves.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine, Mr. COHEN.

Mr. COHEN. Mr. President, yesterday afternoon there was a small congregation of members of the press outside the Senate Chamber. Several of them approached me, following a meeting that we had in Senator DOLE's office, and they said: "Why prolong the agony? It is over. The better part of politics is pragmatism. Won't this only delay getting a new Secretary of Defense? Will it not impair the President? The Democrats have the votes, so to Satan with your chapter and verse about fair play."

And finally, "Does this not reflect poorly upon the President? Does he not recognize the need to cut his losses?"

I think what it reflects is not only the President's loyalty, but his basic sense of decency. He has watched the trial, the conviction and, indeed, the political execution of a man that he has known for a quarter of a century, a man who has never had the opportunity to confront the witnesses who have testified in secret against him.

President Bush believes that John Tower is fit to serve as his Secretary of Defense. It is my personal judgment that, if the Senate is going to reject him, we have to have very clear and convincing evidence that the President's judgment is either deficient or otherwise impaired—that he does not want and will not receive a 24-hour-a-day Secretary of Defense; that somehow he is insufficiently concerned about—perhaps even indifferent to—allegations pertaining to his nominee's propriety and sobriety of conduct.

I was reading "Murder in the Cathedral" last evening. I thought it somehow appropriate that I might discuss it here today.

Archbishop Thomas Beckett said, "The last temptation is the greatest treason: to do the right deed for the wrong reason." Now, Anthony Lewis had a column in today's New York Times. I think it bears repeating today because he picked up the same theme found in "Murder in the Cathedral." Anthony Lewis said, "There are good reasons to reject John Tower's nomination." Because of his philosphy and support for large expenditures for defense. But Anthony Lewis goes on to say:

> But many Senators are relying on a bad reason to oppose confirmation. That is the charges, collected in an FBI report, that Senator Tower has engaged in improper personal behavior, including abuse of alcohol. The people who made those charges were not under oath when they were interviewed by the FBI. They did not have to confront Senator Tower, or answer his questions.

"Reliance on charges that have not been subject to testing by the person accused is a dangerous business," according to Mr. Lewis. And that is why witnesses in our courts, civil and criminal, must be available for cross examination. Cross examination is the greatest engine for the discovery of truth.

But Mr. Lewis points out, this is not a trial. Those who rely on the FBI reports say this is not a trial. We do not have to find John Tower guilty of all these offenses beyond a reasonable doubt. If we see smoke, we may conclude there is fire. And then Mr. Lewis goes on to say:

> A system that operates on secret charges is an invitation to the grudge and smear. It allows those with motives of jealousy or politics to destroy reputation. It permits innocent mistakes to be destructive.

So, we ought not to allow people to do the right thing for the wrong reason. If you follow Mr. Lewis' line of logic, one could vote against John Tower because of his philosophy. But that might be the wrong deed for the right reason.

I think T.S. Eliot was wrong. I think the greatest treason is to do the wrong thing for the wrong reason. And I suggest to you that is precisely what the Armed Services Committee has done.

What is the evidence? We have had a variety of evidence come before the committee. First, we have our own personal experience, our own observations. And we heard Senator WARNER express much of that just a moment ago. I have said this before. I did not know John Tower before coming to the Senate. I have no way of verifying or accounting for his personal habits, drinking or otherwise. I am willing to stipulate that, on occasion, he drank excessively. He has already indicated that to the Senate Armed Services Committee. I would be willing to stipulate that provided we also stipulate that he was fully able at all times to carry out every single responsibility ever entrusted to him during that time.

I have known him since 1979. I have been a close friend. I have traveled here in this country, abroad, and I also know that every other member of the Armed Services Committee has had a similar experience to mine, those who have traveled with him and spent time with him. Not a single Senator on the committee who worked closely with him day and night many times can say they have ever seen him under the influence of alcohol, inebriated, or conduct himself in a manner that would bring discredit to the office. I believe the same thing can be said of the members of the Tower Commission, the START negotiators, and all of the others who ever associated with Senator Tower in a professional capacity. None have said they have seen him out of control of his faculties.

Now I suppose it is possible that he is able to conceal this alleged problem with alcohol from those who worked closely with him, never revealing even a tremor in his hand, a slur in his speech, an unsteadiness in his walk. That is possible; highly unlikely, but I suppose it is possible.

I must weigh that. But how many times have I sat on the Senate floor and listened to the distinguished chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, Senator NUNN, and the ranking member, Senator WARNER, and others, praise John Tower for his intelligence, his endurance, his negotiating skills. Was there ever a time when he was not able in their judgment to carry out the heavy responsibilities he had as chairman of the Armed Services Committee? Were those simply false words that they were uttering on this floor? Were they the soothing flatteries that we sent aloft as members of the club?

Think about "the club." It also stimulates thought about Gore Vidal's book, published in 1977, called Washington, DC. He said:

> No one was ever quite sure who belonged to The Club since members denied its existence but everyone knew who did not belong. The Club was permanently closed to the outsize personality, to the firebrand tribune of the people, to the Senator running too crudely for President. Members of The Club preferred to do their work quietly and to get re-elected without fanfare. On principle they detested the President, and despite that magnate's power to loose and to bind, The Club ruled the Senate in its own way and for its own ends, usually contrary to those of the President.

I mention this description of the club because it is pretty obvious. John Tower was never a member of the club.

In spite of the absence of that membership, we heaped him time after time with accolades about the extraordinary amount of energy he possessed, the endurance, the capabilities that he always showed while serving as chairman of the Armed Services Committee.

Recently, a number of the Members of this body and the other body traveled to Munich, West Germany, to participate, along with John Tower, in a very important NATO defense meeting. How many of our colleagues listened to John Tower at that time present the American view on defense issues relating to NATO? Would any one of them tell you that he revealed anything but a sharp, unclouded mind, logical thought process, and compelling rhetoric? There is not one who would venture such a thought.

Was it the behavior of a man who has a serious drinking problem? Did anyone there—and I include members of the media; we had people from the print media. We also had representatives from CBS, ABC, NBC, not as journalists, but actual participants in that conference—was there anyone there who witnessed unbecoming conduct or activity on his part? The answer is no.

So we have this kind of experience to call upon, and we have to weigh our own personal experience against the evidence that was presented to the Armed Services Committee. That is where I think we are sadly lacking.

We had direct evidence. We had a total of three witnesses appear before the committee in public, excluding Senator GRAMM and Senator BENTSEN who introduced Senator Tower. Those were the witnesses who appeared, one of whom testified about John Tower's alleged lack of sensitivity to subcontracting and the infrastructure and industrialization problems of this country. There were two other witnesses. One was Mr. Weyrich and another a so-called Dr. Jackson, a Mr. Jackson.

Mr. Jackson said in open session that he had a source in Geneva that could attest to some impropriety on the part of John Tower while he was there as a START negotiator. I asked Mr. Jackson at that time, "Who is your source?" He said, "I couldn't possibly reveal that in public; breach of faith."

We went into executive session, and I will say for the record here, perhaps inappropriately so, but I have said it before, when called upon to identify his source, Mr. Jackson did not have one that he could identify. His information was obviously based upon hearsay.

He issued an apology to the committee that it was inappropriate to have said what he had said in public session. Unfortunatley, the private apology never made it to the public arena, and so we had damaging testimony taken in public and, unfortunately, rebutted in private.

We had confidential information and evidence presented. The committee report maintains that the witnesses had no motivation to lie. Of course, that does not mean because they have no motive to lie they necessarily presented either accurate testimony or the truth.

I watched this morning one of the television programs, and one of my colleagues said he had been a prosecutor for 8 years and he knew how to read FBI files. Let me just suggest that no prosecutor would ever bring a case like this before a court of law resting on his proof on unsworn, unidentified witnesses, because he would have the case thrown out on a motion for summary judgment immediately after he made his opening statement. That is what would happen in a court of law based upon those FBI files.

So they may not have a motive to lie. In fact, lies were told, and they are contained in the FBI report. One story that I have found to be of particular offense was that dealing with the story that the major networks ran with alleging that John Tower was involved in improper behavior with a Russian ballerina. It was a scandalous story, burned up the airwaves for several days. The only problem was once it was checked out by the FBI, the person who called that story in was found to be totally lacking in any credibility. That story never made it to the wires, unfortunately. Again, a very dangerous situation in which unconfirmed, uncorroborated, indeed, false statements made about John Tower were reported in the press and yet never revealed for what they were.

We had various other personnel talk about an extraordinary amount of alcohol that had been consumed by John Tower. One of the witnesses who has been cited once again in the press left much to be desired in terms of his veracity and credibility, not only about dates, places, time, destination, but volume of alcohol consumed. We have had situations where 1 person said, "Yes, I saw him under the influence," and 13 said no. Do you believe the 1 and discount the 13?

Mr. Adelman, a very respected individual, wrote a column that got very extensive coverage, and when he was asked by members of the press and others in the White House and our committee, "Where's the beef?" or "What's the beef?" he responded with what I think were some weak generalizations.

So I have to ask a question: Is the committee—we reported out this report—and this Senate going to give greater probative value to unsworn statements by unidentified people than we do to our own experience, than to that of a General Scowcroft, a Howard Baker, a Max Kampelman, indeed, President Bush himself? Is that the kind of probative value we give to this kind of evidence?

Perhaps I indulge in too much reading of literature—but I could not help but recall Arthur Miller's "The Crucible." It is a very unhappy play. It is set in Salem, MA, back in 1692, when the witchcraft trials were at their height. It is a tale of deceit, deception and hysteria brought on by a group of young girls who invent stories about people consorting with the Devil. Their masquerade is given credence by assorted ministers who see their own power over the community growing as they punish the alleged Devil worshipers.

The lives of many townspeople, including some real pillars of the community, are ruined. They are ruined or ultimately ended by hanging. They could save their lives by confessing to witchcraft, but most of them refuse to do so and they are put to death. I could not help think, as I read through the FBI reports, that we are basing our judgment on Tower's fitness or lack of it for office upon that play.

There is a particularly moving crescendo at the end of act one in which these various young ladies start to say, "I saw Sarah Good with the Devil," and "I saw Goody Osburn with the Devil," and "I saw Bridget Bishop with the Devil; George Jacobs with the Devil; Alice Barrow with the Devil; Goody Hawkins; Goody Bibber," and on and on, to this wonderful crescendo of hysteria, of people they saw with the Devil.

Then of course we have the Reverend Hale, who says,

> Nurse, though our hearts break, we cannot flinch; These are new times, sir. There is a misty plot afoot so subtle we should be criminal to cling to old respects and ancient friendships. I have seen too many frightful proofs in court—the Devil is alive in Salem, and we dare not quail to follow wherever the accusing finger points!

That is what I found in the FBI reports: Unconfirmed statements by unidentified people, UFO's, unidentified flying witnesses, as such.

There is a double standard involved here. On CNN, one evening a Democractic colleague of mine was asked whether or not he considered the conduct of John F. Kennedy to be disqualifying for the Presidency. He responded at that time that if it was proved to him that John F. Kennedy did the things written about him, he would have voted against him for President.

Really now, what proof would he have accepted at that time? FBI interviews, unsworn statements by unidentified witnesses—that would not have been acceptable to me. I would have thrown it in the sewer. I would never have rejected him on the basis of rumors, those furry little creatures that scurry around so comfortably in the dark and then scatter in the light of scrutiny.

Or how about Lyndon Baines Johnson? Another of our Commanders in Chief—Was he qualified to serve as the commander of a B-1 squadron, a Trident submarine? Could he have been promoted from corporal to sergeant? Not if you believe what was written about him by those who were said to have been close to him.

Well, do you accept those observations of some respected and well-known authors? If you do, did you know about those traits at the time that he ran for Vice President? Perhaps more importantly, did these character flaws prevent him from successfully pushing through some of the most important domestic legislation in the history of our country? Did they prevent John Kennedy from forcing the Soviet missiles out of Cuba or negotiating a nuclear test ban treaty? There is a double standard at work here.

I will take just another moment. We have other colleagues who want to talk. I have more to say and will have more to say as we go on to this debate. I must say that I was deeply disturbed when I read this report by the majority. Pages 12 through 17—5 pages—literally destroy the reputation of a man who has served his country ably and with great patriotism.

I will point to just a few paragraphs. "The committee searched in vain for a point in time when the nominee himself acknowledged this problem," alcohol, "and dealt with it decisively. The nominee made it very clear that he has never sought medical assistance for his drinking problem."

I do not recall any evidence being established that he had a drinking problem that required medical assistance. But I would say that had he done so, and then sought medical advice, I can guarantee you the report would have read, how can we rely upon a man who had to turn to seek medical advice to cure a problem? Can you trust in the future a man who has had a past problem identified by medical authorities? That is how the report would have read had he done so.

Page 14. "The committee determined Senator Tower's excessive use of alcohol"—when? Past excessive use of alcohol? Present excessive use of alcohol? What are we referring to on page 14, "Senator Tower's excessive use of alcohol would disqualify?" Are we not required to specify upon what evidence we are relying? Is it those unidentified sources that we find in the FBI reports? Is that what we are calling the excessive use?

And then we get to the issue about disclosing inside information. The committee comes to the judgment at the bottom of page 15 that Senator Tower violated his trust as such, that he gave the appearance he provided inside information to those contractors that he subsequently dealt with.

On page 16 they say, "The committee has no evidence that Senator Tower provided his clients with classified information." Sure, they have evidence. Of course, we had evidence. John Tower's testimony before the committee is evidence. Now, if we had doubts as to the integrity or the honesty or the credibility of that representation to the committee, the committee could have done something. Call the clients in. Call the contractors in. Ask them: "Did John Tower ever provide you with inside information?" We did not do that. Instead, we have here on page 16 that, well, we do not have any evidence that he did not give it, but it created the appearance that he crossed the line. The fact is that John Tower did not violate either the legal requirements or our ethical requirements, and so the line has been established in this report.

Behavior toward women. Once again, the committee record on this demonstrates no finding of liaisons with female foreign nationals and no security violations, and yet by virtue of this ambiguous, vague allegation about behavior toward women they find that somehow John Tower has behaved improperly. Not a shred of evidence that he would not carry out his duties to make sure that people who are serving in our military forces, the women who serve in our military forces would not be harassed.

A final point and maybe more about the report later. Appearances. All of us have to be concerned about appearances, but if appearance is to govern rather than actuality, then as I have said before, I repeat again, most of us would have to disqualify ourselves from passing judgment upon the matters that come before this body. Each one of us solicits, or most of us, I should say, not all, most of us solicit and receive contributions from a variety of sources—agriculture, telecommunications, business, and, yes, defense, and yet somehow we are able to maintain, and we do, that we have the individual character and integrity to pass judgment upon these "special interests" without undue influence.

Now, if we can do that, and I believe we can, then why are we now saying John Tower by virtue of creating a perception about an appearance is unable to do so? I think we are talking once again about a double standard. I would also point out that there are checks and balances against executive abuses and improprieties that are nonexistent for us. There are laws that we pass that the executive must abide by, very clear, specific rules about contracting. There is the Competition in Contracting Act that I helped to author which requires that awards go to the best competitor. There are whistleblowers within the system who will cry foul if there is any hint of impropriety. There is John Tower himself who, I believe, has maintained a sterling record of integrity during his service in the Senate. But most of all there is us—Congress. We are the ultimate veto over impropriety or, indeed, even poor judgment. We are the ones who do not award contracts. We are the ones who fund the programs, who modify the programs or, indeed, cancel the programs, and there is no appeal from us, no check on our particular conflicts or abuse. So for us to disqualify John Tower based upon that I think is a great double standard.

Finally, let me say I return to The Crucible. "Is the accuser always holy now? Were they born this morning as clean as God's fingers? I'll tell you what's walking Salem—Vengeance is walking Salem. We are what we always were in Salem, but now the crazy little children are jangling the keys of the kingdom, and common vengeance writes the law. This warrant's vengeance. I'll not give my wife to vengeance." Well, President Bush has said we are not to turn our judgment over, to give the keys to this particular kingdom, this Chamber, over to those who submit reports and statements that are unsworn and unidentified.

Mr. President, when you weigh the totality of the evidence and you measure this against the standard as to whether or not we can find by clear and convincing evidence that the President is not as concerned about the chain of command as we are, then I believe you will have to find that our committee has been found wanting. The President of the United States deserves to have John Tower and John Tower deserves this position.

Mr. GRAMM addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas, Mr. GRAMM.

Mr. GRAMM. Mr. President, I would like to begin by saying that I am awfully proud to be able to associate myself with the remarks of our dear colleague from Maine. Through his words and thoughts he reflects on the greatest in terms of ability and integrity that we have had in the Senate, and today I am proud he is here and I am sure those who have gone before would be proud if they had heard him today.

Mr. President, I would like to begin by saying that I do not want to be judged by the standard that has been applied to John Tower here today. I want mercy. If I cannot get mercy, I will take justice, but I do not want to be judged by what is passing for justice on this floor today.

Mr. President, you can really sum up the committee report in one sentence, and I will read it. And then I want to talk about the John Tower we know, not just from a black book up in room 407, though I am going to talk about that black book up in room 407. But I want my colleagues who are listening and anybody else who is listening, if they know John Tower, to listen to this one sentence that sums up the indictment of Senator Tower and ask themselves, Is this the John Tower that I know and have known?

The sentence says: "The committee doubts Senator Tower's ability to provide effective leadership which will require commanding the confidence and respect of his subordinates in setting the moral standards for the entire U.S. Military Establishment."

That is the indictment. That sentence sums up why every Democratic member of the Senate Armed Services Committee voted to reject the nomination of John Tower.

Mr. President, the men who cast those votes are honorable men but this is not a correct conclusion, and there are no facts that exist anywhere on this Earth that can substantiate that sentence.

Mr. President, I would like to begin by noting that John Tower is not an abstraction. John Tower is more than a 3-inch black book up in room 407 of this old building. John Tower is a man we know. Because we know him does not make him righteous, but because we know him, we know more than what others say. If there is anything that begins the process of rejecting this sentence, it is the 70 Members of this body who served with John Tower and another 10 or 20 who were in the House while John Tower served in the Senate.

Mr. President, first of all, I want to talk about something that I guess only an old teacher would look at. But I think it tells you as much about John Tower as his record, though I will speak of it as well. But I would like to talk about what I call John Tower's alumni—all the people that in 24 years in the U.S. Senate worked for John Tower, people that have gone on and left their mark on the history of this Nation, and people who uniformly love, admire, and revere John Tower. They are Members of the U.S. Congress—two of them. The Secretary of the Navy today worked for John Tower. The Secretary of the Air Force, the Special Assistant to the President for Congressional Relations, had his first job with John Tower—members of the Texas Senate, Federal judges, literally hundreds of people. And I ask myself how did this one man who came to the Senate in 1961 have so many people work for him that have gone on to do so many great things with their own histories independent of John Tower? They are a testament to the man. And they can tell you uniformly that John Tower does have the ability to provide effective leadership.

Mr. President, we do not have to just look at the people who work for John Tower and went on to work for America directly. But let us look at his record. For 24 years John Tower stood not just for Texas in the U.S. Senate, but he stood for national defense.

I remember the year when I came here in 1979 when defense was tough, then in 1981 when it changed, and when the tide of public opinion demanded a change. But whether it was popular or whether it was not popular, John Tower was there speaking out on behalf of national security and national defense.

Mr. President, today there are those who question John Tower's ability to lead. But where is that borne out in his record? Where has there ever been evidence that John Tower has not been able to lead? Is there one Member of the Senate Armed Services Committee who served with John Tower who will come to the floor and say John Tower was not an effective leader of the Senate Armed Services Committee?

When John Tower came to the Senate in 1961 it was not an unknown phenomenon for people to come into the public service to do good and to leave having done well. It was not an unknown phenomenon for people to grow rich in public service. Yet when John Tower left public office in 1984, as I came to take his seat in the Senate, he left public service basically as a man who had as his principal and basically his only economic asset his retirement account.

I know many things about John Tower, and I have known him for many years. But I have never known any person whose word I trusted more than I trust his. John Tower may be many things, but John Tower's word is good, and John Tower has strong commitment to America and a keen sense of what is right and wrong.

Mr. President, I am going to read a part of two statements, made by a person whom I respect. I do not read this statement as a criticism of the person who made it who today has come to a different conclusion. But I read it because I think it sums up how our colleagues felt that day in 1984 when the Senate finished the Armed Services authorization bill and Members recognized that this was the last bill that John Tower would ever manage. I want to read this statement. It is a statement by our own chairman, Senator NUNN.

He is talking about John Tower:

He will leave his own legend. John Tower is recognized as one of the most knowledgeable, articulate, and effective leaders for a strong national defense that has ever served in the United States Senate. John Tower has never lost sight of the fact our men and women in uniform are our most important national security asset. During the Vietnam war John Tower made nine trips to Southeast Asia to visit the troops and review conditions firsthand, more than any other Senator. All of us can attest to his skill, his leadership, and his success in guiding a strong defense program. Senator Tower's success on national security issues can in part be attributed to his remarkable understanding of our foreign policy. Not only does he know the issues, he also knows well the foreign officials who influence them. This combination has been a tremendous asset to the work of this committee and the Senate as a whole.

Then I read further; still from Senator NUNN:

I note that this is Chairman Tower's final authorization bill that he will be presenting to the Senate, at least on this side of the river.

I take it, Mr. President, he was not talking about the stream that divides us from Heaven. I take it he was talking about the Potomac River, with the Pentagon on the other side of the river.

What the future may hold for him I do not know, but I submit that he has the background and knowledge that are indispensable in the defense arena. I hope that, whatever the future holds when he retires at the end of this session, he will continue to involve himself in the defense arena and our foreign policy arena as well as the overall involvement of every aspect of Government because his talent, wisdom, and experience are indeed national assets.

Mr. President, that description is not of a man who is incapable of leading. But what has changed? What happened? What changed the perception of John Tower?

Well, Mr. President, I guess part of it is this tainting of defense contractors. John Tower left here, and he went out and he went to work in the private sector of the economy. For almost 30 years he served the public interest. He did not grow rich in that service, and he left and went out to work in the defense industry; and throughout the FBI report and throughout the debate, in newspaper article after newspaper article, we hear about this "taint" of defense contractors.

Mr. President, I do not understand why we villify the defense industry. Defense is not just brave, young men and women on guard in Korea and Germany who keep Ivan from the gate. Defense is also a defense industry that is second to none, that builds weapons our allies want to buy and our adversaries want to steal. How working in that industry taints one, I do not understand, and I reject it.

I would like to know who has less ties to the Pentagon, who has served as Defense Secretary, than John Tower does. Was it the vaunted David Packard, whose proposals now we hear a continuing cry to implement? Well, I think not, because the business that bears his name is a major defense contractor. Was it Robert McNamara, who left his firm to come to Government, and whose firm was a major defense contractor? I attack this so strongly because the issue is counterproductive and unfair, not just to John Tower, but also counterproductive to our whole system of national security.

By this logic, the ideal person to be Secretary of Defense would be a fellow who just rolled into town in a turnip truck, who would agree never to make a decision related to turnips or to trucks, and who, when he left the Defense Department, would immediately go to a monastery. The problem is, Mr. President, nobody is ever going to be capable of doing the job from that background. I do not want a person to be Secretary of Defense who does not have advice that is worth a lot of money, because we are investing both money—$300 billion a year—and more than money in the Defense Department. We are investing the future of America and our children and the security and peace of the free world, and I want somebody there who knows what he is doing.

That is why Packard was great, that is why McNamara understood the Defense Department, and that is why John Tower can be effective.

Mr. President, I cannot understand how working for the Defense Department can be a negative, when the worst thing that the committee can conclude really boils down to two statements: One, the committee has no evidence that Senator Tower provided his clients with classified information. The second is that his actions created the appearance of using inside information for private gain. "Created the appearance."

Mr. President, there is not a Member of the U.S. Senate today who does not have more vested interest in the industrial military complex of America than John Tower does, not one. There is not a Member here who has been elected without votes of people who work in the Defense Department and who work in the defense industries of this Nation.

There is not a Member here who has not been affected in a political campaign by the fact that defense is big business in America. There are many here who have taken contributions from employees of the defense industry, who have taken contributions from their political action committees in the past; and more than that, they are going to do it in the next campaign, as well. How is that a lesser vested interest than that of John Tower, who severed every tie with the defense industry when he went to the Pentagon?

Let me make it clear, Mr. President, that I am proud that the people in the defense industry support me. But the point still remains that there is not one Member of this body who does not have a greater vested interest in this very area than John Tower.

Our conflict of interest is greater than his, and, yet, no one here, it seems to me, with any validity, could make the argument that we are not capable of making independent judgments. I would reject that argument. Only the people who want to run the country by manipulating the media through the so-called public interest groups, or people who want the taxpayer to pay for campaigns, would have it any different.

Mr. President, of the three charges against John Tower contained in that black book in room 407, the one that has the least credibility, the one that offends most, is this absurd idea that having worked for defense contractors, he is therefore not fit to make decisions that affect defense contractors and, indeed, the future of mankind.

I reject that. There is no evidence to substantiate it. The committee admits there is no evidence, but they are concerned about appearances, but how is our appearance less indicting than his?

The second charge has to do with "womanizing." Mr. President, I am not going to go into great length about this womanizing charge. I do not know which of our great leaders have been accused of it in the past. When you look at the charges and you get down to the bottom line, it seems to me that the conclusion that the majority reaches on the committee destroys what they claim to be evidence. The conclusion as stated by Senator NUNN is simply this:

> The record does not support the allegation that the nominee exerted sexual pressure on any employees or associates of the opposite sex.

Now, Mr. President, I do not want to get into great discussions about John Tower and what he did when he went home, who he might have gone out with, but I want to address two of these stories that have ended up on the front pages of our paper, on television, and one of them has already been mentioned.

We all remember it because it came out right before we were going on recess, and we were going to have this investigation while we were gone. This was the one where the supposed doctor had played a piano at a private party in Texas while John Tower and a voluptuous Russian ballerina danced on the piano, until the easily offended physician lost his interest in playing and left the room.

Who did not hear that story? It circulated around here like wildfire. It ran in one form or another on the television networks. It was wonderful fiction. What did the facts turn out to be, Mr. President? When the FBI checked it out, No. 1, the guy telling the story is not a doctor. He has had four aliases. He does not play the piano. There is no Russian ballerina. To anybody's knowledge, this guy never met John Tower. And anybody who would suggest that John Tower could buy a girlfriend an apartment in River Oaks, which is one of the richest areas in America, does not know John Tower.

The second story just broke onto the scene this morning. We have all known about it because it is in this indictment book that the committee put together, and it is in the FBI report. It has to do with this sergeant at Bergstrom Air Force Base. This sergeant says that some years back he was at Bergstrom Air Force Base when John Tower came to town on an inspection tour. He says Tower was drunk and that he fondled a female airman.

You will hear counterevidence later from someone who received a letter today from the person who was the commander of the base in 1975 and who was there, I just want to present some facts about Bergstrom Air Force Base that I think demonstrate how silly this story is.

I have been to Bergstrom Air Force Base twice since I have taken John Tower's job and both times I have been there, three television stations came out to cover my visit. Bergstrom Air Force Base is in our capital city in Austin. If John Tower, as a senior member of the Armed Services Committee, made an inspection there I can assure you that it was covered heavily by Austin and therefore statewide media.

I submit to my colleagues, would a man who has not been observed in 24 years in his official duties in the U.S. Senate with 70 Members who served with him go to his capital city on an inspection tour drunk and fondle an airman?

Mr. President, that accusation is so ridiculous that it is hard to believe that it ran on the front page of the newspapers.

I hope somewhere somebody finds this old airman and that somebody will interview the base commander, and it is interesting that the FBI report there is not any other soul who says this is a true story, but this one lonely retired sergeant.

I hope someday we will check this story out. But I do not see how anybody could believe that a man who for 24 years in Washington, DC, 1,800 miles away from home, when the Senate was not on television, was never once seen inebriated and then in broad daylight goes to his capital city on an inspection tour drunk. Nobody could believe that. That is an insult to anybody's intelligence.

Finally, the whiskey accusation which I have touched on here, and again I am not going to go into great detail about it because the plain truth is that whiskey is not an unknown commodity to the people of America and to the people who have been important in its Government, and in case my momma is watching I want to make it clear that the world would be better off if God had never allowed whiskey to be created, but that is not the issue here. The issue here is John Tower and alcohol.

I do not need to rundown the list of people who, by this new standard, would never be present in the chain of command. Ulysses S. Grant, who won the Civil War, clearly would have been rejected by this body.

And I am not going to repeat the story about Lincoln. We have all heard it. We know it. But obviously we have forgotten it.

Winston Churchill, who was a voice of the free world, who stood alone against Nazi aggression, consumed more liquor on an average basis than anyone has ever accused John Tower of consuming. Was he unfit? Ask Hitler's ghost. The plain truth was he led the free world until in God's good time the New World came to the aid of the old.

What astounds me about all this whiskey business is that nowhere in this FBI report, nowhere, is there any accusation, much less evidence, that in 30 years of public service that John Tower ever failed to perform his duties as a Senator, as an arms negotiator, as head of the Tower Commission. No one ever suggests, much less proves, that John Tower ever failed to do his duty, to show up for work, to attend the meetings, to be a leader, to be effective, because of the use of alcohol.

Now, Mr. President, there are a lot of stories that have been circulated. One of the Members of the House who worked for John Tower said in the 1970's it got lots of media coverage, somebody leaked it to the media, that John Tower drank a lot of whiskey in the 1970's. He also makes it clear John Tower always did his job.

But I think it is clear that there is no evidence anywhere to substantiate a claim that John Tower is now, nor that he has ever been, an alcoholic. There is no evidence to substantiate that.

I do not think there is any doubt about the fact that you could find some sociologist somewhere who would define some incident in John Tower's personal life as suggesting a person with a whiskey problem. But if you define alcoholism as the effect of whiskey on your ability to do your job, to perform your functions, there is no evidence or suggestion that John Tower has ever suffered from alcoholism.

There is also ample evidence that in the late seventies John Tower dramatically changed his consumption of alcohol. I know John Tower—John Tower and I are not very much alike—but I know him very well, and I watched him on television, and I listened to him say that he was not an alcoholic, he had never been an alcoholic, but that if it was such a big issue, he would give his word that while he was Secretary of Defense he would never have a drink of any beverage alcohol.

For a proud man like John Tower, that was tough. But in my honest opinion that should have eliminated any concern about alcohol.

I would also like to address one point that Senator NUNN made. I am not a military officer and I have never had any direct dealings with nuclear weapons. I have voted on them, and I voted for most of them because they keep the world free and keep my children safe. But a point was made about the criteria for dealing with nuclear weapons and holding positions of trust, and the Senator from Georgia, I guess, implied that Tower would be rejected by a military commander because of these criteria.

Mr. President, I do not have to speculate about it. I do not have to speculate about whether he would be rejected or not because I have evidence John Tower was not rejected. The Constitution says very, very clearly that the President shall be Commander in Chief of the armed forces of the United States. The Commander in Chief has known John Tower for 30 years. The Commander in Chief looked at the FBI report and chose John Tower to be Secretary of Defense.

So he was not rejected. He was chosen by the Commander in Chief, who was given the powers to choose under the Constitution.

Finally, Mr. President, I want to get down to a discussion about advise and consent. Now, the distinguished Senator from Virginia has read the lines from the Constitution that we all know so well because it is an important power of this body.

What did the Founding Fathers mean by advise and consent? Did they mean what we are doing here today?

It is a hard question and the only way to answer that question, Mr. President, is to look at the record. What has been the case? In the 200-year history of advise and consent, never has an initial Cabinet appointee of a President been rejected; never in 200 years. In many new Presidencies, the entire Cabinet has been approved within a week. Clearly, in looking at the fact that in some cases in the first day after the new President took office, full Cabinets have been approved, there has been a change in the meaning of advise and consent.

Mr. President, I believe it has taken on a new meaning here and I think the new meaning is a harmful meaning to the Republic in two ways.

Number one, we have set a standard for John Tower that has never been employed before. And, second, Mr. President, in doing so we have vastly sought to expand the power of the Congress. There is but one Member of this body who did not have the opportunity to run for President of the United States, and that is RUDY BOSCHWITZ because he was not born here. Ninety-nine others had a chance to go out and travel all over the country and raise $30 million, kiss a whole lot of babies and offer a vision for America's future. Some did, and they were not chosen.

George Bush was chosen President of the United States. George Bush—not the Senate Armed Services Committee—is the Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces of the United States. What we are seeing here is the continuation of a process that has existed since the Second World War, where Congress seeks to infringe on the powers of the executive branch of Government, where committees and committee chairmen and senior Members become warlords in terms exerting their influence over specific elements of the Government.

We do not run for President, but we play President. We impose policy, but we do not take responsibility. And, Mr. President, there is a strong element of this here.

If John Tower is rejected there are several things that are going to happen. No. 1, we will have expanded advise and consent far beyond the parameters that have ever existed before. We will have rejected a man not because of what he did but, in the committee's language, because of the appearance of what he may have done. We will have rejected a man on the basis of rumors, where John Tower never got an opportunity to respond or even to read the report. And, Mr. President, John Tower is not an unknown. Seventy of us served with him. We will have expanded the power of Congress and in doing so we will have weakened the Presidency.

Mr. President, we also will have raised the cost of public service once again. Where do all the great men and women come from who give up jobs, always, or almost always, making more money, to come here and serve in Government? Is this the kind of standard that we are going to impose on them? Who will come? If only saints can serve in Government, I will soon achieve my goal of getting the whole Government back in to the Old Executive Office Building.

And, finally, the thing that hurts me the most about this is not just the expansion of the power of the legislative branch at the expense of the executive branch, not just the new standard which will impede good people in terms of coming forward and holding up their hand and volunteering to serve America, but the real tragedy here is if what appears to be headed toward a straight party-line vote turns out to be one, that a good man who gave this country 30 years, a man who served with distinction, a man whose word was always good is going to be denied an opportunity to serve America. And that is the tragedy that I lament today as we begin this debate.

Mr. President, today is Texas Independence Day. And on this day for 24 years, John Tower always had a get-together. He always ended that celebration by reading a letter. I think it is a meaningful letter. It is a short letter, I have spoken a long time and I am going to read this letter and stop. He read this letter because it symbolized what, to him, Texas was about but, more importantly, I think it tells you something about John Tower. Because the plain truth is that while I am not a contemporary of John Tower, I admire him and I can envision him in the role of this letter that for 24 years on this day he always read. The letter, read on March 2 of each year, goes back to March 2 1836. The letter was actually written in February, but what it started culminated 152 years ago.

It is a letter from the Alamo. And it is a letter that is from the commandancy of the Alamo, Bejar, February 24, 1836.

To the people of Texas & all Americans in the world—

Fellow citizens & compatriots—

I am besieged, by a thousand or more of the Mexicans under Santa Anna—I have sustained a continual Bombardment & cannonade for 24 hours & have not lost a man—The enemy has demanded a surrender at discretion, otherwise, the garrison are to be put to the sword, if the fort is taken—I have answered the demand with a cannon shot, & our flag still waves proudly from the walls—I shall never surrender or retreat. Then I call on you in the name of Liberty, of patriotism and everything dear to the American character, to come to our aid, with all dispatch—The enemy is receiving reinforcements daily & will no doubt increase to three or four thousand in four or five days. If this call is neglected, I am determined to sustain myself as long as possible & and die like a soldier who never forgets what is due to his own honor & that of his country—victory or death.

WILLIAM BARRETT TRAVIS,
Lt. Col. comdt.

Mr. President, I believe John Tower has the same high standards as the man who wrote this letter.

Yesterday, in concluding a press conference, Senator Tower referred to the letter from the Alamo, maybe thinking about today being the day of his 24-year celebration. After he had made the reference, he said, "Maybe that was not a good reference because all the people at the Alamo died." And, Mr. President, he is right, of course. The people who responded to William Barret Travis drawing the line in the sand, those who stepped over did die but, in fact, the ones who did not step over also died, only we do not remember their names.

I think it is important that we have had this debate. I believe that John Tower wanted this debate. I am hopeful, even at this late hour, that there will be those who will listen to the debate and who will conclude that John Tower should be confirmed as Secretary of Defense.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, all Texans can take great pride in the remarks of its native son, the junior Senator from Texas. Senator GRAMM, we felt the emotion and you touched our hearts. You paid your old dear friend a great and deserving tribute. We thank you.

Mr. President, I see the chairman has returned to the floor.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, is time controlled?

Mr. NUNN. No; there is no agreement. If a Senator gets the floor, he may take the time he needs.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I voted against confirming Senator Tower in the Armed Services Committee and will vote against his confirmation on the Senate floor for a number of reasons.

We must judge Senator Tower as we would someone who is not a former colleague—no better, no worse.

The requirement to render a judgment comes not from our being without sin. The requirement to render our best judgment comes from the Constitution of the United States. The Constitution requires us to give or not to give advise and consent to a nomination based on our best, conscientious judgment.

It does not say that those who accept an honorarium or a PAC contribution or who drink, are exempt from this obligation and responsibility. It says that we must consent or not consent to the nomination. It does not say that only those of us who are pure, or are saints, must vote. It says the Senate of the United States must reach its best judgment and consent or not consent to the nomination of the President of the United States.

The President is entitled to someone in whom he has confidence, of course. But, the Nation is also entitled to someone in whom it has confidence, and the requirement that the Senate vote on whether to confirm the President's choice helps assure that confidence. Based on the committee record, I do not have sufficient confidence, nor do I believe the public can have sufficient confidence, in Senator Tower's ability to effectively lead the Department of Defense.

First, I believe it would be very difficult for Senator Tower to effectively address the serious revolving door and conflict-of-interest problems at the Department of Defense.

Revolving door stories and procurement scandals have had center stage in the press in recent years. A February 6 lead article in Newsweek magazine addresses this subject. The lead sentence in that story refers to the revolving door as cashing in on public service. The American public followed the stories of Nofziger and Deaver, both of whom set out to make their fortune based on their contacts with the Reagan administration, having served in some of the highest positions in that administration.

The Department of Defense has been particularly beseiged by the problem. We have seen program managers on our major weapons systems leave the Department and turn up several days later at the same facility or at the facility of the leading contractor on the program that they were in charge of, but now wearing the contractor's hat. We have seen top Assistant Secretaries for the services do the same thing.

George Sawyer, for example, was the Assistant Secretary of the Navy for Shipbuilding and Logistics. He played a key role in negotiations with the Electric Boat Division of General Dynamics. He left the Navy and immediately went to work for General Dynamics.

Concerns about the revolving door go to both the fear that a Federal employee may be less than loyal to the Government when future employment with a contractor is a possibility and that upon leaving, former government employees will share inside information with their new employers.

Congress has wrestled with these issues. In last year's reauthorization of the Office of Federal Procurement Policy, we reflected a growing concern and recognition over this problem. In that bill we barred any Government official who was personally and substantially involved in a procurement from working on that same procurement for a contractor for 2 years from the time the Government official leaves office. We did that in order to avoid the temptation for recent Government employees to disclose inside information for private gain and to significantly reduce the questionable appearance that results from the revolving door.

On top of this, the Pentagon has also been plagued with procurement scandals—the Operation Ill Wind investigation being the most notable in the past 2 years. Secretary Weinberger was the target of political cartoonists who saw the Pentagon as a defense contractor's candy store. And just recently we have seen one of DOD's most important contractors paid back tens of millions of dollars to the Government for massive fraud, including false billings and coverups.

TV viewers have been witness to numerous procurement scandals in living color. ABC recently showed Northrup employees purchasing presumably military specific parts for the MX guidance system at a local Radio Shack as well as weapon systems that simply did not work.

I am not saying everything that has been reported has been accurate. But I am saying that the public's perception of the Pentagon and defense contractors is one of waste, fraud and abuse, and the public's confidence in the Pentagon and its contractors may be at an all time low.

Senator Tower, himself, agreed that restoring the public's confidence in the Pentagon is of primary importance. He described it as one of the "overarching objectives," of the next Secretary of Defense. I agreed that restoring confidence in the Pentagon is a No. 1 priority for the new Secretary; I am afraid Senator Tower is not the individual who can do it.

After serving as this country's chief negotiator to the long-range nuclear missile talks in Geneva, Senator Tower almost immediately hired on as a consultant to a number of DOD's biggest contractors. He was paid well for this from 1986 through 1988: $246,860 by LTV; $166,750 by Rockwell; $154,167 by Hicks and Associates; $116,000 by Martin Marietta; and $70,000 by Textron.

What did he do in his capacity as a defense contractor consultant? Well, according to the description Senator Tower provided to the committee, among other responsibilities he did the following:

For Martin Marietta, Tower & Associates "met with senior R&D and product managers on implications of INF Treaty and current START talks for the firm's future product development."

For Rockwell International, Tower & Associates "analyzed implications of arms negotiations talks and congressional activity on SDI" as well as meeting "with Rockwell management to discuss the future of the Midgetman system."

For Textron, Tower & Associates "met with senior management to discuss implications of INF and other arms control negotiations on the company's future product development."

Those companies are involved in product development, to use Senator Tower's words, and those products they were developing directly related to the ongoing confidential START negotiations. The products of those contractors are affected by our confidential bargaining strategies, our confidential negotiation goals and our confidential fall back positions. Some of the weapon systems are mentioned in the committee's report—the MX missile, the Midgetman missile, the Titan II and Titan IV space boosters, and others.

Senator Tower said he gave what he called enlightened advice related to future product development. The advice included what weapons systems these companies should or should not proceed with—or product development—based according to his own testimony and on his advice on the probable results of those ongoing, confidential START talks.

Mr. Tower testified that he did not disclose classified or confidential information and I have said I do not challenge that. But he said he provided his opinion on how the probable outcome of those confidential talks might affect the product development of his clients. So, he gave advice to his private clients on the very same weapons systems which were the subject of inside and confidential information which he had as our chief START negotiator.

I asked him whether or not he thought this created an appearance problem in that he could be perceived as using public office, that is—the inside, confidential information that he gained on the future of particular weapons as the START talks negotiator, for private gain, that is—the money that he received for his advice on the probable outcome of the START talks as it affected those same weapons. He said he did not see an appearance problem. I do. Mr. President, you cannot solve the problem if you do not recognize it in the first place.

When Senator NUNN asked Senator Tower whether it would be wrong "to give advice, not giving the negotiating position to a client, but to give advice that really was based on knowledge of the confidential negotiating position," Senator Tower said that it was a gray area "and that it is kind of difficult to come up with a conclusive answer on that."

I disagree. I believe it is clear that he cannot give advice to a client which is based on his confidential, inside information that he has obtained through his job.

Proving the basis for the advice may be difficult, but I believe the basis cannot be confidential information. By hiring himself out as a consultant to defense contractors to advise them on matters relating to the ongoing confidential START talks, Senator Tower created an inherent conflict. The large sums paid to him for his services created a duty to give his clients his best advice. At the same time, he had a public duty to safeguard the confidential information to which he was privy. Inevitably, there is a great prospect for conflict in those duties.

This is not a situation into which a person in the position he was in, the head of the START delegation, should willingly place himself, if he is determined to retain public confidence that he will protect the public interest that had been entrusted to him. Senator Tower's failure even to perceive this built-in conflict, demonstrates insensitivity to the problems created by the revolving door.

During the committee's hearing, I asked Senator Tower whether he saw an appearance problem with what he did, and he said he did not. I want to quote from the RECORD.

Senator LEVIN. In your situation, do you see that there is an appearance problem, when the chief negotiator, an ambassador to START talks, then leaves those talks and advises clients who have a very heavy stake in the outcome of those talks? In that situation, without suggesting any impropriety in actuality, without suggesting in the slightest that you advised them of confidential or privileged information, just the fact that you are advising them, as you put it, on probable outcomes of those talks, do you see an appearance problem there? That is my question.

Senator TOWER. I do not see it, Senator, because the question has not been raised until now. Nobody has ever questioned me on that before now and I have not really seen any press commentary on that.

Senator Tower does not see a problem here, that moving immediately from the Government's confidential negotiator on a treaty to a defense contractor's consultant on that same treaty creates an appearance of using inside information for personal gain. Are appearances important in this area? They are. Yet Senator Tower said he had not thought of it and does not see a problem in that situation, and that is very disturbing to me.

Taking this type of consulting job in the first place is a cause for concern, and we who are privy to the Government's secrets should shy away from putting ourselves in a position where there is economic pressure to disclose inside information or where outside observers would naturally believe we are or might be disclosing such information. But to be unwilling to see that such actions create an appearance problem, that also causes me great concern, because it is evidence of an insensitivity to an important ethical issue that dominates the public's perception of the Government in general and the Pentagon in particular.

More than that, if you do not see a problem, you are not in a position to correct it, and we have a problem in the Pentagon in our procurement processes. A big part of that problem is that revolving door through which too many of our high officials have moved.

The President has acknowledged the importance of avoiding bad appearances. In a recent speech to senior executive service employees, President Bush said: "The guiding principle (of his administration) will be simply to know right from wrong; to act in accordance with what is right and"—here are the keywords of President Bush—"to avoid even the appearance of what is wrong." "Government," he correctly stated, "should be an opportunity for public service, not private gain."

We have had an Executive Order 11222 that has been in effect for decades, that directs all employees to "avoid any action, whether or not specifically prohibited by the order, which might result in, or create the appearance of, using public office for private gain."

Do we care about appearances? I hope so. Recent editorials in some of the leading defense trade papers have expressed great concern about the appearance problem stemming from Senator Tower's consulting job. A leading commentator on defense matters, the Defense News, stated in a February 6, 1989, editorial urging Senator Tower to withdraw his name that "it is his job since 1986 as a defense consultant that is most troubling."

It goes on to say, "after 24 years in the Senate, Mr. Tower also understands the link between the public's perception and its support for defense. His decision to become a defense consultant was an explicit statement about the path he had chosen for himself. The principle task of the next Defense Secretary is to build public confidence that the Pentagon is being well managed and that defense dollars are being carefully spent. The Defense Secretary must be an independent voice of force, authority, and reason. There is ample reason to doubt whether Mr. Tower is the man for these times."

That is the Defense News. The Army Times, another respected leading commentator on defense affairs, also referred to Senator Tower's work as a defense consultant as a most troubling issue. "No one has claimed that Senator Tower acted illegally in receiving big fees from defense firms in return for what, by Tower's own description, was precious little real information. But the speed * * * with which Tower spun through the revolving door is appalling," wrote the Army Times.

The editorial added that the charges against Senator Tower "undeniably create the impression of a man much too cozy with the Pentagon's worst ways of doing business. Indeed," they wrote, "he is almost a caricature of how most people see the Defense Department." The Air Force Times and Navy Times had a similar editorial.

Mr. President, I do not believe that Senator Tower, with his attitude on the subject, as demonstrated by his own actions and words, would be able to address effectively the myriad revolving door and procurement problems which face the Pentagon and which have sapped its procurement process of its public support. He would lack the credibility to deliver the right message and the sensitivity to acknowledge the scope and the intensity of the problem.

As to the alcohol issue, White House officials were wrong when they asserted that the FBI file discloses " 'no corroborating witnesses' to prove that Mr. Tower had a drinking problem in recent years" and that "not one" allegation about excessive drinking by Senator Tower could be corroborated.

White House officials can reach whatever conclusions they want from the FBI file which they provided us, but the facts speak for themselves, and their characterizations of those facts were wrong.

Just as reasonable people will disagree on other aspects of this nomination, reasonable people can reach different conclusions from the FBI file as to whether Senator Tower engaged in excessive alcohol usage in the 1980's.

But it is indisputable that in that FBI file there is a significant number of interviews with identified eyewitnesses, witnesses with no known motive to lie, who said that they saw Senator Tower during the 1980's either drinking to excess or who described the after effects of such drinking. And I want to repeat—we are not allowed, given the rules of confidentially which have been imposed on us by the White House, to release the information contained in that FBI file, it is confidential, not through our choice but through the White House requirements. But given the fact that we cannot on this floor state the names of those identified witnesses, with no known motive to lie, who came forward with this information, we can only restate the conclusion. And it is a conclusion which to me is indisputable from that FBI file. There is in that FBI file a significant number of interviews with identified eyewitnesses, with no known motive to lie, who said that they saw Senator Tower during the 1980's either drinking to excess or who describe the after effects of such drinking.

I want to emphasize a critical point, because the issue has come up here about this FBI file. It is difficult for all of us, no matter which conclusion we have reached in the best of our consciences and judgment, to argue a case when there is a restriction upon us that relative to the drinking problem we cannot identify upon which witness's testimony in that file we are relying. But the choice to put that restriction on this decade is the choice of the White House, not of the Senate. We were not allowed even to read that White House file except under a promise that we would not disclose its contents. The White House obtained that promise from our chairman and our ranking member. And so it is the choice of the White House that we be so restricted in this debate; that we can only state conclusions we have reached in our consciences and in our best judgment. My conclusion is that there is significant evidence from a substantial number of identified, not anonymous, witnesses with no known motive to lie, who have come forward and said that in the 1980's the drinking problem of Senator Tower continued.

Mr. President, Senator Tower has vast knowledge in the defense and foreign policy field. Before the committee's hearings on this nomination, frankly, I assumed I would vote in favor of that nomination. Before the hearings began, I had actually prepared a draft statement saying that I had planned to vote for the confirmation of the former chairman of our commmittee because of the knowledge which he has in the area of defense. But following these hearings and following my best, conscientious judgment, I have concluded that Senator Tower falls short in the area of sensitivity to appearances created by that revolving door through which he himself so swifty passed. And that he falls short in winning my confidence that his excessive drinking problems ended in the 1970's.

In conclusion, our Presidents are entitled to substantial leeway in selecting their Cabinets, but this appointment for Secretary of Defense, the No. 2 person in chain-of-command and a person who must lead the Pentagon by example through an exceedingly difficult period in the Defense Department's history, I regret to say falls unacceptably short.

Mr. WARNER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, may I ask the distinguished Senator from Michigan for his attention for a moment. The Senator from Michigan represented that it was the White House that has put the hammerlock, the padlock on the information in S-407.

Mr. LEVIN. That is my understanding.

Mr. WARNER. I think it is important that we seek a clarification. I see here the distinguished chairman of the committee. First, I would like to refer to a letter dated February 14, 1989, which Chairman NUNN put in the RECORD this morning, and I read because I think it goes directly to the point raised by the Senator from Michigan. It is from Boyden Gray, counsel to the President, with a copy to the ranking member.

Dear Mr. Chairman: With respect to our conversation last Friday regarding access by the Senate Armed Services Committee to the FBI summary of its background investigation of Senator Tower in connection with the nomination as Secretary of Defense, I'm gratified that we have now reached an understanding on the way in which we will proceed.

I emphasize "reached an understanding" because indeed the chairman and I did meet with White House counsel to address this difficult issue.

I believe the fact that all of the committee's subsequent deliberations involving the FBI summary on Senator Tower's nomination will occur during executive session only, that this nomination has significant national security implications and the unique nature of the allegations concerning Senator Tower warrant a one-time only exception to the procedures governing access to FBI background investigations by committee members. The documents we will provide are extremely sensitive. Their disclosure could jeopardize the privacy interests of Senator Tower and others, the confidentiality of FBI sources, the FBI's ability to conduct background investigations for others, and our ability to recruit qualified candidates for positions of governmental service. Therefore, I am pleased that we have agreed on ground rules for committee access that suit our purposes and yours. The enclosed terms of access set forth procedures for access, custody, storage and return to the executive FBI background. With this understanding we are prepared to deliver copies of these documents to your committee immediately.

Now, it is interesting that in the brief 10 years I have been on the Armed Services Committee I have served under three and now four distinguished chairmen: First John Stennis, of Mississippi; next John Tower, of Texas; then Barry Goldwater, the Senator from Arizona; and now the distinguished Senator from Georgia.

The Senator from Georgia, when we were given our respective responsibilities by the members of the committee, decided that we would, as I would characterize it, take additional steps with respect to Presidential nominations. Heretofore, the committee, only on rare occasions, had the chairman or the ranking member examine FBI material. Now, that is history and the reasons for that perhaps are best known to the chairmen who have now departed. I think, quite properly, Chairman NUNN at his initiative, with my concurrence, notified the President—at this time President Ronald Reagan and then we notified candidate Bush and subsequently President Bush—that it would be our practice for the chairman and the ranking member to examine very carefully FBI material.

Well, as the chairman said, yes, and I say this respectfully, the Presidential candidate on the Democratic side, the Governor of Massachusetts, Mr. Dukakis.

Mr. Chairman, we then, the chairman and I, recognized that in order for us to fulfill our responsibilities as trustees for the committee, that not only would we make our own judgment but we felt it imperative that the other members of the committee likewise have access to the material. That is the reason for this particular document.

Yesterday afternoon, Chairman NUNN and I, and White House counsel, spent a considerable period of time together with counsel on the minority side, the majority side, and counsel from both the majority leader of the U.S. Senate and the Republican leader, Mr. DOLE. It was the consensus after a meeting of about an hour or so that we simply could find no way by which to devise a formula to take the FBI material in any way, sanitize it, reduce it, or agree upon a common body of fact to be used by the Senate in open debate.

I hope the Senator from Michigan would reflect on that, because in the presence of my chairman I say that I believe all decisions with reference to this record to date have been made as a result of a conscientious effort by the President's representatives, the majority leader representative, namely the chairman of the committee, and myself speaking thus far for the Republican side.

We have not as yet found a way by which to provide Members in open session with the liberty to make specific references to the FBI material in S-407. I draw the attention of the Members of the Senate to rule XXIX of the U.S. Senate, which also covers the use of such material in the reference thereto by Members of the Senate.

Mr. NUNN. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. WARNER. Yes.

Mr. NUNN. I would say I have listened carefully to the Senator from Virginia, and I agree with what he said. I also agree with what the Senator from Michigan has said. The property here of the executive branch and the Gray letter makes that clear. The effort to see if there could be a so-called sanitized version has been a joint effort in the last couple of days, but there was a period of time, and I am losing track of time now, at the end of last week, where the White House had a unilateral announcement that they were going to try to issue a sanitized report. At that stage last week, last weekend, I was not contacted. I had anticipated they might issue one on their own, and my statement last weekend was that, if they issued one on their own, it would not reflect accurately to the American people the correct sort of summary; then, or if it was distorted, the committee would find no other way because we could not issue our own. The White House could do it today. They could come out with a sanitized version today. The committee cannot do that because we bound ourselves to respect this letter and this contract.

So the point I wanted to make last weekend was that if the White House, as they could do, issues a sanitized version—it was not out—then we would not be in the position to do anything to put out an accurate version because we would still be bound by our agreement. At that state, we would have to consider calling witnesses, which I made it clear I did not want to do.

So I think that is important background. The Senator from Virginia is entirely correct. Did he meet with Mr. Gray yesterday afternoon or was it the day before?

Mr. WARNER. Nights go into day, Mr. President. I am not sure.

Mr. NUNN. It was this week, in the last 2 days. We tried to see if there could be a three-way agreement to try to sanitize the version. I think during the course of conversation we picked out several examples, and went through them hypothetically. I believe I would be correct in saying that it was the conclusion of White House counsel, the Senator from Virginia, the Senator from Georgia as well, and the key staff people there that the difficulties would be almost insurmountable and that we would be spending a week, 2 weeks, maybe even 3 weeks simply trying to agree on this.

When we got through with it, the feeling that I had—and I think Mr. Gray shared this—was that the public thirst for this information would probably not be satisfied then. Also, when you delete, for instance, on a particular source the name and the background where the individual cannot be identified, then you lose the ability of the public to weigh whether they would accord that particular individual credibility or not. It makes a lot of difference. Even on anonymous witnesses the FBI goes to a good bit of detail about the background of that witness, the general area of that witness, the experience of that witness, the association of that witness with the particular nominee in question, all of those things, and if they gave the account of the anonymous witness to the point that it would give the true flavor of it, the testimony, then a good investigative reporter could spend a few hours and find out the name just based on the circumstances.

So the long and short of it is we did try, and we all concluded that it would be an exercise in futility. Even if we were to reach an agreement, by the time we did it we would delay this nomination for a long time, and we would also probably end up with the news media and the American public being just as frustrated because there would be so much in the way of reactions.

So back to the question: if the President chose to release the whole FBI report this afternoon, the whole thing, he can do it.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I challenge my good friend on that. He knows that the recitations in this letter are predicated on a history of practice by all Presidents.

Mr. NUNN. Absolutely. I agree with that.

Mr. WARNER. Therefore, do not hold up the challenge that by a stroke of the pen George Bush could release the record this afternoon. It could not take place because he would hamper the ability of the FBI, and other investigatory agencies of this Government to conduct those background checks.

Mr. NUNN. I completely agree with the Senator on that.

Mr. WARNER. On that point I think we agree.

Mr. NUNN. I do not believe any of us would disagree. I did not say it would be wise.

Mr. WARNER. I know. But by inclination of the Senator's voice, by judicious language of his hand, he left a doubt that the President with a stroke of the pen could just open this mystery up and bring forth into this Chamber stacks of material from which we would search out the truth for many hours.

Mr. NUNN. The Senator from Virginia makes a very good point. I would stand corrected as to the tone of my voice.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I think the point has been covered.

Mr. LEVIN. If the Senator from Virginia, my friend, will yield, as I understand it, the key point being is that these documents are the property of the executive branch. That is the only thing.

Mr. WARNER. That is correct. It has been the practice of Presidents, be they Democrat or Republican, and in the interest of good Government they cannot just simply release it.

Mr. NUNN. I think the Senator is correct. I think all of us have to keep in mind here something I said earlier this morning. As important as this matter is now—and it is important, I do not diminish the importance of it one iota; We spend hours, hours, hundreds and hundreds of hours working on it and thinking about it—but as important as it is, when it is over, when John Tower is confirmed as Secretary of Defense or when he is not confirmed, this Government is going to go on. We still are going to have to have confidential communications, and the executive branch, particularly the new administration, has to be able to have confidence in Congress and vice versa.

So I think we have to keep in mind the larger picture. I would think this President, like any other President, before he releases an FBI report, would look at that larger picture and how it affected his ability to get confidential information to make his evaluation of future nominees. There are hundreds of positions that have not been filled. If the President of the United States did something here that impeded the FBI's ability to look at other people and to get confidential sources from other people, it might very well harm the President's ability to make wise choices.

So there are a lot of things to consider. We are talking about the difference between theoretical capabilities and the practical considerations.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I think the manner in which the distinguished chairman has spoken here on this issue, for a moment an issue of controversy, now hopefully resolved, reflects on the manner in which he with honor and distinction, and with complete fairness and objectivity, worked with this Senator in the preparation of the record for our committee and the Senate as a whole.

I thank the chairman.

Mr. GORTON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SIMON), The Senator from Washington.

Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, under normal circumstances, a Senator in my position, newly returned to this body, and as a junior member of the Committee on Armed Services, would almost certainly not speak in this body on the President's nomination for a Secretary of Defense.

If one in my position felt particularly strongly or wished to curry a little bit of favor, he might, however, write up a short statement and have it included in the RECORD. Under those circumstances, that statement would cover the background and experience of the nominee. It would point out, in this case, that John Tower served for four terms, some 24 years, as a Member of the U.S. Senate, and all or almost all of that time was as a member of the Senate Committee on Armed Services.

I would probably include the observation, common to all of his colleagues, that the work of that committee was the work which John Tower considered to be most important in the U.S. Senate, on which he spent the greater part of his great abilities, his time, and his effort.

Such a statement would point out his interests in some of the most archaic elements of arms control, of weapons systems, of the relationships among our armed services, and, of course, of the ultimate purpose of those armed services, the security of the United States of America.

Certainly, any such statement would point to the undoubted intelligence and thoughtfulness of John Tower. It would speak admiringly of his dedication to his position and to his duties as a Member of the U.S. Senate, which, even in a body of hard-working and dedicated people, was clearly outstanding.

If one wanted to add, perhaps, a little bit of humor or levity, as one went on in such a statement to discuss the strength of character which was exhibited from the beginning of his Senate career to the end of that career, one might even use the three-word phrase which appeared in Charles Krauthammer's column in the Washington Post yesterday, describing John Tower as—and I quote—"A tough little bastard."

One might finish by pointing out that after 24 years of service with his colleagues here in the U.S. Senate and the people of Texas, whom he represented, John Tower went on to represent all of the people in the United States in a distinguished capacity as an arms negotiator in Geneva; and, of course, that he had been selected by a newly-elected President for the vitally important post of Secretary of Defense.

It then would have concluded with an expression of delight at the wisdom of the President of the United States for picking such a qualified person for that position, and a pledge, along with 99 other Members of the Senate, to vote in favor of that nomination.

That, of course, is not the case here today. We seem almost to assume all of those charactistics on the part of John Tower. As was the case with the distinguished junior Senator from Texas, who spoke not long ago, each of us, to quote the praises heaped upon John Tower, as he retired from this body and went on to another career, praising without exception the qualities which I have just outlined.

We might even point to a slightly later episode in this body, in which early in 1985 John Tower was confirmed by voice vote, after a unanimous vote of a committee, to be U.S. Ambassador to the strategic arms reduction talks. That appointment, incidentally, must also have been accompanied by an FBI report, to which every element of character, which is relevant here today, must have then been relevant.

But that is not the way in which this nomination has proceeded. We are faced here with a report of the majority of the members of the Armed Services Committee, which questions or asserts, I might say, more properly, in spite of this long and distinguished career, a lack of ability to lead the Defense Department on the part of John Tower. In supporting that conclusion of the negative recommendation of the majority report, there are four distinct, but connected, threads, to that opposition. First, assertions with respect to the nominee's use of alcoholic beverages. Second, his relationship with women, the one word characterization of which is womanizing. Third, his representation of certain defense interests in the period of time after he ceased to be an arms control negotiator in Geneva and before he was selected for this position by the President of the United States. Fourth, and I think it is safe to say, most significantly, a set of objections or reasons which goes under the title of, and I have to quote this word, "perceptions."

I would like, if I may just briefly, since each of them has previously been discussed, mention each of those four objections, and then make a few independent observations of my own. We have just heard and seen a debate over the FBI report. Most particularly, with respect to allegations levied against John Tower connected with the consumption of alcohol. Since this is already a part of the public record, we do know that some of those allegations are anonymous, some of them are attached to names. One of them, perhaps the most significant of all, at least as we look back to the decade of the 1970's, has attached to it the name of a Member of Congress, of the House of Representatives. I may say, Mr. President, just briefly and in passing, that I hope I never have a supporter so strong and a friend so close as John Tower has in the Congressman from Texas, LARRY COMBEST, who apparently was simply attempting to prove by his testimony that the consumption of alcohol never affected John Tower's performance of his duties as a Member of the U.S. Senate.

But however we characterize the testimony, which is included in that FBI report, we, the Members of this body, are the best witnesses of John Tower's personal habits and the impact, if any, of those personal habits on the way in which he conducted himself and discharged his duties as Member of the U.S. Senate and as a chairman of the Committee on Armed Services.

As I sat through last Thursday evening's meeting of the Armed Services Committee and listened to the remarks on the nomination I counted 10 of the 20 members of that committee who served as members of the Armed Services Committee with John Tower. I counted 14 of those 20 who had served in the U.S. Senate with John Tower. And as has been here reported, without anyone quarreling with the figure, 70 of the 100 Members of this body served in the U.S. Senate with John Tower.

It is remarkable that none of those individuals came to the FBI, to the Committee on Armed Services, or to this point to the floor of the U.S. Senate to testify on the basis of his or her firsthand knowledge that he or she had ever seen John Tower drink to excess, act in a manner inappropriate with his position or duties, most particularly that his work in committee or here on the floor was ever impacted in the slightest by whatever drinking habits that he engaged in.

This is particularly remarkable in light of the fact that John Tower himself has said that in retrospect there were certainly times during the decade of the 1970's when he drank to excess.

That, it seems to me, is the evidence of most value. That, it seems to me, is the evidence which is overwhelmingly probative of whether or not John Tower ever had in the past or is likely to have in the future his duties impacted adversely by alcoholic beverages.

It is now fashionable as a part of this debate to point to certain rules and regulations and to assert variously that John Tower by reason of his personal habits could not be hired as an agent of the Federal Bureau of Investigation or be promoted to be a squadron commander or some other similar office in the Strategic Air Command or some other military organization which has control over nuclear weapons.

Again, the distinguished junior Senator from Texas dealt with that specific issue by pointing out that under the Constitution of the United States the President of the United States is Commander in Chief of our Armed Forces and that the ultimate decision in that respect was and remains his.

I would like to point out something quite different. To the best of my knowledge John Tower has never sought appointment as an agent of the Federal Bureau of Investigation and has never sought a position as an officer in the Air Force or any other military service in which he would have that military responsibility over nuclear weapons.

I think the evidence is almost overwhelming for the proposition that had he sought a professional career as an officer in the Air Force he would in fact have met all of those qualifications.

What John Tower has sought during the course of the last 30 years has been a career as a Senator of the United States, and I want to emphasize once again that he has never acted in any fashion which has caused him to be criticized in the U.S. Senate or as a U.S. Senator in the performance of his duties. He has lived up to every requirement, written or unwritten, in connection with that office and with his position as an arms control negotiator.

Most recently, just 3 or 4 days ago, John Tower pledged if it is necessary as a qualification for Secretary of Defense, as it has never been in the past, that he drink no alcoholic beverages under any set of circumstances during the period of time that he holds that office, that he will not do so under pain of losing that office.

I do not believe that to be a necessary qualification for the office. I do believe in the truthfulness and accuracy of John Tower's pledge under the circumstances that he will in fact keep that pledge.

I must refer to two incidents in only a slightly different manner which my distinguished colleague from Texas did earlier. We are very fortunate that we are not making judgments about the appropriate character for a commander of the armies of the United States during the course of the Civil War. That famous story which almost everyone in this body knows about Lincoln and the temperance leaders who asked that General Grant be fired because he drank whisky is still appropriate in this circumstance. President Lincoln is reported to have asked the temperance leaders to find what brand of whisky it was that General Grant was consuming so that he could provide a barrel of it to each of his other generals.

I also believe that the free world is extremely fortunate that the members of the majority party on the Committee on Armed Services did not have a vote in the Parliament of the United Kingdom when it faced the duty of selecting a new Prime Minister in May of 1940, because if they had been they certainly would have rejected the name of Winston Churchill on the grounds which they have asserted here.

We simply, it seems to me here and elsewhere, are attempting to impose an after-the-fact rule which we would not impose on ourselves and which we have not ever in the past imposed on any nominee for this or any similar position.

Next, Mr. President, perhaps even a discussion of the second element in this opposition that of—I put it in quotation marks—"womanizing" makes us all rather uncomfortable. The majority of the committee does state, "nor does the record support the allegation, that the nominee asserted sexual pressure on employees and associates of the opposite sex," and then goes on, however, to bring these various incidents in as a part of the fourth objection which I will get to later, that of perception.

I think from the factual standpoint the majority committee report is accurate in its characterization that there is no support in the record for such allegation.

Thirdly, of course we get to the point which was most strongly emphasized by the distinguished Senator from Michigan, Mr. LEVIN, that would disqualify John Tower from this position because for a period of approximately 2 years he provided advice to and representation of certain defense contractors. Again, from the beginning of this debate I have listened in vain for any statement, any allegation, that the nominee violated any law or regulation or any rule of this body. In fact, it seems to be stipulated that he did not. No law has been violated. No regulation has been violated. No rule of the Senate of the United States with respect to former Members was violated by Senator Tower's representation.

In fact, even the editorials for various publications which were read by the distinguished Senator from Michigan do not claim any such violation.

(Mr. BRYAN assumed the chair.)

Mr. GORTON. They make the point with which I will deal just a little bit later, and I think I can almost quote this, that the charges themselves are enough to disqualify the nominee.

Now, I believe, Mr. President, that it is safe to say that no Member of this body believes that his or her acceptance of honoraria from any source or his or her acceptance of campaign contributions from any source disables that Member of the Senate from dealing objectively and soundly with issues which come before this body which affect the sources of those honoraria or those campaign contributions.

There are, of course, some who would abolish the ability either to accept honoraria or campaign contributions, but even there they do it mostly, again, on the basis of mere appearances and make no accusations or allegations that votes are affected by the acceptance of that money.

And yet here we impose a clear double standard on this nominee stating an unwillingness to believe that his unqualified assertion that he will not be affected in the performance of his duties as Secretary of Defense by the fact that he was previously employed by or retained by a defense contractor.

Ironically, Mr. President, many of the names which have been suggested as alternative nominees for Secretary of Defense, indeed many of the names which were suggested during November and December, after the election, as Secretary of Defense in order to clean up the Pentagon, or whatever phrases were used, were people who had spent their entire careers as officers or officers and directors of major defense contractors in the United States. Their names were suggested, presumably, because they had a sufficient depth of experience with the way in which such contractors operate so that they could become effective supervisors of defense contractor activity wearing the hat of the Secretary of Defense.

I believe those suggestions to have been sound. I would much prefer to have someone who has worked in and understands the inner workings of General Motors or General Dynamics in an important position in the Defense Department, where everything that he or she does is subjected to public scrutiny, than I would someone totally inexperienced with the way in which those entities operate.

It is for that reason that I draw exactly the opposite conclusion from that of the Senator from Michigan. I think that the 2 years that John Tower spent in the private sector are advantages to him in taking over this position, that it has given him a different insight to the insight which he gained either as a Member of the U.S. Senate or as an arms control negotiator, into the heart of some of the very challenges with which the Secretary of Defense will be faced.

I believe him to be an honest, upright, intelligent, and honorable individual who will use that experience to be more critical and more sophisticated in supervising the activities of those contractors than he could have been had he never had any such experience.

Moreover, we look at this whole problem, and I believe that if we accept the position of the Senator from Michigan, we are inevitably led to the conclusion that the only persons who are eligible to be Secretary of Defense will be those who have spent their entire adult careers as employees or elected officials of the Government of the United States, as civil servants or otherwise, perhaps, though I am not at all sure of this, as academics, or are so totally divorced from the concerns of national defense that they are completely ignorant of either debates over defense policy or of the activities of people and corporations who are involved in the defense of the United States.

Glorifying ignorance and lack of experience as qualifications for one of the most important positions in the Cabinet of the United States seems to me, Mr. President, at the very least to be perverse.

The fourth reason which we are given that seems to me, from my careful attendance at the meeting of the Committee on Armed Services last Thursday night, the principal reason given by opponents to this nomination is not centered in any of these first three allegations. It is centered in what one majority member of the committee called "empty cartridges"; another, "rumors"; a third, "allegations"; a fourth, "innuendo"; and almost all, "perceptions."

George Will, in a column yesterday, came to a conclusion, more eloquent than I would otherwise reach in summarizing the process of reaching a committee decision on this challenge, in these word, "Thus, a confirmation process which began purporting to pursue the truth ends by declaring the truth irrelevant."

That seems to me, Mr. President, fairly to summarize the report of the majority of the Armed Services Committee on this nomination. The truth is irrelevant; appearance and perceptions reign.

It is my firm opinion, Mr. President, that standard of evidence and that standard of judgment would be so wrong as to be disastrous even if we were to announce that we would apply it prospectively and only to future actions of people who some day may be nominated for vital positions in this Government. To apply it retrospectively seems to me to be overwhelmingly disastrous policy.

The Constitution of the United States prohibits this Congress from passing any ex post facto law. Now, it is obvious, Mr. President, as you and I have shared former positions as attorneys general of our States that the confirmation process by the Senate of the United States is not the passage of a law and it is, therefore, not unconstitutional, in the narrow sense of that term, for us to apply any standard of judgment which we wish to apply. But the policy of the judgment of the Founding Fathers of this country who placed that ex post factor prohibition in our Constitution does, it seems to me, apply to us here now.

It is both unjust inappropriate and damaging to the cause of good government for us to apply after the fact a set of standards clearly going beyond any violation of the law or any violation of standards of conduct which has ever previously been applied to a person seeking this position.

It is partly, of course, as a result of exactly that kind of retroactive judgment that we here, if we reject this nomination, are doing a terrible injustice.

We have already gone a long way down the road to the destruction of the reputation and, I say bluntly, the professional future of an American who has dedicated almost all of this adult life to the service of this Nation and, most particularly, the service of this Nation's security; a destruction of reputation and future which in my view is whatout justification, and violating the spirit, if not expressed terms, of the Constitution of the United States.

The newly elected President of the United States has chosen John Tower to be his Secretary of Defense. He has continued to express his confidence in John Tower throughout the increasing bitterness of this dabate. As at least one and perhaps more of those who have spoken in this body on this issue this afternoon has already pointed out, never, nor once in the 200 years of this body, has it rejected the nominee of a newly-elected President to a position in his Cabinet. And only eight individuals have had their names rejected out of more than 500 such nominees at any time.

That precedent, Mr. President, shows more eloquently than can any remarks on this floor the appropriate standard by which this Senate has judged Presidential nominees for positions in his Cabinet.

In spite of the fact that the same words are used in the Constitution, it is a different standard than we have used for—to take the other extreme—Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States who, of course, serve for life. A member of the Cabinet serves the President and serves at the President's pleasure. Such a nominee should not be rejected except on the basis of overwhelming and absolutely proven evidence of incompetency or of bad character.

I do not believe that any Member of this body can possibly asset that that kind of overwhelming proof was evidenced in this case. In fact, of course, it is almost certain that a majority of the Members of this body have testified to the good character and competence of this nominee within the course of the last 4 years; some on the floor of this Senate, many others outside of it.

One Member of this body has now suggested that the President switch positions and nominate his choice for National Security Adviser to be Secretary of Defense and Mr. Tower to be National Security Adviser. If that Member of this body were President of the United States that would have been a perfectly appropriate choice. It implies that Mr. Tower is perfectly well suited to serve in a vitally important position, at the right hand of the President of the United States. That Senator, however, is not President of the United States and that is not, under those circumstances, a valid suggestion. In fact, it seems to me to undercut, almost completely, the announced intention of that Senator to vote against this nomination.

One final point, Mr. President. Having said that I believe John Tower to be fully qualified for this position, and after having stated that I do not believe that any of the set of objections to him, whether specific or perceptual, are valid grounds on which to turn down the nomination, and after having claimed for myself, I think accurately, the position of an overwhelming presumption in favor of a Presidential nominee in this body, each of which would be more than sufficient in and of itself to cause us to vote in favor of this nomination, I do wish to make one other point which I do not believe has been brought up to this point during the debate.

The debate in which we are engaged today, and the actions and history which have led up to it over the course of the past 6 weeks or so, have been clearly destructive of the good order and the respectful relationships among Members of this body and between this body, perhaps the entire Congress of the United States, and our newly elected President. All of us welcomed and feel that we have benefited by the respect, good feelings and kind words exchanged between the President and the Congress and among the various Members of this body at the beginning of this new administration.

We have all reflected on the fact that the people of the United States once again have chosen a divided Government with one party controlling the President, the other party having a majority in both Houses of Congress.

We have, almost all of us, perhaps all of us, dedicated ourselves to the proposition the people of the United States have called upon us to make that situation, which until a few years ago was extraordinary but now seems to be more and more ordinary—work. The people of the United States did not want deep and bitter partisan divisions.

I am not a Member, Mr. President, who believes that we have gotten to this point in this debate on the basis of a deliberate plan or plot on the part of any individual or any group. I am convinced that in a very real sense, it just sort of happened. But we are here and every one of us knows perfectly well that it has caused a sharp, a rapid and a severe deterioration in personal and institutional relationships. We are going to face many issues, bluntly, many of which are more important than the nomination of the Secretary of Defense of the United States, in the coming months. They are going to be divisive because there are different ideas about how we should meet them and how we should handle them. We would do well to meet those with a feeling of at least personal and institutional accommodation with one another.

Now, simply by reason of its majority, the majority party here has complete authority and ability to confirm or reject this nomination. They have that right and they have that responsibility. It is my view, Mr. President, for the restoration of that trust and confidence among the Members of this body that is vital to the successful meeting of the challenges that we are going to face during the course of this and next year, that only the Members of the majority party, or some of them, can cause a restoration of that trust and confidence among us. A bloody rejection battle over this nomination is certainly possible and is predicted by many. I do not believe that whatever can be gained by such a political victory is likely to be worth its cost.

I plead as earnestly as I possibly can for a reconsideration on the part of the Members of the leadership of the majority party of the course of action which I am convinced they launched upon inadvertently. A gracious retreat will pay far greater dividends than a tainted victory.

Mr. President, I ask Senators to consider what they have the power to do. Do justice to a conscientious, hard working and patriotic American.

Support the appropriate prerogatives of the President of the United States. Diffuse the poisons that keep creeping into the deliberations of this U.S. Senate. Confirm John Tower as Secretary of Defense.

Mr. GLENN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, none of us feel comfortable with a confirmation process in which all the rules of evidence are not there, in which charges are not required to be refuted under oath, in which the usual rules of evidence that protect every American are evident in consideration. But that is the system that we have.

Let me say starting out that when we got to the confirmation process with regard to the President's nomination for Secretary of Defense, I was predisposed to vote for John Tower, vote in favor of his nomination. I did not have much doubt that I would be voting in favor, but I said we will have the hearings and then I will reach a final decision at that time.

It is too bad that the farther we went, the more information I received, the more information that came out of the seven FBI reports that we have now—seven—the more information, the more doubts that were created as to the suitability of our former colleague here to be the new Secretary of Defense.

We started receiving allegations shortly after the nomination process began in the Armed Services Committee regarding the fitness of John Tower to be the Secretary of Defense. Literally hundreds of phone calls and letters came in. Most of those were seined out. They were available for people to look at who were on the committee. Only nine out of all those were sent back to the White House with a request for more information and FBI study of this.

Let me say at the outset that at each stage along this whole tortuous process we have been through, that has been the track that had to be followed. When the committee had an allegation they thought should be investigated, it went from the committee to the White House with a request. The White House was the controlling body in this. Then they requested the FBI. The same thing back the other way, from the FBI to the White House to us.

Most of the questions that came in, most of the allegations that came in centered on John Tower's drinking problem. Former Senator Tower said that he had no problem, that there was no alcohol abuse in his background.

The White House, however, debated his fitness for over a month. It was not a sudden thing. They went through a lot of debate back and forth in the White House as to whether he should be the nominee or not. The President finally made his nomination on the 16th of December, but what information did the President have at that time? Did he have all these FBI reports? No. He did not even have yet the first FBI report in its entirety. What the President had available was titled "Summary Memorandum Containing the Partial Results of the Investigation of John G. Tower," plus Mr. Tower's statement that he had no alcohol abuse in his background, and the President went ahead and made his nomination on December 16.

I do not know whether the President would do the same thing today or whether he would make sure that all those FBI reports got careful scrutiny before he made his nomination if it were to be done again today.

(By unanimous consent, remarks delivered by Mr. GLENN at this point have been expunged.)

Mr. McCAIN. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. GLENN. No; I would rather complete my statement and then I will respond to any questions.

Other people did not make those same observations of those same incidents.

Mr. McCAIN. Will the Senator yield for the purpose of answering a question?

Mr. GLENN. Go ahead.

Mr. McCAIN. I ask my colleague, from what he is saying by selecting words, then it is therefore allowable to quote words rather than sentences from a confidential FBI report? Is that now my colleague's understanding of the confidentiality of this report, selected words?

Mr. GLENN. Once again, we are down into arguing what we can say about the FBI report. I think all these reports have been in the press numerous times now, on leaks from the other side, in fact stated by Republican members of the Armed Services Committee the night that we voted.

Mr. McCAIN. I thank the Senator. I understand now it is allowable to quote words from a confidential report, which is supposed to be kept confidential.

Mr. GLENN. No; you are probably right. While I have a number of other ones to go through here that are of a similar nature that takes us clear up to the current time here, I will dispense with that and we will go on. You make a good point, and I buy your argument.

Mr. DOLE. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. GLENN. Yes.

Mr. DOLE. Parliamentary inquiry. Is it appropriate to quote words from the FBI report?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The FBI report is a document that has been given to the Congress in such confidentiality, and the confidentiality must be abided.

Mr. DOLE. So what do we do? They have already spoken. I make that inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By way of response, under rule XXIX, paragraph 3: "All confidential communications made by the President of the United States to the Senate shall be, by the Senators and the officers of the Senate, kept secret." That is what the rule provides.

Mr. DOLE. If the Senator will yield for a further inquiry, quoting words from the FBI report is in effect violating that particular rule. It seems to me it is unfair to the nominee. We cannot get anything else out of the report. Now can we have that matter expunged from the RECORD and the media as though it were not said? What recourse does the nominee have?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The rule provides that by order of the Senate, remarks may be expunged from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. DOLE. Is there any objection to expunging those remarks that were quoted from the FBI report from the RECORD.

Mr. GLENN. I will agree to that if that settles it.

Mr. DANFORTH addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, reserving the right to object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio still has the floor unless he is yielding.

Mr. GLENN. No; I yielded for a question.

Mr. DANFORTH. I thought a unanimous-consent request had been made.

Mr. GLENN. I yielded for a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. I think the unanimous consent was to have it stricken from the RECORD as the Chair understood it.

Mr. DANFORTH. That is right, and I reserve the right to object. I would like to find out exactly what is being expunged, because not only were direct quotes made from the record but selective characterizations from the FBI report were also made designating individuals by description, designating the substance of what they allegedly had to say and then in some cases direct quotes from what they did say. So my question and my reservation is, what are we expunging from the RECORD? Are we expunging in entirety the remarks of the Senator from Ohio where he characterizes what he claims is in the FBI report, or are we simply expunging specific words which were direct quotes?

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I used no names. There was not an identification of anyone. They were mostly single words to give an impression of what the FBI report gave which has been what I have been hearing all day from the other side too, or the impressions of the FBI report. If the words are offensive, I will be glad to have those stricken from the RECORD. If it is more than that, perhaps I will start over again then, with the whole speech.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, further reserving the right to object, it would be my opinion that characterizations such as descriptions without names of the individuals who purported to make these statements, together with not only direct quotes but with paraphrases of what they said should be stricken from the RECORD.

Mr. GLENN. These were single word descriptions, I believe almost all of them, that I used. They were not identified with any one person. They did not pinpoint any one person. I used no names. I had no idea that my remarks would be objected to because the FBI reports have been characterized on the other side today as inoffensive remarks, as meaning nothing.

If there is a desire that I start my whole speech over again and expunge everything up to now, we can do that if that solves the problem.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, further reserving the right to object—I am not objecting. I simply reserve the right to object to try to determine what the request of the Senator from Kansas was and what the agreement by the Senator from Ohio was with respect to expungement.

Mr. NUNN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the senior Senator from Georgia.

Mr. NUNN. Reserving the right to object, I believe that every Senator ought to be very careful about how they phrase any wording. Now, we have had a lot of discussion out here today about the ballerina from that side of the aisle over and over and over again. The thing that really refutes the ballerina charge is in the FBI report.

Mr. COHEN. If the Senator will yield, that was based upon a report that appeared in the Washington Post, nothing about the FBI report. That was leaked to the press.

Mr. GLENN. Let me say to the Senator I believe I still have the floor. Is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio still has the floor.

Mr. GLENN. I would say that the characterizations on the other side are about specific instances out of the—most of them out of the FBI report. Most of them have been leaked to the public and have been in the press from whatever source. All my single words have been in the press. Are they acceptable as repeats of the press, which is what the other side has been doing in describing all of these articles today that are also in the FBI report. Is that fair?

Mr. COHEN. If the Senator wants to characterize them as single-word descriptions from unidentified sources, I have no objection, but I point out unidentified sources, uncorroborated testimony.

Mr. GLENN. I will so identify them as single word descriptions of unidentified sources.

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment.

Mr. GLENN. I yield for a question, yes.

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, I would ask the Senator this question, and I agree that we are all going to have to be careful on this. It is not going to be easy so I do not fault anything anyone said. But the ballerina business and the doctor business was all from the FBI report. And there had been some reports in the news media about it, if we are going to play that news media game.

I would ask the Senator from Ohio this question. If you look at the Sunday New York Times, February 26, quoting from that—and this is in the form of a question to the Senator—it says, quoting Bernard Weinraub:

The report is based on interviews that run "several thousand pages," said one White House official.

The summary, the official said, will contain descriptions of 12 allegations against Mr. Tower that the FBI was unable to corroborate. The official went on to describe 7 of the 12 allegations, the presentation of which is intended to cast Mr. Tower as someone unfairly rejected by the Democrats on flimsy charges.

The summary is to include the following charges and explanations:

I am not going to read all of these but it goes on to talk about what happened at a party; it goes on to talk about the Russian ballerina affair in Houston; it goes on to talk about the Arizona businessman in the Jefferson hotel; it goes on to talk about a businessman in West Germany observing certain matters, next a male flight attendant on a trip to Paris; next the Monocle Restaurant; next the neighborhood episode in Dallas, so forth and so on.

Mr. Fitzwater, the White House spokesman, said the aim of the public strategy is to "try to get these issues out in the open, get to focus on the validity of these charges.".

Now, I would just ask the Senator a question. If we use the rule of this opening up everything in those categories, then we are going to really be revealing the whole thing and I do——

Mr. McCAIN. Parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

Mr. NUNN. I do not believe we should do that and I do not think we should really peg to news media accounts in making that open to everything else. It we do that, there is going to be no end to it. All we have to do is have one leak in the news media and everybody pegs onto it and here we go. So I think that would be a bad rule and I would hope that we would just respect the FBI.

Mr. McCAIN. It has already happened today.

Mr. GLENN. In answer to the Senator's question, yes.

Mr. NUNN. I thank the Senator.

Mr. McCAIN. I have a parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

Mr. DOLE. Will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield?

Mr. GLENN. I yield for a question, yes.

Mr. DOLE. Let me indicate for the record I think the words used by the Senator from Ohio have been in the public print.

Mr. GLENN. They certainly have.

Mr. DOLE. I do not quarrel with his, but I think we ought to agree early on what is fair and what is not fair. Now Senate rule XXIX does not cover the White House, does it?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The rule does not cover the White House for the reason that, of course, the Senate rule could not control the course of conduct of the White House.

Mr. DOLE. But it does cover the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It does.

Mr. DOLE. And I think the sanction is—and I am not suggesting it because I think the Senator from Ohio just repeated what had been in public, but if somebody wants to stand up here without lifting the injunction of secrecy and start reading out of the FBI report, the sanction is expulsion from the Senate. Is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The sanction would be that which the Senate chose to impose.

Mr. DOLE. But does that include expulsion and dismissal of an employee of the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That would be a matter up to the Senate.

Mr. DOLE. I want to reaffirm what has been stated. This is fairly serious business unless we can resolve it, but I think sooner or later we are going to have to make something public or somehow inform the public because otherwise a lot of us who are trying to debate the issues are limited, whether it is the Senator from Ohio or someone on this side. I do not quarrel with the Senator from Ohio. He repeated what has been in the public. It is nothing he picked out of the report. He picked it out of the papers. That was a statement made by the Senator from South Carolina a couple days ago, about 7 or 8 words taken out of the RECORD. Is this a violation? I am not certain that is so important but that we understand what it is so all of us on both sides can do the best we can in the debate not violating rule XXIX.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. President, I have a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio still has the floor.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. President, does not the President of the Senate respond to a parliamentary inquiry?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator that has the floor chooses to yield for the purpose of the inquiry.

Mr. GLENN. I will yield without losing my right to the floor. I will yield for a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. McCAIN. There are many leaks as we all know that have been made to the media. If in the course of this debate information that has already been disclosed by the media is discussed by this Senator or any other, is that a violation of rule XXIX?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Would the Senator propound his question one more time?

Mr. McCAIN. What I am saying is that there are many leaks from the FBI report that have appeared in the media. I am not here to go through the academic exercise of who is responsible for it. But this Senator believes once it has appeared in the media, then if this Senator uses a media source for discussing those allegations, then I do not believe—I am asking for a rule of the Chair as to whether there is a violation of rule XXIX or not if the source of the discussion and debate is not from the FBI report but from information which is public knowledge in the media.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is aware of no precedent on that point on that issue.

Mr. McCAIN. I seek a ruling from the Chair on whether this Senator can discuss without fear of violating rule XXIX information which has been published in the national media.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The ruling from the Chair is that information would no longer appear to be confidential.

Mr. McCAIN. I thank the Chair.
